If the citizens of Baker had exercised foresight and forethought, and had taken over the electric light system for one-half million dollars, which if I remember correctly, was what the Eastern Oregon Light & Power Co. paid, they could have owned something of real financial value. If you had done so, your city debt would now be paid, and you would own your own distributing system free of all obligations. You allowed a gold mine to be sold for a song, and you have paid dearly ever since.

My dear Mr. Editor, you display your lack of knowledge of the electric-power business when you compare a bathing establishment with the distributing of electric energy.

The roads were a good investment. They could, however, have been built with very much more economy. They were built too rapidly, without sufficient knowledge and often with bad engineering, like the original road down Burnt River Canyon. Ten million dollars could have been saved the State of Oregon if Baldock, present highway engineer of Oregon, had been allowed to push, earlier, his plan of holding macadam with oil. Yes, the roads are a good thing, but we paid mighty dearly for them.

RATES

I notice that you are not convinced that the rates will be lower. "There are none so blind as those who will not see." Figure it out for yourself. The Government, through Bonneville, offers you power at $17.50 per kilowatt year. A kilowatt is 1,000 watts, and that offer means that you can have 25, 40-watt lamps burning 365 days and nights, for 1 full year, for $17.50, with that power delivered to your two substations in Baker on the low side of the transformer. Your ordinary storekeeper does not use that much current. Of course, that is the wholesale rate.

Figure it another way: The cost is less than 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. Take a 40-watt lamp. You can burn it 24 hours a day for 1 full month for 6 cents, two postage stamps—of course, a wholesale rate. That is the price for which your public-utility district can buy Bonneville power.

An ordinary 10-horsepower motor will take a little over 8 kilowatts to run it. You can run a 10-horsepower motor a night and a day for 38 cents, or for one 8-hour shift for a little over 12 cents.

I repeat for the thousandth time that the cost of electricity is not in the generation; it is hidden in the distribution. You in Baker are using power possibly brought from Black Canyon or American Falls in Idaho. Both of these plants were constructed by the Government with reclamation money. Both have been turned over for operation to the Wall Street utilities. That power can be generated in the Snake River and at Black Canyon just about as cheaply as it can be generated at Bonneville. There is very little difference. The profits are in the distribution. Because the distribution is in the hands of a private utility, rates were kept high. I would never advise the operation of an inefficient plant. I am sure that neither plant in Union County can operate against a Government rate of $17.50 per kilowatt-year. I am not so sure about the generating plants in Baker County.

"BUSTED" POWER COMPANIES

You never heard of a "busted" power company that had been properly managed. Yes, they have gone broke, but by manipulation, as is the case of the Portland plant. Compare Portland with Tacoma or with Winnipeg, Canada.

I have just received today a certified report from Winnipeg, a city which owns its own power. Their rates are, and have been for 25 years, about one-half of what yours have been in Baker. The city has a population of 100,000. They generate their own power by hydro. They have quite an expensive and long transmission line. The entire plant has cost more than $42,000,000. They have charged off the deadwood, and the value of the property now stands on their books at $28,129,197. Take their sinking fund and apply it on their debt and they owe only $9,000,000. You could not buy it today for $50,000,000. They have done all that practically since the E. O. L. & P. has been furnishing you juice in Baker. They have paid taxes every year, and they have charged about one-half the rates that you have paid.

The last report shows that they are using 4,912 kilowatt-hours per installed meter. I do not know what you are using in Baker, but I presume about 1,000 kilowatt-hours per installed meter. A recent report from Portland shows that they are now using 1,518 kilowatt-hours per installed meter. Think of it! In Winnipeg, Canada, they are using nearly three and one-half times as much electricity per meter as they are using in Portland, Oreg., and nearly five times as much as you are using in Baker. Why? Because electric energy in Winnipeg, Canada, is cheap. They have not gone broke. Neither has Tacoma's public plant. Portland's private plant is bankrupt and has ruined thousands though it operated in the richest territory in Oregon. Did that have such fine management?

Publicly owned utilities definitely present a better financial record than those privately owned. The reason seems to lie in the fact that the privately owned utilities in the United States have become the prey of holding company manipulation, speculation, and management.

LABOR

There will be plenty to do for all the employees of your present company as public-utility districts always try to employ the capable, trained men who know the system. Should you vote your public-utility district, you will do twice the business you now do, and more.

JUST LOOK AROUND AT THE PUBLIC PLANTS

You are not convinced that rates are lower under public power plants? On behalf of the House public power bloc of the Seventy-seventh Congress, I hereby offer to pay your railroad fare to Eugene, Forest Grove, or Canby if you will go to one of these Oregon cities, spend a day, study the plant, examine the books, and then return to Baker and write an honest account and publish it in the same detail as you did your editorial. I will personally pay your hotel bill if you will make that trip. You certainly need an education.

The Eugene record ought to cause every editor in Oregon who pleads the cause of the private utilities to blush with shame. The citizens of Eugene are no more intelligent than those in Baker, but they had different leadership, and they informed themselves and were free people.

About the time the E. O. L. & P. acquired your distribution system, Eugene, then about the same size as Baker, commenced to distribute its power and generate it on the McKenzie River. They are out of debt, or practically so. You could not buy their plant for $5,000,000. Their rates are less than one-half of what you pay in Baker. Baker had this same opportunity but threw it away for "a mess of pottage."

INTEREST

I see interest bothers you. Indeed, a Baker P. U. D. can borrow money at a cheaper rate than any private utility. Should you vote your P. U. D., you will be able to borrow money by pledging only the revenue. A public power plant in Los Angeles taught the financiers of the East that nothing was safer than utility bonds, with revenue, alone, pledged to pay interest and amortization.

TAXES

I am surprised that an editor of your intelligence and ability should again bring up the tax bogey. Can you still believe that the money paid into your county treasury by the private utility came from outside of Baker County? Do not forget this public-utility district is to be your organization, the same as your school district and the same as the city. It is not "another private utility." You state that the E. O. L. & P. paid $7,100 franchise tax. Your public-utility district can pay the same thing; they will get the money from the same people—the rate payers; and your public-utility district can pay much more because, when you own your own plant, you will not need to donate, as private utilities donate, freely to political activities.

You state that the public-utility district has possibilities for political favoritism. What about your city government? What about your school district? The only difference is that your public-utility district will make money.

WATER AND DEADWOOD

A private utility never reduces its obligations; it adds to them. The statement of the E. O. L. & P., through their own report, should convince any fair-minded man that there is "something rotten in Denmark." They state that in 1915 they paid $8,820 and now they pay $124,000 taxes. We all know that there has been very little advance in property taxes since 1915. Then their tremendous tax increase must have been in income taxes. It proves to any unbiased person that the private utility has an enormous and increasing income, and has enjoyed it for 30 years.

Do you expect the E. O. L. & P., will voluntarily squeeze the water out of their capital? I do not know how much water they have. I do not know how much deadwood is carried on their books, nor how much they are overcapitalized. Take a ride with me down Pyles Canyon into Union. You will see an old transmission line which I built more than 30 years ago.

You can always tell my line by a short cross arm at the top of the pole extending in only one direction with one wire on it. That line cost $1,000 a mile to build. I carried it on my books for $1,000; sold it for a thousand. It tied Grande Ronde Valley with the Rockcreek plant, for I owned at that time one-third of the Olive Lake contract, and I needed the power.

Close to that line, approaching it in several places, you will see a new line—better construction. I am told it brings the power from the Snake River and Black Canyon and connects up with American Falls. I have been told that the line stands on the books of the E. O. L. & P. at $15,000 a mile, and the insulators on the cross arms have a value, on the books, of $90 apiece. They are just bits of hardened clay. Of course, the new line cost more than mine, but not 15 times as much. The rates you pay are based on these inflated values.

When I bought the distributing system in La Grande, I paid $10,000 for an abandoned plant on the Grande Ronde River. There was an old building there, a dam, and a water wheel not in use. A fire burned the building; the dam went out in a flood. When I sold the Grande Ronde Electric, that old plant went in at $10,000. I wonder if it is still carried on the books of the E. O. L. & P., and if it has been for the past 30 years. This is the kind of "investment" that rate payers have been paying interest on everywhere, Baker and Union Counties not excepted.

These lines were built about a third of a century ago. Is it not about time that we had an honest-to-goodness evaluation of these properties which formed the capitalization for the private utility?

BUYING ELECTIONS WITH MONEY

You wonder why Spokane and Clatsop County voted against the public-utility district. The reason was the use of money in unstinted amounts by the private utilities to deceive the public. We have sworn testimony and a report from the Federal Power Commission that more than a million dollars has been spent by the utilities in Oregon and Washington in the last 5 years to kill the public-utility districts. The Federal Trade Commission here in Washington has another report that their investigation showed that the Edison Institute, which speaks for the utilities, spends between twenty-five and thirty millions annually to put over their plans and prevent public ownership of electric utilities. The public is misled by propaganda.

THE GOVERNMENT CANNOT OPERATE LOCAL SYSTEMS

Your last objection is prompted by the fact that you suspect Congress will pass legislation which will take from you the burden of distributing the Bonneville power. Rest assured, my dear editor, you never can get the advantage of the cheap Bonneville power unless you distribute Bonneville power cooperatively. That statement about the private power company passing on the benefits of Bonneville cheap power is just the bunk. Under their system of distribution and organization there would be no benefits.

There is no truer representative of the people and of public power than Senator BONE, of Washington. He knows all the tricks and schemes of the private utilities. He has not introduced the bill about which so much has been said, but no bill can provide for the Government operation of any local system. No one ever proposed such a plan. It would be unconstitutional. There is merely discussion about acquiring entire systems to resell to local public districts. Any such bill may have a rather rocky time being passed through the Seventy-seventh Congress.

Do not rely on Congress to do the detailed work for you. You must show some indication that you are willing to meet the issues yourselves. It is true that Congress remembers very vividly that the Commonwealth & Southern sold their properties in eastern Tennessee for $20,000,000 more than they were worth. There is not going to be any repetition of that in the Pacific Nothwest.

THE COLUMBIA RIVER

Think of what the Columbia River and its tributaries can do for our favorite Pacific Northwest. This marvelous power stream and its tributaries can be made to develop from feasible hydro projects 20,000,000 kilowatts. That is one-half as much power as is now developed everywhere in the United States. Can you not realize the "acres of diamonds" that lie all around you?

For long years I have believed that the Wall Street special interests would steal the Columbia River. I still fear that will happen. They are so selfish, so unscrupulous; they have so much money and know how to use it for false propaganda; it is so hard for the people to organize, and there are so many doubting editors, like yourself, that the odds are long in favor of the private interests. Oh, what a shame if our magnificent heritage should go to Wall Street interests as Niagara went to Mellon.

The Aluminum Co. of America is now firmly entrenched just below Bonneville. Your opportunity to claim, as a matter of right, your share of the one-half of the power of Bonneville, which was reserved for public organizations until January 1, 1942, depends on this election. Of course, if you declare you do not want the cheap power of Bonneville in Baker, that is your privilege and you can shut it out. It is now in Pendleton, and it will be in Grande Ronde Valley. I have seen to that part of it.

Never have the words of Shakespeare been more applicable:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures."

Ninth National Eucharistic Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD P. GALE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

Mr. GALE. Mr. Speaker, world-wide attention will be focused on the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul during the ninth national Eucharistic congress, June 23 to 26, 1941.

The central figure at the 4-day assembly will be the papal legate to be appointed by His Holiness Pope Pius XII as his personal representative.

A total of 130 archbishops and bishops and 10 abbots already have accepted the invitation of Archbishop John Gregory Murray, of St. Paul, to attend the national congress. Ninety-five of the archbishops and bishops will come from points in the United States, 10 from Canada, 5 from Mexico, and 1 each from China and Jamaica.

More than 150,000 persons from outside the St. Paul Diocese are expected to journey to the Congress to join the 300,000 Catholics within the diocese.

Since 1881, when the first international Eucharistic congress was held in Lille, France, there have been no less than 34 such events. The most recent was at Budapest, Hungary, in 1938. three international Eucharistic congresses have been in the Americas: Montreal, Canada, 1910; Chicago, United States of America, 1926; and Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1934.

Explaining the origin and significance of a Eucharistic congress, the Very Reverend James M. Reardon, pastor of the Basilica of St. Mary, Minneapolis, and general chairman of the Congress, said:

The material side of a congress is easily visualized. We have been accustomed to hear of congresses of various kinds. The idea which the word generally calls to our minds is that of a gathering of politicians or scientists, but we know that an orderly assembly of people brought together for any specific purpose constitutes a congress.

In the present case there is question of a Eucharistic congress, of an assemblage which centers and focuses its activities on that divine institution, the Holy Eucharist, the body and blood of Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar. This is the central idea of a Eucharistic congress, whether its scope as regional, national, or international.

World War Veterans of the United States Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

LETTER SUPPORTING H. R. 3318

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter written to me concerning H. R. 3318, to extend domiciliary and hospital care to World War veterans of the United States merchant marine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY]?

There was no objection.

WORLD WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE

APRIL 26, 1941.

Hon. ARTHUR D. HEALEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HEALEY: The Congress now has before it H. R. 3318, which you were so kind to introduce. When enacted, this bill will authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to furnish domiciliary and hospital care and medical treatment to World War veterans of the United States merchant marine. It is plain that a grave injustice has been done these veterans who served so splendidly during the World War; the Congress has failed during all these years to properly and adequately recognize them. It is my sincere hope that the present session of Congress will rectify this injustice.

The young men of 1917–18 who enlisted and served in the all-important and vital service of the United States merchant marine have never received any recognition for their service, which service was deemed of such importance to our country that the Sixty-fifth Congress appropriated $6,250,000 for recruiting and training men.

It was President Woodrow Wilson who issued the call to the young men to enlist in the United States merchant marine. He said: "It was a patriotic duty of young men to join this important service. The men who go down to the sea in ships have become an important factor in our national life. Their services are extremely essential in handling the ships to carry our soldiers in safety to Europe, in transporting the munitions and food supplies for their maintenance, and the material for the sustenance of the armies and peoples of the countries with which we are associated. No more honorable or serviceable task can come to any of our people than that of manning our merchant marine."

Secretary of War Newton D. Baker said in 1918: "Service in the merchant marine is absolutely vital to the success of winning the war. You can confidently say to the young men who have enlisted in the merchant marine, it is a matter of great delight for me to be able to come as in a sense responsible for the Army and say that the Army needs just this kind of cooperation. The War Department has a very deep interest in the recruiting of seamen for the merchant marine so that that great calling of the past and very necessary calling of the future may have permanent outlook. I have recently returned from Europe, and I had an opportunity to observe the sailors, the movements of the cargo. In the first place, I will say to you that a vital necessity of the continuance and increase of the American military abroad for the purpose of winning this war lies in adequate cargo transportation adequately served. So that if there be any patriotic obligation upon men anywhere to win this war it rests upon all of us who are in any degree associated with the business of getting Europe the supplies which are necessary for the maintenance of our great Army over there. Therefore it is one of the highest patriotic obligations. Our military operations in Europe are, of course, constantly on the increase. The increasing capacity of our troops, transport ships, and cargo ships enable us to place in Europe a very much larger number of troops than have hitherto been placed there."

Admiral Sir John Jellicoe, of the British Navy, said in November 1918: "The officers and men of the American merchant marine have founded during this war a new and glorious tradition in the teeth of undreamed of peril. While there has been glory and official honor for the Army and Navy, merchant sailors have been taking their chances down in the forehold and in the lifeboats and on pieces of wreckage in the freezing North Atlantic waters."

Rear Admiral William S. Sims, of the United States Navy, in his lecture before the Lowell Institute, on December 11, 1930, praised the officers and crews of the American merchant ships who transported supplies across the Atlantic during the World War. Admiral Sims said, "The skill and seamanship of these sailors was something that amazed naval officers, and they proved themselves to be seamen in a sense that naval officers never have the opportunity to become. The courage, initiative, and a sense of responsibility, skill in handling ships of all types, and noteworthy seamanship characterized the merchantmen. I'd like to see a bunch of 30 naval officers trying to handle 30 heterogeneous ships as the merchantmen did. Without the merchantmen's skill, courage, and loyalty the war could not have been won."

While rightfully there has been glory, official honor, and recognition for those who served during that period in the Army and Navy, it is regrettable that the valiant service rendered by the men of the merchant marine, who in countless instances were engaged in the same duties as the men of the United States Navy, has been permitted to go without recognition all these years since the cessation of the hostilities of the World War.

The enlisted men of the United States merchant marine in carrying out their precarious duties on the high seas were at all times subjected to the same hardships, suffering, and dangers as those enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard and the United States Navy. But, while the two latter great services of the United States have been fully recognized since the World War, the men of the merchant marine have suffered through the failure of Congress to take proper action in their behalf; that the Congress should have done so is shown by the significant fact that it was a prerequisite to enlistment in the merchant marine that the applicant be a full American citizen. This regulation, as is well known, was not in force in either the Army, Navy, or Coast Guard. Thousands of aliens were permitted to enlist in these branches of the service and are receiving benefits which are denied American citizens who served in the merchant marine.

Seamen of the merchant marine faced the piratical submarine and the torpedo, not once but again and again as a regular part of their duty, and countless numbers of them were shipwrecked, crippled, killed, drowned, or frozen to death.

The service rendered by the wartime merchant-marine sailors was of tremendous value in the proper carrying out of America's part in the World War, for it was this service that was in truth the main connecting link between our source of supply in the United States and our battling troops on foreign soil. Had the merchant marine failed in its duties it would have been impossible for this country to have brought about the final victory.

The merchant marine was a medium of contact for the fighting forces of the A. E. F. who were at least 3,000 miles from their base. The merchant marine ran the much needed troops and tonnage, rifles, amunition, planes, food, clothing, medical, and other supplies across mine-filled and U-boat infested Atlantic Ocean. These boys, for a great part were only boys, gave their all in answer to the call of their President, Woodrow Wilson. Many lost their lives; others suffered mental and physical tortures. They were the men who manned the American ships that were sent to Davey Jones' locker because U-boats maintained a certain liveliness in the high seas. They were the men who, because of a torpedo finding its mark, usually in the boiler rooms of the ships, were boiled alive by steam from exploded boilers and ruptured pipe lines. They were the survivors of sinking ships in the midocean whom crews of German submarines failed to aid. They were the men aboard ships whose fighting defense was a naval gun crew that did their level best to fight off an attack with guns located on the fore and aft of the ship main deck. Many times these guns were under the firing range of the guns of the U-boats. Some of the ships did not even have a gun for protection. Sometimes they ran the gantlet through the submarine zone and had protection of a convoy. These veterans were men who saw dangerous war service without an even chance to fight back.

Official records show that there were 156 American merchant ships sunk by the enemy to 19 American naval vessels in the World War of 1917–18. This speaks for the hazards that the merchant-marine men suffered.

And today in this present European war it is the merchant marine that is playing the same important part as it did in the World War of 1917–18.

Let me emphasize, H. R. 3318 does not in any way seek pensions, bonus, or compensation benefits of any kind. It simply calls for a just recognition of the valiant service of the men of the merchant marine by granting domiciliary and hospital care to those veterans who became service disabled and who find it impossible as age advances to adequately or properly care for themselves.

Don't let it go down in history that the Government of the United States failed to take care of these boys who are in need of medical care due from disability which they received while serving their country.

We hang our heads in shame when one of these veterans goes to burial, because our Government has not seen fit to furnish a flag to drape the casket of a real American.

The report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs on this bill to the House committee on veterans' legislation said: "The matter of including the particular group of civilian employees referred to in the bill for hospital, domiciliary care, and burial benefits is one for the Congress primarily to determine."

So, in asking the Congress to enact this bill, we feel that we are asking that an injustice be corrected.

Sincerely yours,

WORLD WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE.

Legislative Representative.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

LETTER FROM THE MISSOURI RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATIONS, INC.

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, the following is a letter from the Missouri Retail Hardware Association, Inc., signed by its secretary, Mr. Louis C. Kreh. It is a typical example of true American patriotism, and a fine expression of the willingness of our people to make sacrifices for our defense efforts, and, likewise, a demand on the part of the people that the Government and the Congress do their part. I am most happy that the Missouri Retail Hardware Association take the position that they do.

THE MISSOURI RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION, INC.,
St. Louis, Mo., May 23, 1941.

Hon. WALTER C. PLOESER,
Representative,
House Office Building Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PLOESER: Officials in Washington are asking this association to use its leadership to make members of the hardware trade realize that "business as usual" must be forgotten for the period of the present emergency.

We are glad to comply with these suggestions, for we realize that materials and productive time must be released for defense purposes and that consumers must have money with which to pay heavily increased taxes and to purchase defense bonds and that in many instances these ends can only be attained through a reduction in purchases for normal purposes.

These programs will call for sacrifices and operating difficulties on the part of businessmen, but we feel sure that the overwhelming majority will bear them willingly in order that we may safeguard our United States democracy.

But businessmen are saying, with sound logic, that Congress also must realize that "business as usual" is out of the picture for the duration of the emergency and that it should evidence its awareness of the situation by reducing to the fullest extent governmental appropriations which might be entirely satisfactory during a more normal period.

Unless there is evidence of leadership in this direction on the part of the Congress, businessmen are certain to become restive under these emergency conditions and less liable to willingly cooperate with the various programs of our Government. The action of the President in recommending a reduction in appropriations for relief is a commendable step in the right direction, but certainly goes but a small way toward effecting the economies in usual governmental expenditures which these times demand.

I can say to you with certainty that the members of this association, as well as other businessmen, will heartily appreciate the personal efforts you may make to materially reduce expenditures in other than our needed defense activities.

Yours very truly,

MISSOURI RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION.

Logan-Walter Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE OREGON STATE BAR

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including a resolution of the board of governors of the Oregon State bar at Eugene, Oreg., May 17, 1941, approving and recommending the enactment of legislation embodying the principles expressed in S. 674 and H. R. 4238, commonly known as the Logan-Walter bill, which was vetoed by the President at the last Congress. The resolution follows:

Whereas the bar of the State of Oregon has heretofore placed itself on record as heartily approving the Logan-Walter bill passed by the last Congress, but vetoed by the President; and

Whereas there are now pending before the present Congress two bills which embody the principles approved by the bar and expressed by the said Logan-Walter bill, to wit: S. 674 and H. R. 4238; and

Whereas the board of governors of the Oregon State Bar, both individually and based upon the previous action of the Oregon State Bar, are of the firm opinion that the principles embodied in said pending bills are consistent with the fundamental theories of democratic government and of our established system of law and are necessary to the preservation thereof and to the basic rights of the American people: Now, therefore, it is hereby

Resolved by the board of governors of the Oregon State Bar, That it does approve and earnestly recommend the enactment of legislation embodying the principles expressed in Senate bill 674 and H. R. 4238; and further

Resolved, That the secretary be and hereby is directed to send copies of this resolution to the Members of the Oregon delegation in Congress.

Attest:

F. M. SERCOMBE, Secretary.

Resolutions of Western Massachusetts Association of Mayors, Selectmen, and County Commissioners

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
May 5, 1941.

Hon. ARTHUR D. HEALEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ARTHUR: Last Saturday afternoon the Western Massachusetts Association of Mayors, Selectmen, and County Commissioners, of which I am president, had the biggest meeting in its history. At that meeting they passed the two enclosed resolutions.

As a Representative of the State of Massachusetts in Washington, I know you will be interested in these resolutions and so I am passing them on to you for your information.

Yours very truly,

Resolved, That the Work Projects Administration be continued in its present form for the fiscal year of 1942 and that emphasis be placed in the elasticity of operations with particular reference to national-defense projects;

That it is the sense of this meeting that a vote of commendation be given to the present Administrator, Denis W. Delaney, of the Work Projects Administration program in Massachusetts, for its service to the individual counties, cities, and towns during the past year.

Resolved, That the conference of mayors, selectmen, and county commissioners in meeting at Westover Field, Chicopee Falls, Mass., commends the excellent work experience training program of the N. Y. A. in Massachusetts and its assistance to our cities and towns under the able and effective direction of State Administrator John L. Donovan, Jr.

We urge the Congress of the United States to expand further this worthwhile program in Massachusetts in order that our youth may obtain needed work experience in the mechanical and other trades to prepare for the national-defense emergency.

Flood Control Needs on Fall River, S. Dak.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS CASE, OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD a statement which I made before the House Flood Control Committee concerning the needs for a flood-control project on Fall River at Hot Springs, S. Dak.

The statement follows:

FALL RIVER PROJECT, SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have spoken to several members of the committee individually, and understand that projects which were included in H. R. 9640 of the Seventy-sixth Congress may again be placed in the bill the committee is preparing, I shall not take the time of the committee for a lengthy statement. I understand also that the board of engineers has renewed its endorsement of the project which was favorably recommended in the report embodied in House Document No. 655 of the previous—Seventy-sixth—Congress. So, I wish merely to review the facts briefly and state the reason for the urgency of this project.

Fall River is formed by the junction of Hot Brook and Cold Brook, immediately above the city of Hot Springs. The river flows the entire length of the city and forms one side of the main street, known as River Avenue. The city auditorium, the county courthouse, the principal business buildings of the city, including some large stone hotels and a large hospital, are built on River Avenue, all in a narrow river canyon. This situation grows out of the natural development of the city around the springs of warm mineral water which give the city its name and occasioned its beginning.

The two watersheds which feed into the canyon above the city drain large areas of rough, mountainous country, peculiarly subject to sudden "flash" floods. The rate of run-off is indicated in the very name Fall River. It drops 25 feet to the mile, while the run-off from the mountainsides above the stream bed amounts to many times that, of course. This means that rain and thunderstorms in the mountains above the city can hurl the water down upon the city within a very few minutes and without warning. This has happened in the past and, as the Army engineers' report says:

"The occurrence of a maximum probable flood would cause damages in excess of $1,000,00 and might result in serious loss of life."

The history of recent floods gives sharp emphasis to that conclusion. In 1884, 5 years after the city was started, a flood took several lives. The engineers' estimate of probable life loss in a maximum flood is 60 lives. Floods have come with serious losses of property through the years. The city has gone into debt many times attempting to curb the river with retaining walls. It has done all that it could. But in 1937 a flood took out the Northwestern Railroad, which came up Fall River and entered the city from the south and east. It also damaged but did not totally destroy the sole remaining railroad, the Burlington, which comes down Hot Brook and enters the city from the north and west, with yards and warehouses immediately below the junction of the streams at the north end of the city.

Aside from the very large public interest in this situation, owing to the large property and life values at stake, the Federal Government has a special and direct interest. That arises because Battle Mountain Sanitarium, a facility of the Veterans' Administration, is located at Hot Springs, with nearly 1,000 members, domiciliary and hospital cases. Battle Mountain facility is heated by a coal-fed heating system. That coal formerly came in on both railroads. Now only one remains. One feature of the project recommended by the engineers is a flood-control dam up Hot Brook Canyon that would protect both the railroad and the city. It is urgent that this be built at the earliest possible date, lest the Federal facility lose its coal service from that source, which would mean increased cost of maintenance, to say nothing of possible critical danger.

The project contemplates two control reservoirs and channel clearance and widening through the city. Each unit is needed and each will contribute definitely to solving the problem. Engineers point out that, should such a cloudburst occur as did occur in 1937 and again in 1938 and center on the mountains between these watersheds, instead of hitting one of them as happened in 1937 and 1938, a flood loss of tragic consequences would take place. In 1938 a portion of the water fell over into the Beaver Creek watershed, and, although that watercourse is in the rural area, two lives were lost. Had that water fallen on Hot Brook and Cold Brook instead of on Cold Brook and Beaver Creek, and had it come at night, scores of lives would have been lost. Hot Springs' population in the 1940 census is 4,083, instead of the 3,000 noted in 1930 and used in the committee report of last year. I earnestly urge the inclusion of the Fall River project, and want to thank you for your consideration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at the commencement exercises of the Utah State Agricultural College at Logan, Utah, on May 31, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is an opportunity for which I have long waited.

As part of our pioneer lore, we learned that when President Heber C. Kimball spoke a prophecy he admonished his congregation to see that his prophecy came true. He concluded with the remark that when a prophet utters a prophecy, it is the duty of the people to see that the prophecy is fulfilled. That story is repeated for a reason.

At a meeting of the Committee on Intellectual Cooperation of the Interparliamentary Union in Budapest in 1936, I told the delegates from two score countries that the law creating the American land-grant colleges, with their laboratories and experiment stations was probably the outstanding single event in the educational history of the world. It marked the American acceptance of the twofold theory of education essential for the preservation of a democracy based upon a trained citizenry. The idea was this: Take the university to the people; train them in theories of government and the knowledge of economic possibilities, thus bringing a life of fullness, plenty as to physical requirements, abundant as to spiritual needs. Now, what I want you, as graduates of one of the great land-grant colleges, to do is to live in such a way that my words in Budapest will be proved true.

When the legislature of the provisional state of Deseret passed a law providing for a university, it was not doing a unique thing, but was rather reflecting that spirit of democracy in America which was felt by all wherever America caught the spirit and purposes of the fathers. Read our history. The Revolutionary period produced the ideals and theories which evolved into the American public-school system. Two years before the victory at Yorktown, Jefferson wrote his bill for the establishment of public education in the State of Virginia. Jefferson knew well the essence of democracy when he wrote, "No nation is permitted to live in ignorance with impunity," and "if a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be." Even our experiment stations had their origin in Revolutionary times, for when Jefferson established the University of Virginia he suggested that 6 acres of land be set aside for the cultivation of "exotics of distinguished usefulness and accommodated to our climate"; then he named plants and trees of great economic value from the four corners of the globe, including teak, Indian rubber tree, and seeds from Brazil. Jefferson invited one of the great European learned societies to move to America, for he saw in it not just a new reverence, but the new birth of the desire of all nations—a civilization based upon knowledge and intelligence. Washington—and, in fact, most of our great founders—accepted this spirit, as is proved by the Ordinance of 1787 with its land grants for education.

Our national leaders at times have lost the true meaning of America and her mission to make life more abundant for men, women, and children, for Buchanan vetoed the first land-grant college act. But Lincoln, in the midst of the struggle to save what the fathers had founded and as an aid in the preservation of a civilization based upon knowledge and intelligence, saw—as Americans see today—the worth of liberty when threatened with its loss, and signed the Morrill Act, which brought us our present land-grant college systems.

Utah's educational situation today is, though, quite unique. We have not its duplicate anywhere else in our Nation, and it accounts for a scattering of Utah's youth in parts far away from home. There are, of course, other factors. But here in the northern half of our State are 3 major higher institutions of learning, feeding roughly 350,000 people. Three hundred and fifty thousand people will not assimilate the graduates of 3 major institutions. The result is that many of our leading youth go elsewhere to live. They leave at a time when their productive capacity—to a politician, productive capacity means ability to be taxed—starts, and their share of community upbuilding goes elsewhere after the State has seen them through their years of training. The loss of this leadership might in time spell comparative doom to a community. It is at least something we in Utah should be thoughtful about, but that is not to be my point this morning.

Inspired by this occasion, I accept here and now the thesis that Utah's contribution to the Nation is to develop and train the future leadership of the Nation. Why not? Have we not in our veins the blood of community builders? Have we not the heritage of American spiritual and cultural ideals? Have we not faith in God's purposes? Have we not seen the desert blossom as the rose? In the blood of every one of you flows a heritage of service to his country, his fellowmen, and his God, which bespeaks a planned and purposeful life.

"He that would bring home the wealth of the Indies must carry the wealth of the Indies with him."

Suppose, then, we accept the facts as they are. Let us say that many of you will leave Utah. If you are to fulfill my prophecy and become the leaders of the Nation, just what is this wealth of the Indies you must carry with you? What, beyond the heritage we have already mentioned, which is, after all, the heritage of any of our Utah boys and girls, is your peculiar heritage as graduates of the Utah State Agricultural College? I have said you are to be leaders of your Nation. Let us turn to Jefferson to get your particular mission in that leadership. He seemed to be thinking of the graduates of the Utah State Agricultural College and their worth to their Nation in 1941 when he wrote:

"The pursuits of agriculture are the best preservatives of morals."

"Corruption of morals in the mass of cultivators is a phenomenon of which no age nor nation has furnished an example."

and

"Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God, if He ever had a chosen people, whose breasts He has made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue. It is the focus in which He keeps alive that sacred fire, which otherwise might escape from the face of the earth."

We must have more than these simple words of Jefferson to get their real meaning. His philosophy of life, which reflects the best there is in Americanism, starts with the Aristotlean notion that man is destined for society, that his morality is part of his nature, and that there is but one code of morals for man whether acting by himself or collectively as a nation. Do we not see, therefore, that those men who have grasped the real meaning of America are those who, like Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Wilson, have stressed the spiritual values of American life, men who have seen the spiritual mission of America in this world? Just as the American Union, in the final analysis, depends upon spiritual values for its continued existence, just so the world must have faith in the things of the spirit and accept the power of morals among nations, as we do among individuals.

On the American dollar are the words 'In God We Trust," but Americans trust much more than God. They trust their courts; their Supreme Court has no way of enforcing its will but it is the most powerful court on earth. They trust their Congress, even though Congress has the right to judge its own Members and throw out those whom you elect, to cut down your judges and impeach your President, to declare war, to take your life, and destroy your property. They trust their President with powers of unbelievable magnitude. They do all this because they know the strength of a spiritual and moral value.

As you pass through life, know this: That men who preach faith in the purposes of God, the need of spiritual and moral values preach in vain and with a devilish meaning when in their sermons they cite the teaching of Jesus, "Unto the least of these," but make fun of the poor and work to retard those who would overcome poverty. Beware of the man who preaches sacrifice, but lives his life in keeping with Cain's unkillable question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Beware of the man who preaches social service and contributions to community causes, who would isolate himself and kill all combined effort by "minding his own business."

You are, then, to be the preservers of the country's morale! But you are, too, to be the Nation's experimenters.

While in France, Jefferson wrote:

"Perhaps I may render some service by forwarding to the society such new objects of culture as may be likely to succeed in the soil and climate of South Carolina. In an infant country, as ours is, these experiments are important. We are probably far from possessing, as yet, all the articles of culture for which nature has fitted our country. To find out these will require abundance of unsuccessful experiments. But if, in a multitude of these, we make one useful acquisition, it repays our trouble."

Jefferson realized, too, the tremendous importance of this experimentation, this finding of "new objects of culture." He is speaking to you, graduates of the Utah State Agricultural College, when he says:

"The greatest service which can be rendered any country is to add a useful plant to its culture. * * * One service of this kind rendered to a nation is worth more to them than all the victories of the most splendid pages of their history."

Perhaps one example will serve to illustrate. You can give me many more:

When we were in Japan the soybean furnished bulk for our morning soup, as it did for most of the poor of that land. Since then, through experimentation, the lowly soybean has been found to have a multitude of uses, ranks with our "strategic and critical materials" in importance. It has played its part in the industrialization of our farms. It brought vital readjustment in the Corn Belt, made continued farm life possible when something had to take the place of food for 10,000,000 horses replaced by machines in the 30,000,000 crop-acres and 15,000,000 acres of pasture now made useless. I am told there is no phase of our life that the soybean does not enter.

But I am getting out of my field. You, though, have spent 4 years learning these facts. Further, you have found new plants for Utah, grasses for her ranges, desert plants to keep this glorious desert blossoming and productive. Our pioneer fathers knew the importance of agriculture; the Spanish padres knew it; you and I know it. You have chosen the agricultural college because you realize it. Your contribution is to glorify and dignify agriculture by placing it on a basis where intelligence will be rewarded, by helping the country and small-town people to enjoy social and cultural opportunities with all.

In the modern world no vocation can retain its dignity which does not provide financial independence and opportunity for cultural improvement. This means making the activities of rural America financially profitable and bringing to its people the music, art, drama, and literature enjoyed by the urban dweller. In this worthy undertaking the Government can help by constructing roads, extending rural electrification, and establishing, close to the place of production, depots for storage, reception of surpluses and stock piles; but the extent to which the Government's help is useful depends on you.

Perhaps I have just tapped the reservoir of such ideas. But that is what I want to do. You are those who are to make the reservoirs, conserve, experiment, create, fulfill a long-dreamed-of destiny.

Did I hear someone say, "This is all very well, but hardly practical. Half of us are going to be taken in the draft. The world is in turmoil. This is no time to be talking about new plants, new ideas, experimentation."

Right. These are not ordinary times. The world is turned upside down and peril faces us on all sides. Still, never did a class face so many opportunities for constructive life work and contributions to constructive planning and thinking. You are blessed to be entering upon life with such a challenge, when so many avenues of adventure and constructive service are open to you. You are facing times of danger, but youth has never feared danger; and if you will serve man and promote his welfare it is always a time of danger.

Now, when men are learning to hate one another more each day, now is the time to teach the world another way. Now is the time "not to join in hating, but in loving." What stream of thought and history this quotation brings.

It was Sophocles, back in the days of Greek drama, who caused Antigone to lament, "Not to join in hating, but in loving."

Gibbon, speaking of Trajan, in his Decline and Fall of Rome, said: "As long as men applaud the destroyers of peace, men and property more than they applaud the builders of civilization, the world will not honor peaceful developments."

On April 3, 1941, Senator ADAMS, of Colorado, declared on the floor of the United States Senate: "I pointed out to the Members that there was no difficulty in securing appropriations not only of millions of dollars but of billions of dollars if they had for their purpose the destruction of human life and human property, and if the amount was large enough; but we could not get through the conference committee an appropriation of $10,000 for scientific research."

Early in Chinese history there was an attempt at interstate organization for peace. Actually some fifty-odd states joined in a league of nations, and the period of the warring states, where struggles had gone on for centuries, seemed to be coming to an end. The prime minister of one of the largest states pointed out that peace had been maintained by a balance of power between the states for so long that that theory and that practice should not be abandoned and that anyway this—500 B. C.—was no time for experiment.

A few weeks ago a Senator of the United States, speaking in a hearing being held for the purpose of gaining sentiment in regard to the ratification of an international convention, made the claim that this was no time to present a treaty, the world was in a chaotic condition, and the leaders of most of the nations of the world would not respect a treaty; therefore, we should not ratify it. What he was saying was that we should make no stand for right because many were not respecting the right.

I might go on citing incident after incident to show that there have always been those who have been opposed to any constructive effort to better men's condition. It is never a good time to attempt to help others. Zoroaster, Confucius, the Great Buddha, and Jesus all learned that lesson.

Those were the world's four greatest failures. Jesus died on the Cross almost universally rejected. Zoroaster was so completely lost that no one knows today in which century to place him. The Great Buddha's simple teachings were so corrupted by his followers that the truths he taught and lived would have died for all time had not another revitalized some of his teachings 500 years after his passing into Nirvana. Confucius failed as a prime minister, a brain truster, a historian, a preserver of religion, a teacher of kings, and had to die surrounded by a few poor followers who accepted the simple thesis that through morality and the rectification of one's life both men and the state can be saved. These were the great failures. There are others: Washington, for he died with the unhappiness which one reads in every sentence of his Farewell Message. Jefferson, who, because he was a philosopher knew many of his efforts would fail, but who wrote before his death, "You and I shall look down from another world on these glorious achievements to man which will add to the joys even of Heaven." Lincoln and Wilson—failures, yes, when we see them living for the present as we do. But they did not live for the present. They knew that life is more than Shakespeare's Seven Ages of Man, when "second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything" "ends this strange, eventful history." They knew that life begins when one gets in tune with the infinite and makes his purposes those of his God, his country, or his fellow men.

In times like these when men must seek wisdom and guidance from those who seemed to live great missions in working out eternal purposes for man's well-being, the words of the Father of our Country ring true today, so true, in fact, that they might be words of advice to this generation. That our Nation is heeding that advice must give great satisfaction.

In addressing his fellow citizens of the Senate and the House on January 8, 1790, Washington said:

"Among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defense will merit particular regard. To be prepared for war is one of the most effective means of preserving peace. A free people ought not only to be armed but disciplined; to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite; and their safety and interest require, that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies. * * *

"Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. In one, in which the measures of government receive their impression so immediately from the sense of the community, as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways; by convincing those who are entrusted with the public administration, that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people; and by teaching the people themselves to know and to value their own rights; to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority between burthens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness, cherishing the first, avoiding the last, and uniting a speedy but temperate vigilance against encroachments, with an inviolable respect to the laws."

Edmund Burke said, "When bad men combine, the good must associate else they will fall one by one an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle." These men, by their lives, caused the good to associate and men have been saved from "sacrifice in a contemptible struggle."

Around whom will you rally? For what will you join? That is for you to decide. America offers you many loyalties. Which will you take?

What is there in human nature that makes Antigone's wail so consistent with world history? When was there a good time to be thoughtful about improving conditions? The irony of history is that in the moments of chaos we generally have the best thought because then there is necessity for constructive thought and action. Who would be foolhardy enough to suggest that the time was ripe for experimenting with a great concept of government, such as our Federal Union, with the States in the condition they were in 1785, 1786, and 1787? Were not Washington and his associates merely foolhardy adventurers and experimenters? Was 1775, before the Colonies had become really united, while they were actually at war, and while the Continental Congress surely did not represent the unanimous opinion of the people in the Colonies—was it a happy time to go flaunting political thoughts about liberty, about man's having unalienable rights, about separating from the motherland, about proclaiming and accepting the doctrine of the right of revolution? What about the time when conditions were so perilous that men who accepted the theory I have just quoted from Burke, that the good must associate together or they would die unpitied in a contemptible struggle, made this theory colloquial by mentioning over and over again if they did not hang together they would hang apart? Should Woodrow Wilson have accepted Clemenceau's advice, which was almost word for word the same as the old Chinese Prime Minister's, that we had better stand by the balance of power and think of world organization experimentation at a better time? In the light of circumstances, the cynical among us will say, "Why, yes; because Woodrow Wilson's ideal dreams have not come true." But whose have? That which is a failure in this generation may be a great success in the next.

One of the former presidents of this great institution used to end most of his talks to the students by repeating, "Man does not live by bread alone." Why, no man lives at all until he learns how to live outside and apart from his immediate necessities. Eating, drinking, and breathing are not living.

Was 1850, the time the Utah pioneers attempted to organize, a happy time for experimenting with a university.? You remember that John Taylor returned from France in the early fifties, bringing machinery for our industrial beginnings and articles for use as aids to the instructors in the projected University of Deseret. This action on President Taylor's part is an illustration of the early American concept of democracy—that the training of the citizen and the development of industry must go hand in hand. The teaching aids were not used for 15 or 16 years and the machinery failed of its purpose because the trained personnel to run it was not available. What a lesson in social, educational, economic, industrial interdependence we see here. This Nation today needs the lesson John Taylor's homecoming should have taught our people.

Your institution lives today because Abraham Lincoln was not afraid to experiment, was not afraid to turn his back upon the doctrine of a predecessor, that the Constitution of the United States did not delegate to the Federal Government the responsibility of educating the people. Maybe it did not; but thank goodness Abraham Lincoln saw that it did not prevent such delegation and accepted the theory that what the Constitution did not prevent, the Government might do if it was in the interest of the general welfare. Can Lincoln ever die? Not so long as the Constitution endures because he, like John Marshall, saw that the Constitution was set up to endure for the ages and must become a living thing if it was to grow, develop, and become the companion of the people in the fulfillment of ther common efforts and their national destiny.

Back to my Budapest talk and your duty to make me a prophet—does anyone know of a single experiment that has brought so many blessings to so many people as the establishment of the land-grant colleges in the United States? They brought the fulfillment of one of Jefferson's dreams, the carrying of the university to the people, the making possible of the great experimental laboratories dealing with soils, with life, with seeds, with livestock, and that greatest of blessings, the bettering of life in and around the home.

We are today in the midst of world chaos because the lessons of the past seem to stand for naught. Men are uniting for war and destruction. They are cynical about joining for peace and construction. Out of this turmoil and strife must come the nucleus of a better world order. Let us have union for peace. Government's chief aim must become the good life. Living must count. The concept of liberty is a concept of life; it is not a concept of death. The free man must be a man of purpose, a man of plan, a man of experiment, and an everlasting seeker of the truth. The new world is dawning. Are we prepared for it? It will never come except by our efforts, and there will never be a better time to make our efforts count. I have often wondered why even the angels in heaven were never given to know when the Lord would come again. I think I know now. I believe that when once man understands in the fullest what liberty means, what dignity comes to the free man, that then he will know that he must be a partner with the gods in working out eternal plans. How could the angels know when men would arrive at that stage? The new world will not be one imposed upon men, but it will be one that men will work out. God, I am sure, is ready to be man's partner, but are we willing to be His? I have spoken of Jesus as one of the failures. But He was not; it was man who failed. None of the four great men I mentioned really failed; the failure was on the part of their generations. I wonder now if that was not Heber C. Kimball's meaning? Jesus and the others were ready for a partnership with the eternal. Man rejected the chance. A wise partner will not take the chance of a second rejection—too much is at stake. No; not even the angels can know—but man can. Free man, inspired by the new concept, "The glory of God is intelligence," will act only with intelligence. Such action means planned action, action after knowledge, action with a purpose. That is the life your school has taught you. If intelligence is God's glory, and if intelligence means action after planning, planning after deliberation, and deliberation after thought—all three making for purpose—and since God works in harmony with the great scheme of things, thus depending upon man's partnership, why not bring God's glory down to earth and say, "The glory of man is intelligence," that God's will may be done here on earth, as it is in heaven.

Free men working toward the eternal purposes of God is my concept of the glory of intelligence.

War and Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the National Broadcasting System Saturday night by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], dealing with the question of war and peace.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. I am very proud to be speaking tonight under the auspices of the America First Committee.

I remember the long fights upon the so-called neutrality bills. When the first one was before the Senate I made some remarks which I prefaced by a little couplet from Dryden. This was as follows:

"Such subtle covenants shall be made
Till peace itself is war in masquerade."

I early sensed from occasional newspapers, different correspondents, and columnists, whither we were drifting. The little couplet I often had in mind, and during the few years that have intervened its truth became more apparent. I have lived to see my utterances in opposition to war justified. It's true that today insidiously the propaganda has crept upon all of us, and finally we see it so deftly administered that like a rare anesthetic it almost overcomes us. In the shock of the poison the jingle has ever been in my mind—

Till peace itself is war in masquerade."

As we look back we can realize how gradual was the development; how artfully planned, until now we stand aghast on the very brink of war.

At the very commencement of the remarks I made in the speech referred to, I said:

"At the outset, Mr. President, I wish to say I am not a Nazi-ist, I am not a Fascist, thank God, I am not a Communist, and I do not believe, to employ a much misused word, in the ideology of any one of those particular groups. I belong to nothing of that sort; I abhor them all. I detest dictators, whether they are actual or potential, and wherever they may be."

And time has intensified this opinion.

Lest we forget, I want to recall with you for a moment the passage of events that lulled some of us into a false security.

In 1935 the President, in San Diego, said:

"In the face of this apprehension the American people can have but one concern and speak but one sentiment; despite what happens in continents overseas the United States of America shall and must remain as long ago the Father of our Country prayed that it might remain, unentangled and free.

* * * * * *

"We not only earnestly desire peace, but we are moved by a stern determination to avoid those perils that will endanger our peace with the world."

And then following this in sequence was the speech of the President at Chautauqua in 1936. He then said:

"We are not isolationists except insofar as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war."

And again in the same speech:

"I have seen war. I have seen war on land and sea. I have seen blood running from the wounded. I have seen men coughing out their gassed lungs. I have seen the dead in the mud. I have seen cities destroyed. I have seen 200 limping, exhausted men come out of line—the survivors of a regiment of 1,000 that went forward 48 hours before. I have seen children starving. I have seen the agony of mothers and of wives. I hate war."

How we've reechoed the words of the President, "I hate war."

And then a change came o'er the spirit of his dreams, and in 1937 we find him giving utterance to these words:

"It seems to be unfortunately true that the epidemic of world lawlessness is spreading.

"When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease."

In 1939, in his message to Congress, he said:

"Words may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people."

Here was the genesis of the expression "methods short of war" of which we heard so much until the passage of the lease-lend bill.

And then—I omit the intermediate utterances because of lack of time—came the hypocritical, ill-begotten, misnamed lease-lend bill, conceived in deception and carried out in hypocrisy.

Don't you remember how every man in favor of this lease-lend bill stated it was designed to prevent war from ever coming to us, that its purpose was distinctly to keep our country out of war, and how our puny voices in dismay and contradiction went unheard? How from all over the country came the expression "short of war," that no one would explain, and none could? We were justified in charging the sole use was by reiteration to lull our people to sleep. Ever since the bill was passed, the expression "short of war" has been abandoned, and we have seen within recent days the horrible efforts of the warmongers to begin a new theme that involved the very antithesis of what they assured the American people would not occur, until now America stands at the cross roads, one of which takes us upon our peaceful way that we may live our own lives; the other of which is the road lighted with the flames of war and into which we fear we will be driven.

The most momentous of the President's promises made to us was solemnly, oh so solemnly, given just before election:

"And while I am talking to you, mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

"I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again:

"Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars."

Many, many times, by quotation from the Democratic platform and otherwise has the President assured the people that he would not take us into war and, even more solemnly, that our boys would not be sent into any foreign wars. The people had the right to rely on these assurances. They did rely on them. Let the people make the other party to the promise keep faith.

I recall to you but a few of the statements in all of those made by the President in which he asserted in the most positive fashion: "Your President says this country is not going to war." The President's speeches were hinting at the possibility of war, but when the President was questioned concerning these statements, categorically, he repudiated them. If explanation were needed for the simplicity of the people or any defense of their gullibility it is furnished in the current number of the Saturday Evening Post under the title "In Defense of the People." I wish I could read the whole article to you that you might admeasure the blame and either attach it to a bemused, confused, and too-trusting people, or to one who kept locked within his bosom his intent.

And now having settled, so far as words can settle, the blame attached to either party, let us pursue our theme. Shall this great, peace-loving country that is not a party to the war, that had naught to do with its original declaration, be pitchforked into the brutal conflict from which we have nothing to expect, and everything to lose? It is asserted that we must take sides with all the gruesome horrors in defense of one belligerent, or else we'll be seized by the other and subjected to the most awful indignities.

Bluntly, frankly, the issue at stake here is whether we'll go to war. On the one side are a smattering of good citizens, the vociferous little puppets of J. P. Morgan and Co., a large part of the press, practically all the columnists, the newspaper correspondents, all crying for war with Germany and against Hitler; on the other side is the great inarticulate mass of citizens like you and me, of Americans who love their country, whose thoughts are ever first for it, and who, at all hazards, will protect it.

Judging from the newspapers these last named are in the woeful minority, but we, whose correspondence is large, know that the exact opposite is true. We, who are only Americans, with no other thought than the preservation of America, pray God to help us do that which would be for the best interests and welfare of America. So, to Messrs. Morgan & Co. and their satellites, and to all the other members of the crew clamoring for war, we say introduce your declaration of war in the Congress of the United States and submit it to the test—the only test we have—of our people's representatives. Don't confuse the straight issue of war with an attempted declaration by the President alone. Don't confound it with a Presidential pronunciamento which means, if it means anything, that he will convoy ammunition and aid to Britain. Don't becloud it with the pretense of "freedom of the seas" nor by left-handed implications of repealing the Neutrality Act, all by the way forgotten and forsaken as soon as made. Let us have a straight-out determination of whether we will declare war on the Axis Powers. Let the resolution for the declaration of war be introduced by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. How better and braver it will be for those who are demanding war to present their resolution and let it be tested instead of waiting in the dark and skulking in the hope that some incident will arise upon which they could predicate such a motion. We'll meet as best we can such a resolution and pray God He'll keep war from this country.

And first, in fairness, let us examine some of the reasons on both sides. We can omit our desire to aid Britain for our people have expressed themselves upon that, always, however, with the proviso that it should be "short of war." It may be that the recent declaration of the President may be construed as blotting out "short of war," but no word has emanated from him that the phrase so often used by him, that was in the mouths of all of his supporters for many months, has been eliminated. Moreover, it was demonstrated upon the argument upon the lease-lend bill that Britain was receiving a maximum of goods and weapons from us. To give her more would denude ourselves of the most essential weapons of defense, and perhaps even Messrs. Morgan & Co. would stop short of that. The arms and essential weapons furnished Britain constitute by far the greatest proportion our industries could produce. But grant that all of the production of this country could be sent to England and our own defenses wholly denuded, we would not have a tithe of what was necessary to win. The first great obstacle to our entry into war, therefore, would be unpreparedness. Let any man who knows state the contrary and subject himself to a 5-minute cross-examination, and the correctness of this statement will be demonstrated. Now, do we want to be put to the hazard, when we are not a party to the war nor in any manner connected thereto, this great, peaceful country of ours, with all that it means? A merciful providence might continue to shower His blessings upon us and enable us to succeed by a miracle in winning such a war. Assume it to be otherwise, however, and that the aphorism of Napoleon—"That God fights on the heaviest side of the heaviest battalions", would again be proven—where would we be? The blackest picture now unjustifiably painted by the warmongers, and the little people who are crying for blood, would be pale in comparison.

Viewed from every angle, war now could be nothing more than disastrous. It is pretty to hear the head of the Government boast about what we have done in terms we do not understand, and our readiness to repel any attack from any quarter. It makes us all proud to hear him tell about our two-ocean Navy now, and that how it would, as we all know, give a good account of itself in case of war; but it is terrible to realize the fact that we have not as yet a two-ocean Navy and that it could not do what is claimed for it. We'll have a two-ocean Navy in time, but ships, like glamour, are not readily built. It will be claimed that this is a hard-headed, cold-blooded view to take of the situation, and that England is bleeding to death in the meantime; but we are doing everything that we can to help England, and no amount of boasting about what we know is not yet complete will enable us to do the job. So, what is better, to continue to help Great Britain, or to boast of our strength and our uncompleted armies, knowing their weakness and unpreparedness. No amount of wishful thinking will alter it. But until we must come to grips, it is silly, indeed a crime, for this country to gamble with its precious heritage. In the language of Dean Hutchins of the University of Chicago, "We simply will be committing suicide." This is no defeatist view, but a plain statement of facts.

In his speech on Tuesday night the President, in my opinion, first, himself, declared war, and told the terms upon which he would wage it. Secondly, he agreed that he would convoy, or otherwise take to Britain, the goods, ammunition, and guns intended for her. Again he revived what he, himself, eliminated, the doctrine of the "freedom of the seas." And, lastly, he went blithely on his way with his four freedoms and is going to enthrone them upon the whole world. How he is going to do it is a deep, dark mystery, but he speaks as if it were easy of accomplishment and gives never a thought to the agony and the anguish and bloodletting that will have to accomplish it. In all this he did not once mention the Congress of the United States. The Constitution makes the Congress, and only the Congress, the one part of our Government which can declare war. The Constitution provides clause II, section 8, article I:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to declare war * * * ."

He speaks with the confidence of a Hitler or a Mussolini in all these things, and with a certainty that puts to blush even these two braggarts. Does he feel so confident of the Congress that he can utterly disregard it? I admit that he has some cause for this feeling of supreme confidence, but let us hope when it comes to the serious matter of declaring war Congress will assert itself.

The evidence is highly preponderant that until we shall have prepared ourselves it would be folly to get into this war. Remember, we have not declared war, and war has not been declared against us. We have given ample occasions by acts that are directly designated "acts of war" to Hitler to declare war against us. If he continues to refrain he gives us a breathing spell which we must utilize in our preparation.

We have touched but faintly upon what war would mean in our present unprepared state. It is the horror, and the blood letting, the maiming and the killing of youngsters that appeal to me. I thought when the President made his Chautauqua speech that the same thoughts were impelling him to fortify his soul against war. In this I was mistaken; or, if not mistaken, the splendid pulse beats that actuated him then lasted but a brief period. Now, apparently, he is talking of war without realizing the consequences of a war where America is the principal figure and it is American blood to be shed. It is enough that war would mean the shedding of innocent blood in such fashion as we have never known before, but if this does not touch my listeners tonight, think of the material that war would cost. I shall not pile Ossa on Pelion in estimating the value of the material things; but if we have war, win or lose, we'll reach a period in our finances of inflation, or repudiation, either of which would mean financial ruin and chaos.

But there is something far greater that we'll encounter on the way. You may see it glossed over in the recent speech of the President, perhaps unwittingly, or perhaps from habit formed of power. You have seen him with a speech prepared in collaboration with an eminent friend of his, and an English playwright, as the newspapers report and of which I have no criticism. You have seen how somebody in his entourage reaches out for drama, and has all of the nations of South America represented. Sparse was the representation of our own citizens, numbering over 130,000,000. You who heard him on that occasion over the radio could measure the power and the pride with which he talked. In the excitement of the moment, or the drama that was put on, he forgot this great pulsating democracy of ours, except to say that we would never consent to accept, and would not permit a Nazi shape of things to come. Of course, we'll never accept the Nazi shape, nor permit Nazi things to come. Americans have never yet been so cowardly as to permit Nazi regime, or any other, to work its will. The President in his eloquent address told of countries Hitler has conquered and has occupied. He mentioned Tripoli, Libya in Africa, his threat of Egypt, and the Suez Canal, the Near East, and even the Indian Ocean. Are we going to fight in all these countries?

If the intention of the President was to prepare us for that sort of fight he should have said so in so many words, and the American people would have girded their loins for the fray. But there was the evident intent to frighten us with the statement that the Cape Verde Islands are only 7 hours' distance from Brazil by bomber or troop-carrying planes. They dominate shipping routes to and from the South Atlantic. And he closes on this point with the statement that "control or occupation by Nazi forces of any of the islands of the Atlantic would jeopardize the immediate safety of portions of North and South America, and of the island possessions of the United States, and of the ultimate safety of the continental United States itself." A large program he maps out for Hitler, and even a larger one for ourselves. If all of the ills that he describes should befall us, we must put forth a superhuman effort to prevent them. How many soldiers will be required? How big will our fleets have to be? The ordinary man listening to this speech will conclude that we must be prepared to send men required to meet the Nazi in Africa, in Egypt, at the Suez Canal, and the Near East, to take Dakar, the Azores, and the Cape Verde Islands, to say nothing of the war we must carry on in continental Europe for the purpose of rescuing the oppressed nations there, and above all, for the rescue of Great Britain. What a stupendous task he maps out for America. It may become necessary that we should fight nearly all of the nations of the earth, and that we should conquer them, but God forbid. And, above all, we should know, and have the right to know, if this is the program of our President.

But, what will become of our United States of America while we are pursuing these Herculean tasks. We have seen, little by little, power concentrated in one man's hands. We have soothed our perturbed spirits by pretending that those powers were needed to be thus concentrated in order to meet the crisis, but when you are meeting crises on practically all lands of every continent, what will become, the ordinary citizen will ask, of the good old United States. It is no reply to talk in generalities, and in enigmas of sacrifices that must be made. What is to become of your Government, Mr. American? Is it not plain that all this fighting on every shore, and in practically every country will mean but one thing, perhaps, the destruction of a dictatorship in other lands, but the certainty of the creation of a dictatorship in our own. You may live under a beneficent despot the rest of your days if you desire. I prefer the good old American way, and I will protest and fight to the bitter end. You cannot with this plan that apparently is mapped out for you, escape a dictatorship and perhaps worse. If ever there was a time in the history of this country when it is the duty of Americans to stand forth and be men it is now. It will soon be too late, and then the outstretched hands of liberty may no longer join yours.

The propaganda is abroad today in far greater volume than ever before. We were subject during the last war to it, and the books which have been written since by the men who were guilty of it have exposed it. The same technique, though immensely improved, has been adopted now, and every man in this country feeling an inferiority complex, and subject to the dictates of the English, is in favor of it. Not only that, but whole flocks of titled Englishmen and English women, have gone about our country lecturing and wheedling us into war. The British Ambassador himself set a bad example as openly he has gone from city to city in its behalf. Societies under all sorts of names have been formed. Where the money comes from to support all of these the ordinary citizen can only guess, but it has been spent without stint during the past 10 days. Full-page advertisements have been carried by our newspapers calling upon authoritative action and citizens to contribute. In this country I would not shut off a single one of these people because of the precious regard I have for the right of free speech, but when an invidious epithet is applied to Colonel Lindbergh, and pious Philadelphia closes its halls to him, I think that it is quite time that America cries out against this sort of thing.

Now I am fully aware that to speak this way opens me to the charge of Nazi, and, because it is viler, of being a copperhead, but some of us were made of such stuff that we won't be frightened, nor cajoled when the liberties that are ours—the sacred, personal liberties, are attacked. All of our precious civil liberties will be lost in the mad adventure and the fantastic enterprise. It is only a step now to forbid free speech in this country, and the minority of our citizens who are so enthusiastic for Britain would justify it, and perhaps the concentration camp would follow; but there are some of us who laugh at a concentration camp and who are old enough to spend the rest of their days in one laughing.

The four liberties for which the President so eloquently appealed, and which Anthony Eden so weakly reechoed, would have but a sorry chance of existence if we would march our armies from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand.

Mr. Eden must have spoken with his tongue in his cheek as he recalled India with its teeming millions, with its distress and want, or he may have recalled that the President began his campaign in this country with a note of fear. I can recall in one of his addresses with an imagination worthy of Orson Welles, the President painted the picture of cities of the Middle West being attacked by Hitler's bombs, and really, just after that speech he had the particular territory feeling rather jittery. He has since artistically preached fear, while decrying it. He has said there is nothing to fear but fear, and then, in bold lines, he has drawn the picture of fear so that our people will feel it.

Dictatorship and war together marched very early in this Government, and have led us step by step, along the dangerous road until today we can reach out and touch it, and its fury burns into our very souls. Dismayed, betrayed, we reel and stagger as we realize that the subtle plan is about to flower. The masquerade is over and we now know that God had no place amongst them. The Grecian god Pan reigns instead. We find him perched high upon their banners, pipes in hand, playing as he never played before—the great maestro. How deftly he tempers his tunes from the soothing lullabies to shrieks of groundless fear, sudden and furious, and we now awake to find our Nation facing death. And what of the warmongers? Let all of us Americans enroll. Let us form our battalions and, hand in hand, face them, and as we go forward, buoyed by the trumpets of peace, let us sing with David his Forty-sixth song. You remember this:

"He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire.

"Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth."

National-Defense Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. STOKES

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able article on our national-defense program by Richard L. Stokes, which was published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

LAGGING PRODUCTION HAMPERS ARMY-NAVY EFFORTS FOR DEFENSE—FLEET ALONE STANDS READY TO HANDLE ANY EMERGENCY—PLANES, ARTILLERY, AND MUNITIONS FAIL TO APPEAR IN QUANTITIES LARGE ENOUGH TO BRING ANY FEELING OF SECURITY

(By Richard L. Stokes)

A year ago this month Germany invaded the Low Countries and broke out upon the Atlantic coast line. Including $7,000,000,000 for lease-lend aid to Britain, a fabulous total of $44,000,000,000 has since been appropriated, authorized, or recommended in a program of national defense which ultimately will cost more than $50,000,000,000, or two and a half times the amount spent on our armed forces during the first World War.

Business corporations, on each December 31, generally publish reports of their activities during the 12 months then concluding. By analogy, the end of the first emergency year would seem a fitting moment at which to cast an account of successes won or reverses endured.

Such an appraisal is a task of no small difficulty. Speaking at Columbus, Ohio, on May 2, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT announced that "the Republican Party can serve a useful purpose by pointing out defects in the defense program as it develops, and submitting constructive suggestions as to how it may be improved." Yet, a few days ago, Senator TAFT confessed that he has found it impossible to obtain any specific factual information, either military or naval. He is compelled, declared he, to fall back upon the Federal Register, a Government publication which prints daily statements of expenditures in all departments, and upon a weekly press-agent bulletin called Defense, which is the organ of the Office for Emergency Management.

Of similar tenor is a story told of Secretary of War Stimson. Trusted Senators and Representatives are sometimes favored with secret information under pledge of confidence, while a reporter known to be reliable may learn almost anything he wishes, but "off the record." A person whose lips had been thus sealed begged Stimson to loose the bond. The request was denied. The visitor asked whether the Secretary did not think Hitler knew all about the matter in question. "Hell, no," Stimson is is said to have retorted, "Why, I, myself—it took me 6 months to find out what was going on."

REPORT ONLY TENTATIVE

In view of the plight acknowledged by men like Stimson and TAFT, the "annual report" on defense progress undertaken herewith can hope to be little more than tentative. Many of the figures given were approximations to begin with, and they change from week to week and even from day to day. It may be said, however, that all items enumerated are true, generally speaking, to the best of the writer's knowledge and belief.

The United States Navy is probably the strongest sea force in the world. It is incomparably the furthest advanced of America's defense arms. However, it shows no decisive increase of strength over that of May 1940.

The Army will attain its primary objective of 1,418,000 officers and men by June 30. But it has suffered a grievous decline of combat quality through the breaking up of professional divisions into instruction groups, scattered throughout the citizen army. The country's land forces today are half trained and half equipped. Another year will be required to forge them into effective troops.

Monthly output of military planes rose from 500 in May 1940 to a new high of 1,427 in April 1941. Yet this upward rush of production has been little reflected in Army and Navy air strength because of the diversion of aircraft to Britain and other democracies.

AIR CORPS WAITS UNTIL 1942

The Army and Navy together, during the last 12 months, were able to increase the Nation's air power by no more than 2,404 planes, including trainers. Their present combined strength is about 7,476 planes of all types. The Army Air Corps may not be ready for war on its own account before late in 1942, if then.

Out of $44,000,000,000 available for defense purposes it has been found possible to spend only $5,000,000,000 and contract for $14,020,000,000 more in orders placed.

After a year of feverish effort the United States has mustered for defense production not more than half its available resources of man-hours and machines. During the first 4 months of 1941 alone some 10,000,000 man-days were lost through strikes in defense industries.

ORGANIZATION LACKS HEAD

The end of the first emergency year finds the defense organization still without a head. During this period the National Defense Advisory Commission faded from the scene. Its successor, the Office of Production Management, is now swamped among 10 other groups of equal rank. A third candidate for leadership, the Office for Emergency Management, is not a policymaking but an administrative body.

Confusion of purpose and irresolution of policy in the highest quarters are held to be deep-seated maladies of the defense program. There exists as yet no omnipotent executive body such as the War Industries Board which President Wilson set up in 1918 under the chairmanship of Bernard M. Baruch.

Mr. Roosevelt has not sought legislation enabling him to vest in defense agencies control of vital implements like transportation which is still in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and like oil and coal, which continue to be administered by the Department of Commerce.

It should be stated in fairness that May 24 is perhaps an unfortunate date for the proposed reckoning. At this time many strategic operations are on the verge of coming into full activity. Admission is freely made that the story might differ in marked respects if the telling were delayed 4 or 5 months.

Taken into account are the circumstances that, except for the Navy, our defense program started not far beyond zero, and that a vast undertaking has been set afoot with at least the beginnings of energy and dispatch.

Those who gaze on the program's point of departure exclaim that miracles have been wrought. Others, with eyes fixed on the world crisis and its volcanic ascent, give way to consternation.

The year's progress may gain relief if placed against a background of the Nation's ultimate defense objectives, which, of course, were not to be completed but were initiated during the opening 12 months. They can be described only in grandiose terms. Contemplated is a two-ocean navy greater than history has yet beheld and capable of imposing its will throughout the seven seas; a navy of 3,500,000 tons, consisting of 32 battleships, 18 aircraft carriers, 91 light and heavy cruisers, 365 destroyers, 185 submarines, 15,000 planes, and 17,000 pilots; a navy to cost, with shore facilities and equipment, far in excess of $10,000,000,000.

Projected also was an army of 1,418,000 to start, with a possible increase to 4,000,000; an army profusely equipped with the most modern appliances and trained to the minute; an army to have at its maximum 10 armored divisions, 65,000 planes, 130,000 airplane engines, 17,000 heavy guns, 25,000 light guns, 13,000 trench mortars, 9,200 tanks, 33,000,000 loaded shells, 300,000 machine guns, 400,000 semiautomatic rifles, 1,300,000 single-shot rifles, and 210 camps and cantonments; an army, in short, to cost something like $40,000,000,000.

NAVY READY TO FIGHT

Alone among American defense arms, the Navy is prepared at this moment to embark on modern warfare with a good chance of success. According to a recent report of Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, it is "probably the strongest single sea force in the world."

Counting two new battleships not yet with the fleet, the United States at present could throw into war 17 capial ships, 6 aircraft carriers, 37 light and heavy cruisers, 165 destroyers, 109 submarines, and approximately 2,000 tactical planes. The personnel on May 1 was 249,727 as against 150,592 on June 30, 1940.

Despite all hullabaloo over a two-ocean navy, for which Congress has approved or authorized a total of $7,583,694,783, only a few keels of the proposed super-armada have yet been laid. From earlier programs derived all accessions of combatant strength delivered to the fleet during the last year. They comprised exactly 1 cruiser. 1 airplane carrier, 15 submarines, and 49 destroyers. But two 35,000-ton battleships, luckily begun 4 years ago and recently commissioned, are to join the line in July and August or September.

DEPLETED BY TRANSFERS

Owing partly to transfers of destroyers and small craft to Britain, the American Navy entered the second year of emergency with only 43 more ships, including auxiliaries, than it possessed when the Germans smashed through to the Channel ports and placed England's control of the Atlantic in jeopardy for the first time in centuries. Contracts have only now been let for 40 modern destroyers to replace 50 old ones traded to Britain. The new boats will be commissioned about the end of 1942.

Actually under construction at shipyards are 66 out of 360 combat and 104 auxiliary ships currently on order. In addition, 260 vessels are technically under construction, meaning that plans are being drawn or parts manufactured. Competing for the country's limited shipways are 661 seagoing commercial vessels.

It is generally accepted that American naval aviation is without a peer in quality, though the quantity leaves much to be desired. Unlike the Army, which for 15 years has vacillated between air- and liquid-cooled motors, the Navy has consistently supported the former, with the result that it has developed in the Vought XF4U–1 a heavy, long-range fighter which has been declared by Rear Admiral Towers, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, to be America's fastest airplane.

The Navy has elaborated three main types of aircraft known as land and pontoon planes and flying boats. The first comprise dive bombers and pursuit craft, including an extremely fast seagoing fighter engined with a 2,000-horsepower motor, which is thought to be a naval type unmatched anywhere.

The flying boats are long-range patrol and bombing craft. About 300 are now in service, while 590 others remain at the stage of being on order. A few of those in use, with deliveries that began last fall, have a maximum range of 5,000 miles without bomb loads or can fly 1,000 miles with 4 tons of explosives and return unloaded. Most of the 300 can fly 3,000 miles nonstop, or 1,000 miles with 2 tons of bombs and back empty to base.

Though intensive efforts have been made, the Navy during the year has achieved only a start toward its objective of 15,000 planes and 17,000 pilots. Between July 1, 1940, and May 1, 1941, according to a statement last week by Secretary Knox, the total of naval planes of all types on hand increased 1,304, from 2,172 to 3,476. However, deliveries multiplied more than tenfold in the first 4 months of this year over those in the corresponding period last year. The respective figures are 79 and 996.

The increase of naval pilots has been something like 1,340, from 2,900 on May 23, 1940, to approximately 4,240 on May 1, 1941. During the last 10 months the student entry rate for pilot training mounted from 100 to 500 a month and is expected to reach 800 in July.

Three-fifths of current deliveries are trainers, which add no immediate support to the fighting forces. Tremendous demands on the aircraft industry by the Army and Great Britain make it problematic whether the Navy's air-expansion schedules for 1941 can be met. These call for a net gain of 3,710 planes during the year, bringing the number to about 6,300 on January 1, 1942. During 1941 the hope is to raise the total of Navy pilots to 5,993.

Notwithstanding months of triumphant publicity over the lease of eight operating bases in the Atlantic and Caribbean, the Navy possesses as yet no prime outpost in the Atlantic and is compelled to base itself on three continental establishments along the East coast—at Boston, New York, and Norfolk.

In the Atlantic, at present a chief danger spot, is a fleet of some 125 vessels, including several modern cruisers, two aircraft carriers, and a number of destroyers and submarines. It is built around the Navy's 3 oldest battleships—New York, Arkansas, and Texas, none of them capable of standing in the first line—and the semidemilitarized training ship Wyoming.

The Asiatic Fleet, based on the Philippines, our outpost nearest Japan, has not been strengthened during the year. It still consists, apparently, of about 25 cruisers, with destroyers and submarines, as well as a minor force of patrol planes. Regarding Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, anchorage of the country's main sea force, naval officers have complained to congressional committees that the channel at the entrance is so narrow that one big ship, scuttled at the right spot, could bottle up the entire Pacific Fleet.

The six aircraft carriers now in commission consist of the Lexington and Saratoga, converted 33,000-ton cruisers, fast but aging, and too unwieldly for successful operation; the 14,700-ton Ranger and Wasp, small, slow, and weakly armed, and two modern vessels, Yorktown and Enterprise, with a speed of more than 30 knots and displacement of 20,000 tons each.

No fortification or armament has begun as yet on the bases covering our Hawaiian front, namely, Samoa, Guam, and Wake, Midway, Palmyra, Johnson, and Canton Islands. Personnel of the naval station at Tutuila, Samoa, is currently 857. The only expenditures at Guam, about $4,000,000, are for the purpose of making its harbor safe for naval and particularly commercial aircraft.

SUDDEN NEED FOR AUXILIARIES

Between the end of the first World War and 1938 no auxiliary ships were built for the Navy. In 1940 there rose a sudden need for large numbers of repair ships, tenders for destroyers, submarines, and aircraft troop transports, cargo, store, ammunition, and hospital ships, tankers, ocean tugs, fleet mine sweepers and mine layers, net layers, and antiaircraft vessels.

Today there are in service only 175 of these auxiliaries, while 85 major auxiliary craft are under construction. The Navy has purchased from the Maritime Commission 48 commercial ships, including 12 tankers capable of carrying 72,000,000 gallons of oil at 19 knots.

In case of operations this summer against Atlantic outposts such as Martinique, the Azores, or Dakar, the spearhead would be the Marine Corps, a body with high and ancient traditions of valor. Though normally stationed ashore, it is an integral part of the Navy. It is a composite force of all arms—infantry, artillery, tanks, aviation, antiaircraft batteries, engineers, and signal and chemical troops.

Its personnel is fixed by law at one-fifth of the Navy's authorized enlisted strength. The 19,000 marines of June 30, 1940, have grown to more than 45,000 at present, including mobilized reservists. In line with the modern aim of multiplying fire power, the corps has abandoned its historic brigade formation and reorganized on a basis of two divisions of the Army's new triangular type. Each is to consist ultimately of 14,000 men and an air wing of 307 operating planes. There are also six battalions of 750 men each, heavily armed with artillery and machine guns. Their function is the defense of naval bases.

For fresh equipment needed, including 72 field guns, 78 tanks and aviation matériel, the two marine divisions are short in the sum of $40,000,000, only now being placed on order.

ARMY MEETS OBJECTIVE

When the defense effort started a year ago, the Regular Army consisted of 243,500 officers and men. Through federalization of the National Guard and the Selective Service Act, the Army consists today of about 1,324,800 officers and men, and is expected easily to meet its first objective of 1,418,000 by the end of June.

The 6 divisions of 12 months ago—5 infantry and 1 cavalry—have grown to 30, including 27 of infantry, 1 of cavalry, and 2 armored divisions. In process of organization are a second cavalry division and 2 other armored ones.

Despite this impressive expansion, Secretary Stimson himself announced in a recent address that "at least a year will pass before we can have an Army and air force adequate to meet the air and ground forces which could be brought against us." It is generally agreed that the Army, as it now stands, is only half-armed and half-equipped.

In two respects—Garand rifles and machine guns—the Army is far ahead of schedule; in fact, the first stage of its program of semiautomatic rifles is now virtually completed. Four new machine-gun plants will be in operation by July. But grave misgivings are possible as to field artillery, antiaircraft and antitank guns, aviation, and tanks.

USING 1917 WEAPONS

For field artillery it seems probable that for months or years to come the Army will be obliged to depend chiefly on weapons inherited from the first World War. These included a few monster 240-millimeter howitzers, about 1,000 155-millimeter Schneider howitzers, a number of 75-millimeter howitzers, and something like 7,000 French 75-millimeter field guns. The number of the last has been depleted in a measure undisclosed by batteries sent to England to replace equipment lost in the retreat from Belgium and France.

The larger howitzers, provided with motor mounts, are still effective weapons. The 75-millimeter field guns have undergone an expensive process, in which their firing mechanism was modernized and their wooden wheels were replaced with rubber tires. But this famous weapon, relied on by the French to stop the German armored advance, failed utterly at its task, and is now regarded as hopelessly outmoded. The Army has decided to use it as armament for medium tanks. Only a few sample vehicles have been thus equipped. Before it can be installed on a large scale the 75, as a tank constituent, may well become obsolete against new processes of hardening steel, and particularly against cannon of larger caliber now being used in armored vehicles abroad.

In Poland, toward the end of 1939, the Germans appeared with a novel 105-mm. howitzer. Its range was less than that of the 75, but it threw a heavier charge. With a high trajectory, it was designed to fire over obstacles like hills and drop projectiles on troops, artillery or tanks sheltered behind them.

For reasons mysterious to some observers, the Army decided also to develop a 155-mm. field gun with flat trajectory. The first of these was delivered May 15. With a weight of 30,000 pounds, it rides on 8 pneumatic tires and can average 30 miles an hour behind a tractor. It is expected to reach a production of 2 a week by the fall of 1942. At that rate, the program of 400 of these weapons would be completed in the summer of 1946.

The principal antitank gun at present is a 37-millimeter model which the Germans released 2 years ago because they had developed a better weapon. The Army needs at least 6,500, but the current output is only 12 a month. The 37 is ineffective against heavy tanks, will stop a medium tank up to 800 or 1,000 yards and is deadly against light tanks.

TANK PRODUCTION

With light tanks now rolling off the assembly line at a rate of 15 or more a day, difficulties are regarded as ended with respect to these 13-ton vehicles. They are armed with 37-millimeter cannon and machine guns. The latter wreak havoc against unprotected troops, but are unable to penetrate the armor even of another light tank. Out of 5 manufacturers with contracts for 26-ton medium tanks, 3 have only just finished their first models.

The new $20,000,000 Chrysler plant expects to begin turning out 10 medium tanks a day in August. The Army's program for this type at present is 1,800 vehicles. The German heavy tank is said to weigh 80 tons. The first American 60-ton tank is expected to enter production next fall and reach quantity deliveries 9 months later.

While the Navy uses 5-inch antiaircraft cannon, such weapons of this category as the Army possesses are almost exclusively 3-inch guns, ineffective above 20,000 feet. After prolonged thought and labor, the Ordnance Department brought forth a 90-mm. antiaircraft cannon, of which today there are only four experimental samples in existence. It cannot attain quantity output for another year.

The Army also desires 6,200 or more 37-mm. automatic antiaircraft cannon, for use against low-flying planes. Current production is 20 a month. More than a year ago it was discovered that both Allied and Axis planes were using 20-mm. automatic cannon in addition to machine guns. The first weapon of this style ever made in the United States was delivered May 16, 1941. Quantity production is promised for next fall.

BOMBER OUTPUT LAGS

On May 12 Maj. Gen. Henry H. Arnold, deputy chief of staff for air, announced that the country's output of military planes in April was 1,427. It is believed that 60 percent were tactical planes and 40 percent trainers. Out of every 10, 7 were exported, chiefly to Britain. General Arnold's figure is thought to conceal the fact that production of heavy bombers is lagging, with an output of between 50 and 60 a month. These powerful ships, in great numbers, are held to be a vital necessity to both the United States and Great Britain.

A year ago the Army Air Corps had 3,322 pilots and 1,894 cadets in training. Today it has almost 10,000 pilots, a gain of about 6,778, while 15,000 cadets are under instruction. But during the same period its complement of planes of all types increased only 1,100—from 2,900 to about 4,000.

With resonant publicity, the Air Corps has announced a program of 30,000 pilots to be trained each year. But the first graduates of its 7,000-a-year program of last October will not begin to come out till next month. The initial class of its second program of 12,000 pilots a year began instruction in March, and will be graduated next November.

AIR VERSUS LIQUID COOLING

Aviation progress in the Army has been handicapped by a long and bitter controversy over the merits of liquid- and air-cooled motors. The latter develop greater horsepower for each pound of weight. The former lend themselves to perfect streamlining, but their plumbing apparatus is held to be more vulnerable to enemy fire than a self-sealing gasoline tank.

The Allison division of General Motors hopes to be turning out 1,000 airplane engines a month by the end of this year. The Buick and Studebaker plants, with contracts for aviation motors, cannot begin production earlier than the summer of 1942. The Packard and Ford factories are to be ready this July or August.

Secretary Stimson declared not long ago that only 650 out of 4,000 planes in the Air Corps were of first-line quality, and that none was up to battle standards of the second World War. A report reaching the writer is that an early type of flying fortress, the B-16, is used in heavy bombing instruction; and that the Army's best fighting planes, numbering 309, have a speed of perhaps 350 miles an hour, 1 machine gun each and 1 small-caliber cannon.

MUNITIONS FOR MONTH

Regarding munitions, the Army is said to have enough on hand to fight on the modern scale for about a month. According to rumor, the quantity now in the Canal Zone is insufficient to sustain barrage fire longer than an hour. Construction of munition plants is ahead of schedule, but in this respect it will be next spring before we see the light of day.

An Appeal for Mediation To Save Civilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. LOUIS LUDLOW, OF INDIANA, WEDNESDAY, MAY 28, 1941

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, with America on the verge of war, there is Nation-wide interest in a resolution I have introduced proposing that Congress request the President to arrange to offer the services of the 21 republics of the Western Hemisphere as a mediator to end the war.

I wish to read to the House supporting telegrams I have received from two of the world's greatest churchmen. One is from Cardinal William H. O'Connell, beloved and revered leader of the Catholic Church. It reads as follows:

BRIGHTON, MASS., May 22, 1941.

Congressman LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Read your letter and enclosures with deep interest. There is no doubt in my mind that the American people desire a cessation of this stupid and brutal war, and I may add that no one can doubt their desire to keep out of the conflict.

Cardinal O'CONNELL.

The other telegram is from Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the Riverside Church, New York City. It is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 26, 1941.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

I strongly commend your resolution to promote peace by calling a conference of the American republics to offer the nations now at war the services of the Western Hemisphere as a mediator. This is the only hopeful and constructive way I see out of the present crisis.

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK.

I personally believe that events have now taken such a shape that the President of our country has it within his power, through mediation proceedings, to bring peace to heartbroken humanity, and that by appealing, if necessary, to the people of the belligerent countries over the heads of the dictators he can induce all warring nations to agree to a peace formula based on Secretary Hull's five points and fashioned in the mold of justice, which alone can insure permanent peace to the world.

I believe that in the present posture of the war and the world's affairs our President is confronted with potentialities of service to mankind greater than ever came to any man in the history of the world and beyond all human calculation. These potentialities can be realized only by asserting leadership for peace. If he can do these things, the world will lay its garlands at his feet and he will be entitled to a monument higher than the Himalaya Mountains as humanity's greatest benefactor.

By unanimous consent of the House, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address I delivered on this subject Wednesday night, May 28, over the network of the Columbia Broadcasting System. It is as follows:

THE PEACE SIDE

My subject tonight is the Peace Side. One of the beautiful things about our form of government is that all sides may be heard in the forum of debate. I realize that by choosing this subject I shall not add to my popularity among those who are thinking more in terms of war than in terms of peace. I am not a pacifist as that term is opprobriously misapplied. I believe in building up our national defense so impregnably that no aggressor nation, nor any combination of aggressor nations, would ever dare attack us. And I believe, as I think all true Americans believe, that we should fight to the last dollar of our resources and the last drop of our blood to defend our priceless heritage of free government if ever we are attacked. Though there are many worthy antiwar committees and organizations I am not a member of any of them. I may identify myself as an independent, individual crusader for peace. If the resolution for a referendum on foreign wars, which I first introduced in 1935 and which I pressed to a vote in the House in 1938 had been adopted, there would not now be so much uneasiness throughout the country among the countless thousands who are living in constant dread that events will drag us into Europe's never-ending wars and they can do nothing about it.

With so much war hysteria in the air and so much war propaganda confusing public thought, a voice for peace may seem like a voice crying in the wilderness. Yet I know there are millions upon millions of the common folks whose ears and hearts are attuned to peace and who will hear the peace side gladly.

Governments want war and peoples want peace. This is the universal rule of history and I have no doubt it is true this very night that the people of every land are yearning for peace. For the people all around the earth are weary of war. They are weary of its appalling destruction; weary of its suffering and heartbreaks; weary of the pain it puts in the hearts of mothers. Woodrow Wilson, the scholar, spoke in harmony with the eternal verities when he said:

"I have known of governments making war on governments, but I never knew of peoples making war on peoples."

I wonder whether, through all the maze of propaganda, the common people of America, the plain, ordinary, God-loving people, are not seeing the war situation more clearly than the war inciters. They read of German atrocities in England, the brutal bombing of women and children, the destruction of monumental buildings, hoary with antiquity and entwined throughout the centuries with the dearest affections and memories of the British nation, and then the kaleidoscope changes and in the mountain passes of the Balkans they see dead German boys piled high in windrows, some of them mere children. War is not pretty on any of its fronts. As this potpourri of grief and woe flows to our people, hour after hour, over the radio, many of them are thinking how much grander is the word "love" than the word "hate." A common expression is "Oh, God, can such things be?" Probably many are recalling the deathless sayings they were taught at the feet of a Christian mother:

"Thou shalt not kill."

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The typical good honest American citizen hears the heart-rending news from the hells of Europe, Africa, and Asia, and thanks God for America. He has never become indoctrinated with the foreign poisons and ideologies that murder democracy and enslave the human spirit. He lives above the miasmas of hate. The more he sees of the foreign picture the more he thinks of America. He loves his family and his church and his neighborhood, and he appreciates the opportunity which his children enjoy under the American flag to grow and bloom. He is at his very best when the ties of home begin to press and strain against his heart. He craves no part in Europe's endless wars. He is for America first, last, and all the time. He has a great, consuming pity for the victims of man's inhumanity to man, but he does not choose to risk his heaven by involvement in foreign complications.

The heart of the world has bled long enough. It is time to stanch the flow, and I intend, in this brief address, to propose a plan whereby I think it might be possible to bring this war madness to an end under the leadership of our great Christian nation. With that thought in mind I have introduced a resolution (House Concurrent Resolution No. 20), which proposes that with the President of the United States as the leader, the 21 republics of the Western Hemisphere shall be requested to offer their services as a mediator to settle the troubles of the Old World, out of whose loins the New World sprang. My resolution is pending before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Its text is as follows:

"Whereas it is the overwhelming desire of the American people that the United States shall remain at peace with the world and free from foreign entanglements, while it faithfully performs its duties as a good neighbor; and

"Whereas if the world ever needed a peacemaker it needs one now; and

"Whereas with war engulfing a large portion of the globe and threatening to draw other nations into its vortex, there is a real opportunity for the United States to demonstrate its sincerity as a good neighbor by assuming the role of a peacemaker; and

"Whereas there is a possibility, faint though it may be, that the New World under the leadership of the United States, might be the means of freeing the Old World from the miseries of war and reestablishing peace and tranquillity on earth: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that the President shall be requested to invite the American republics to send delegates to a conference to be held at the earliest practicable date in the city of Washington to offer to the nations now at war the services of the Western Hemisphere as a mediator, to the end that the blessings of peace may be brought to a distraught world.

"SEC. 2. This concurrent resolution shall be known as the peace resolution of 1941."

I believe the best thing that could happen to the world now would be successful mediation to stop the war, to be followed by reconstruction on a basis of fundamental justice.

Happily, Secretary of State Hull, the friend and idol of the American republics, in his recently enunciated five points, has presented to the world a splendid foundation for postwar reconstruction, based on fundamental justice. Secretary Hull's program of peace aims shines like a great beacon light to guide a weary world. From his five points justice holds forth its radiant promise for final peace in a war-torn world, as follows:

"1. Extreme nationalism must not be permitted to express itself in excessive trade restrictions.

"2. Nondiscrimination in international commercial relations must be the rule, so that international trade may grow and prosper.

"3. Raw material supplies must be available to all nations, without discrimination.

"4. International agreements regulating the supply of commodities must be so handled as to protect fully the interests of the consuming countries and their people.

"5. The institutions and arrangements of international finance must be so set up that they lend aid to the essential enterprises and the continuous development of all countries and permit the payment through processes of trade consonant with the welfare of all countries."

In his statement of peace aims Secretary Hull caught and put on paper the vision of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the great American democracy. It is a vision of God, the Architect, the loving Father of us all, creating a cosmic commonwealth of infinite beauty and making it ready for His children. Vast, fertile plains to yield the things that sustain life, great rivers that flow in majesty to the seas, cascades that dance and sparkle in the sunlight, mountain slopes that rise in towering grandeur to the very feet of the Creator. Vineyards and orange groves, and the sunshine and the shadow chasing each other over waving fields of wheat and corn. In the depths of the earth God deposited untold billions of tons of coal to warm the human family, in the waterfalls he placed power without limit to drive the wheels of commerce. All things that make for prosperity, welfare, and happiness of the human race are embraced in God's gift to man on the morning of creation.

The Creator of this beautiful world made plenteous provision to sustain the lives of all the millions that might ever inhabit it. There is enough land lying uncultivated and fallow to support all human beings on the earth, if they would but forget their hatreds, put down their guns, and go to work. When the present cataclysm is over there must inevitably be a large-scale readjustment that will take into consideration the economic needs of the entire human family.

With wisdom and vision that cannot be challenged, Secretary Hull has recognized this fact, and has offered a basis for world readjustment on which it would be possible, with some additions and elaborations, perhaps, to create a new world of mutual respect and peaceful relations out of the ashes of the present conflict.

But his plan, ideal as it is, is not self-operating. Something must be done to start it. My suggestion is that Congress should adopt my peace resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 20, and then, backed by the 21 American republics, the President should offer Secretary Hull's five points to the warring nations as a tentative basis on which they can get together and stop the war.

The success of such a move is heightened by the love for Secretary Hull which exists throughout the entire Western Hemisphere. Very properly one of the cardinal aims of our foreign policy has been to solidify the Western Hemisphere, and if I am a judge we could bind the American republics closer than ever to us if we were to make them our happy partners in a sincere effort to bring peace to the world. They would be delighted to cooperate with us in such a significant humanitarian movement.

The time to mediate is now, before we get dragged into war, and the one man in the whole world to initiate mediation proceedings is the President of the United States.

Mediation would not be a new role for us. Over 35 years ago another Roosevelt—Theodore—proposed mediation which brought to an end the Russo-Japanese War, saving untold numbers of lives and incalculable property damage.

We are friends of England and she has our deep sympathy, and we abhor Hitlerism and all its stands for, but we will render her and the world a disservice if we encourage a continuation of the war. In my opinion neither side is going to win in this war. Hitler cannot invade England and the British cannot invade the Continent. If the war continues it will settle down into a long stalemate, each side trying to wear the other down by attrition and only the Lord knows how long the saturnalia of death and destruction will continue. If we get sucked into it Japan and France and probably Russia will join the Axis against us and American boys not yet born will be on the firing line before the war is over. The America we have known, the land in which the rights of the citizen have always been exalted above the military will disappear and our country will become a vast armed camp.

My resolution was introduced on February 27 last and I could fill many pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with letters and telegrams I have received in support of it. One California group has started out to secure a million signatures to petitions urging its passage. Many of the great minds of the church, bewildered but seeking as always to keep contact with the hand of God, are giving the resolution their solicitious attention. I have before me a telegram I have just received from Cardinal O'Connell, that grand old man of the Catholic Church, saying:

"There is no doubt in my mind that the American people desire a cessation of this stupid and brutal war, and I may add that no one can doubt their desire to keep out of this conflict."

I have also just received a telegram from another great religious leader, Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the Riverside Church of New York City. He says:

"I strongly commend your resolution to promote peace by calling a conference of the American republics to offer the nations now at war the services of the Western Hemisphere as a mediator. This is the only hopeful and constructive way I see out of the present crisis."

What I am suggesting now is that the time has come when the people of America should take a hand toward bringing about peace in the world. After all, it is the people who have to suffer and die in war. After all, it is the people who have to bear the burdens and the costs and the unspeakable griefs of war. It is a people's question. The President is entitled to know how you, the people, feel about it.

Though the referendum on overseas wars was defeated, there is in this country, founded on popular rule, a way still left open by which the people may express themselves on the war situation and that is through the right of petition. Let the people of America be sufficiently alert in exercising this fundamental and inalienable right and they can have a determining influence toward ending the war. By so doing they will encourage the peoples of the dictator countries, who have no right of petition, to overthrow their governments and end the mad orgie of bloodshed and slaughter. It costs only 1 cent to send a postal card, 3 cents to send a letter, and a moderate sum to send a telegram. If ever the cost of a telegram was justified, that time is now. Hundreds of people have written to me in anguish, saying:

"I want to help the cause of peace, but I feel so helpless. What can I do?"

This is my answer: Every person in America can help in the cause of peace if (1) he will write or wire to his Congressman and to the Senators from his State urging the adoption of House Concurrent Resolution 20, the Ludlow peace resolution, and (2) if he will not stop with one effort but will keep on writing and wiring, and (3) if he will write to a dozen or more of his friends and neighbors, asking them to petition their Members of Congress to support the resolution.

This outlines the mechanics by which the force of public opinion can be marshaled in a supreme effort to assist in terminating the age of butchery and bringing about the peace of the world. The resolution I have introduced will remain in a musty pigeonhole forever unless it is brought out of committee by the aroused force of public opinion. I hope those who hear me will lose no time in sending their appeals to their Representatives and Senators, for the situation is acute, and this is not a matter of local and transient interest, but of vital importance to the entire human race. Your action in this direction will help to counteract the terrific pressures that are being exerted to force the President into war. The world is crying for America's leadership in the cause of peace.

High among the snow-crowned Andes Mountains the face of Christ shines in the bright sunlight. To my imaginative mind, the heroic statue of the Prince of Peace, on the borderland between Chile and Argentina, sends out on the ether waves of love and friendship its mute appeal for the mediation resolution I have introduced. That statue is deeply rooted in the sentiment of the American republics, because it was erected by the two nations to celebrate an accord that was reached after long and intense bitterness. It stands in towering majesty on a spot 13,000 feet high. It can be seen for a hundred miles and all who come near it are enthralled by its beauty and grandeur. The story of the Christ of the Andes has been told many times, but to a world stricken with war, or living in constant fear of war, it cannot be told too often. The statue bears this inscription:

"These mountains must crumble to dust before the Argentines and the Chileans shall break the peace which they have sworn to maintain at the feet of Christ, the Redeemer."

Would it not be a grand thing if the moving hand of history were to write into the record of civilization this memorandum:

"In the year 1941 a great Christian President of the United States, with the assistance of the 21 American republics, brought a warring world to the feet of Christ, the Redeemer."

Is it not worth trying?

Stopping Hitlerism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. KENNETH McKELLAR, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interview published in the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., soon after the President delivered his recent broadcast. This interview was given by my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who has been quite ill, but who is rapidly recovering, and has recovered to such an extent that he can comment belligerently upon the affairs of the world. I ask that the interview be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Memphis Commercial Appeal]

ONLY UNITED STATES CAN STOP HITLERISM, MCKELLAR SAYS, ENDORSING F. D. R.

The United States is the only power on earth that can stop Hitlerism "and the sooner we realize it and take steps to stop him the better it will be for our country and for the world," Senator MCKELLAR said yesterday in fully endorsing President Roosevelt's radio address of Tuesday night.

The Senator also scored loss of defense production by strike and urged the settlement of such strikes through tribunals set up by the Government.

NEED FOR GREATER AID

"Defense production must not be held up for a moment by these differences between employer and employees," said Senator MCKELLAR in discussing ways of bringing about greater aid for Britain.

Recently released from the hospital, where he underwent a major operation, the Senator is recuperating at the home of his brother, H. C. McKellar. He has been a staunch supporter of the administration's aid-to-Britain program, and prior to his leaving the hospital stressed the need for actual deliveries of goods to Britain.

"President Roosevelt, in his characteristic and matchless style and voice, last night gave an accurate and vivid history of the present war and America's tremendous interest and peril in the outcome of it. I agree fully with his facts as recited and just as fully with his conclusions as to our duty as a Nation at this time," said the Senator.

"As I recall, the Congress, and I believe the American people, were practically all a unit in giving our aid to England last year, and the greatest difficulty was as to the nature and extent of the aid. We have already spent billions, and are continuing to spend more billions of American money in manufacturing guns, tanks, airplanes, and other war materials for her, much of which will be a silly and useless gesture unless we deliver these materials promptly to her as soon as manufactured.

"RECALLS SENATE SPEECH

"If she cannot provide safe transportation of these materials across the Atlantic, we must deliver them to her. I recall I made a speech in the Senate last January favoring delivery of these materials to England by America if she could not get them otherwise, and I am still of the same mind. To leave them here unused would make us a laughing stock and might cause England and eventually ourselves to lose to Hitlerism.

"If Hitler is not stopped and continues to succeed in his mad designs of world conquest, he will, of course, eventually attack America, and destroy our free institutions and take away our precious liberties. As I look at it, we are the only power on earth that can stop him, and the sooner we realize it and take steps to stop him, the better it will be for our country and for the world."

"The greatest loser in this country by the success of Hitler and Hitlerism will be labor, which he has uniformly enslaved. In this country labor has reached its highest success, and I would hate to see it lose the gains it has made. The next greatest loser will be capital, which his new order destroyed. It would seem, therefore, that these two interests in America would be the first to realize their danger of Hitlerism.

"STRIKES MUST STOP

"I, therefore, as a friend of labor, join the President in urging the uninterrupted production of ships and other war materials. Strikes in plants making defense materials must stop. Differences between employer and employee must be settled not by stopping work, but by tribunals set up by the Government, or all will be lost. Defense production must not be held up for a moment by these differences between employer and employee, which differences must be settled by establishing governmental agencies.

"Again I say I talk as a friend of labor and, of course, I believe in the capital system.

"I am in the fullest accord with the President's address and his plan, and I hope I may soon be well enough to return to Washington and give him every aid I possibly can."

On Our Way, Where?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY ALF M. LANDON

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the commencement address delivered by Hon. Alf M. Landon, former Governor of Kansas, at Simpson College, Indianola, Iowa, on June 2, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Because this is one of the memorable days in your lives and the lives of your fathers and mothers, I deeply appreciate the honor you do me in asking me to make the graduation address at Simpson College.

In these earth-shaking times you will not expect from me mere pleasantries. Such occasions as this fail of their purpose if they do not contribute to the better understanding of the realities confronting us. And there is probably little time left for such speeches.

Tuesday night it appeared that the great debate on war or peace now was closed. That the proclamation of unlimited national emergency in connection with the President's speech meant the time had come for us to close ranks behind the President, as we always do when facing a foreign foe.

Today, after reading the reports of the Presidential press conference following his speech, a press conference which was announced for the purpose of clarifying the speech, it is clear that the President himself has not made up his mind. As long as expert White House reporters are debating what he meant in his speech and in his press conference the next day, the issue can still be debated. Therefore, the debate is still open.

The President can lead me into closed ranks, but he cannot hint me there, or scare me into them. This is not mere oratory on my part. I supported his vigorous and forthright statements when the flag was fired on at the sinking of the Panay and at a time when some of those who are now shouting for war were shouting for the Ludlow resolution.

The best-trained reporters cannot agree as to the meaning of the President's speech and the meaning of what he said in the press conference the next day in relation to it. Therefore the country must reach the conclusion the President still believes we can help England in ways that will not involve us in war. The country must also reach the conclusion that the war party in America is trying to read into the President's speech actions that are not there. Their attempt to give the country "the rush act" is revealed in many instances of overstatement and the twist of the adjective in attempting to analyze the President's beautiful prose.

Long ago I considered all the possibilities of a Hitler victory. I considered living in a regimented world his victories might require, for a while.

Frank Knox and I went all over these tragic possibilities, and others, and their danger to our country, in several conversations ending just about a year ago today. He reached one conclusion; I another. And apparently the President does not yet share Secretary Knox's views of what should be done.

Never once have I wavered in my belief that we should arm to the teeth but stay out of armed participation in this European war. Having considered all the possibilities that have happened, I have not been stampeded by their occurrence. I refuse to get the cart before the horse.

Before we go a step further we should know the actual status of our national-defense equipment. To send men into the field untrained and unaccustomed to their equipment is sheer murder. I, for one, want to know how much training our men are receiving with the equipment they will use in actual combat, if engaged in combat.

Before we talk about getting into war, and talk about carrying the four freedoms to all the world, let us know whether we have got something to fight with, and if we have not got it, when are we going to get it? This is all important to me. That use of the words "potential strength" in the President's chat sounded disturbingly reminiscent of "on hand and on order."

Then there is something else, all important also, that is not being discussed. We don't know whether the English policies, when victory comes, will be the old imperialism balance of power that tolerates no other nation in the world, or whether her policy is to be one of reconciliation, or of repression. It was neither after the World War.

I don't think you can put a mighty people like the Germans into shackles permanently. Yet some of the English Cabinet Members' speeches indicate that line of thought. I have not seen any authoritative enthusiastic reaction from the English to Secretary Hull's tangible and constructive four points recently "offering a broad program of world economic reconstruction." In fact, the implication of their silence would indicate disagreement.

The Engish send their idealists over here, like Lord Halifax, but when we sit down around the treaty table we always find a lot of hard-boiled realistic traders, who want to eat their cake and have it too. So before we go into partnership with them, with every prospect of carrying the big end of the load, let us understand all the facts. Not only of what we are going to fight with, but what we are going to fight for. And as far as I am concerned, I want something more tangible than the four freedoms, and something more satisfactory than we have received from the English so far, in statement of their policy.

So long as we are simply helping England with material aid, we have no right to ask her establish a new order, we have a right first to state her terms. But if we are going into partnership with her to save the world and to know her policies, and on what terms she will make peace.

Of course, as I have said many times, we cannot live upon a high plateau aloof from the rest of the world. Of course, the world is made smaller by the airplane, and of course war has been revolutionized by the airplane. But all this does not completely eliminate geography.

One of the all important things for us, that we hear little if anything about these days, is the situation in South America.

Now Dakar—Dakar, Africa—is picked as the jumping off place to Brazil for the Nazi invasion of the Western Hemisphere. Well, Dakar, Africa, is French territory at the present. But, waiving that, get down your maps and figure out how far Dakar, in Africa, is from the real base of operations, Germany. There isn't a military or naval expert in the United States that will challenge the statement that the real base of operations is in Germany. Consider then the distance from Germany to Dakar, in Africa. Consider the woefully inadequate transportation facilities, the enormous quantities of equipment, munitions, guns, food, and men that would have to be transported from Germany to Dakar—Dakar, Africa—before they were even started for Brazil. For even though the airplane has revolutionized warfare, it has not eliminated the doughboys. And all this material and all the ships and all these millions of men would have to be assembled in Dakar, Africa, 4,000 miles from their base of operations in Germany. And still 1,600 sea miles further to go, to their objective in Brazil.

And what about our good and powerful friend Brazil? What are we doing to reach an understanding with her? If there is this mutual danger, it would seem that both countries could find it possible to work out a cooperative agreement that would be of mutual benefit. In fact, that is the purpose of the several declarations of the American States. This is a question of infinite importance to the American people.

As a matter of fact, we have a base in British Guiana. This is one of the bases that we acquired in the destroyer deal. If we go ahead and swiftly develop this base, we will have materially improved our defense position, and will be in a strong position to cooperate with neighboring countries against any threat of attack from over the seas. A report on the progress of our defense preparations on this base is of great importance to the American people.

There is really less potential menace from Hitler today than there was a year ago. Despite his victories, he has been knocked about considerably. He has lost many men and ships in the last year. The German people are just 1 year nearer the limits of human endurance all peoples possess. While our defense production is just getting into its stride. Our Navy is increasing. We have the industrial production, the resources, the manpower, and what is more important, we operate from "the impregnable security" of our own base, if we stay in this hemisphere.

I once asked an old "hoss" trader how he made up his mind what a "hoss" was worth. He replied, "I walk around him once, and trade on the first impression."

The first impression of the American people was to stay out of the European war. Gradually, step by step, a little group who were determined from the first that we should enter this war, have attempted, by clever maneuvering, to change the people's first impression.

For a long time they concealed from the people their true beliefs and intentions. Some are still trying to deceive us with the illusion that war would not mean bringing into American homes the suffering, the destruction of life and dreams, the return of crippled and decaying men in place of the lifelong hopes these homes sent forth.

I do not know of a greater attempt in all history to deceive the American people as to the consequences of their decision and the consequences of what we are doing, than the record, both in and out of the administration, during the present European war.

Wars cannot be won by half-way measures. We cannot fight a war limited to naval and air action as we have been told. We cannot underwrite Hitler's defeat without sending into action across the seas millions of doughboys. Never for 1 minute have I wavered from that view of the realities of war.

Wars are not won by bluff and bluster. They are not won by clever diplomatic moves. It is plainly evident that the war party in the United States is magnifying the difficulty of defending the Monroe Doctrine, just as they minimize the enormous difficulty of Hitler in attacking it successfully.

It may well be, if we do not change our national habits, that the future historian will refer to your generation as seeing the end of the Republic.

It may well be that the anarchy of today will produce despotism tomorrow. That has been true before in the world's history. The most recent example was in Germany, when a puzzled and discouraged people turned from the republic they had tried to nazi-ism in their search for security.

If anyone is confident that the roots of our democracy are so deeply planted that there is no danger of such a thing happening here, let him take a look at these roots and see if they are in a healthy condition. Already Executive rule has been substituted for the three branches of government. The President's proclamation of unlimited national emergency, and the failure in his speech to mention the Congress, practically brushes aside the Congress, and the President can virtually govern the country by Executive order. The fact that the President has confused the country as to exactly what he meant to do should not deceive us as to what he can do, supported by war hysteria and a blank-check majority in Congress and a friendly Supreme Court.

Therefore, for the period of the unlimited emergency, we have not in form but in reality seen the end of the Republic. That its restoration will automatically occur cannot be taken for granted. We have to consider, among other things, the administration's record of unwillingness to surrender emergency powers. And we have the administration's record of short cuts.

We find a fatalistic acceptance of the inevitable. On all sides we have heard it said frequently in recent months, "It's no use to fight against war, because Roosevelt can get us in whenever he wants to."

We have already accepted, in our thinking and legislation, the basic tenet of nazi-ism—that everything is dependent upon government.

In this transition period between a laissez-faire capitalism and something else, we failed to tackle the hard job of achieving social progress without the entering wedge of totalitarianism.

In the hurry to expand government to meet new economic conditions too many administrative short cuts were condoned for the sake of the objective. And we have been making that a regular practice. Too many are now condoning a short cut to war and to national defense, involved in the Presidential proclamation of unlimited national emergency. It was strange to see exultation on the part of some for the way Congress was ignored in the last fireside chat. By firm and capable management we could have had the necessary national-defense production without resort to such extreme means, and certainly Congress should have the opportunity to debate the war issue in advance, instead of being permitted at the last minute to do so simply as a matter of form.

There is an old moth-eaten principle that has been misused in the attempt to stop much good legislation. But it is a good rule, that we should have a government of laws, not men.

The better the lawyer the less he will pretend to advise you on what the Government may rule tomorrow or next day on dozens of questions affecting everyday business relations. A concrete ruling today on a definite and specific point may be changed tomorrow. No one knows "where he is at," as the saying goes, because power was delegated to men without any blueprints of laws to follow. The judgment of each bureaucrat is his law.

We are stirred by the flouting of the rights of the minority in Nazi, Fascist, and Communist countries. Yet we have tar and feather parties, lynchings, and suppression of free speech in various parts of the United States. Already the attempt is being made to paste the label of "unpatriotic" on those who still dare to debate the issue of war.

In other words, in these things I have mentioned and in other ways we have been steadily weakening our checks upon the majority. And this in all other republics, of ancient and modern times, has resulted in dictatorship, of the right or of the left.

The self-reliance, the fortitude, and the sense of equality necessary in the type of citizen this Nation requires, if the Republic is to survive in this world of dictatorships, are not being developed by the New Deal, nor are they developed by arrogant plutocracy that acts, when in power, more or less like glorified pawnbrokers. In the past 8 years we have learned to look to Washington instead of to local communities to pay the bills of civil projects. One blank-check appropriation after another has rendered Congress and the local chambers of commerce equally supine. New Deal idealistic absolutism was praised by liberals as a substitute for ruthless plutocratic absolutism, without any thought of the destructiveness of both to the idea of government by reference to the people.

And it has not yet dawned upon the liberals of the country that social progress with totalitarianism is still totalitarianism. That in a world returning to despotism in the name of social gains we should be particularly careful to preserve the social gains by strengthening the Republic, instead of weakening it by short-cut methods pursued in the name of a holy cause. For 8 years now we have followed the theory of government that the end justifies the means. If the objective is humanitarian, if the cause is noble, why worry about the methods used to reach the goal? If democratic traditions and concepts were destroyed, when by more careful study and slower, more expert statesmanship they could have been maintained with the same social gains, what's the difference? In other words, social gains were not inimical and of themselves destructive to the Republic, as a lot of stuffed-shirt reactionaries would have us believe. But the way they are accomplished, the short cuts resorted to in the process of achieving them, are very disastrous to the idea of reference to the people for authority to proceed. And once that idea is destroyed the Republic is destroyed, and you have a gradually growing despotism.

Our problems are many sided. No question is exclusively economic or political or social. The very complexities, the willingness to follow openmouthed the honeyed words of one leader, was too much for the people of Italy and Germany. But if there was honey in his phrases, they were backed up by sufficient daring and determination to put fortitude into his people.

The entire world, in utmost reality, is being ruled by four men: Stalin, Churchill, Hitler, and Roosevelt. And England, Germany, and the United States are in the fix they are today from these same conditions, by a "national distaste for facing difficult, complex facts, the national yearning for an easy way out, and a general desire to reap the benefits of collective action without swallowing the prescriptions of Dr. Marx."

I don't think the principles of Dr. Marx are workable. I do think our present habits lead straight for a dictatorship of the right. Already in a few ways that I have briefly mentioned, we have undermined the structure of the Republic. I think we are headed for a long, long war—2, 5, 10 years maybe—for one step farther and there is no turning back until we win. When we do win, which we will in the end, we will be bankrupt, along with the rest of the combatant world.

To all this, add executive rule, and you will perceive, I hope, that the task of restoring our Republic is not automatic and simple, but extremely difficult. It can be done only with determined effort on the part of all the citizens.

For us in our thinking to accept as permanently granted these powers the President has assumed, or his acts under them as beyond criticism, would be a colossal disaster to the Republic.

You are not looking for the easy way. All you are looking for is opportunity. Hold fast, then, I say, to the old-fashioned religion of hard work, sobriety, and frugality, true attributes of strength of character which your country must have in its citizens of today and tomorrow. Never have I wavered in my confidence and belief that the character of the American people, in the end, will meet whatever test may come.

There is more to life in America than anywhere else in the world today. We must be worthy of it. I believe we are. But any people, no matter how sturdy, must have leadership of strength and determination that will encourage them, and if necessary make them sacrifice a part in order to preserve the whole.

Federal Acquisition of Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 2 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

LETTER FROM CHARLES R. FENWICK

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the question of the acquisition of land by the Federal Government for military purposes has created some serious problems in a number of the States.

I have received a very interesting letter from Hon. Charles R. Fenwick, a very influential member of the House of Delegates of Virginia, making certain suggestions which appear to me to be worthy of the fullest possible consideration.

I ask unanimous consent to have this letter printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 24, 1941.

Hon. HARRY FLOOD BYRD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been very much concerned with the Federal Government acquiring land in the State of Virginia, both in Arlington and Caroline Counties and other portions of the State. I realize that in the present emergency concessions and sacrifices must be made, but I believe that they can be accomplished in an orderly manner and without disrupting the sovereignty of the State and its citizenry. Section 8, clause 17, of the constitution reads:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

When the United States acquires title to lands by purchase with the consent of the legislature of the State the Federal jurisdiction is exclusive of all State authority (U. S. v. Unzenta, 280 U. S. 138). Buildings constructed within the States and under this clause are exempt as instrumentalities for the execution of powers of the General Government, and such control of the States as would defeat or impair their use for that purpose. It is necessarily temporary, to be exercised only so long as the places continue to be used for the public purpose for which the property was acquired or reserved from sale. When they cease to be thus used the jurisdiction reverts to the State (Fort Leavenworth Ro. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S. 525).

(NOTE.—In later years such land has invariably remained the property of the Federal Government and been converted into parks and for other uses.)

Federal jurisdiction being exclusive, private personal property thereon cannot be taxed by the State (Surplus Trading Co. v. Cooke, 281 U. S. 647; Nikes v. Commonwealth, 144 Virginia 618).

There is no provision in this section of the Constitution against reservations as to how the land should be used or other restrictions in connection with the consent by the legislature (James v. Dravo Contracting Company, 302 U. S. 134). It is not unusual for the United States to own within a State lands which are set apart and used for public purposes. Such ownership and use without more do not withdraw the lands from the jurisdiction of the State (Surplus Trading Company v. Cooke, 281 U. S. 647).

The phrase "places purchased" limits the National Government to one mode of acquiring exclusive legislative authority over land within a State, namely, by purchase with the State's consent; when land is acquired any other way as by cession, any conditions may be annexed to it, not inconsistent with the public use contemplated. So a State may impose a condition that jurisdiction may be retained by the United States only so long as the place is used for the purpose specified; it may continue its laws in force and do so so long as they do not conflict with necessary acts of Congress. It may provide that civil and criminal processes of State courts may be executed therein; but where a cession has been made subject to certain conditions, the United States takes entire political jurisdiction, save as expressed in the conditions (Chicago, R. I. and P. R. Co. v. McGlinn, 114 U. S. 545; Palmer v. Barrett, 162 U. S. 399).

Consent or ratification by the State is necessary to the acquisition of exclusive jurisdiction, but it is necessary for no other purpose and cannot be required in order to permit the United States to exercise its rights of eminent domain (Chappell v. U. S., 116 U. S. 499).

Under this last provision the Federal Government can promiscuously acquire lands without the consent of the State legislature, although it does not acquire exclusive jurisdiction. Such procedure is the most damaging and unless exercised with discretion can demoralize a community and destroy a political subdivision of a State.

Two suggestions are made:

First, that the Federal Government, through its proper authority, consider with the State the particular problem, and if such land is acquired, it be on a lease-lend basis so that at the end of the emergency, or when no longer used for the particular purpose, that it will revert back to the State in the case of purchase under the terms of the Constitution, or to the individuals when acquired through eminent domain.

Second, that land be selected as far as possible not in cultivation, or of the submarginal type. There are today thousands of acres in Virginia not under cultivation, or if cultivated so submarginal that the tillers cannot earn a living. The removal of families from such land onto fertile, tillable land would mark a great advance in the State and at the same time fill the wants and needs of the Government. It is realized that some sites desired for a particular purpose may not be available in such localities as mentioned but certainly this matter should be given every consideration before fertile farms are removed from cultivation and the homes of people destroyed when other measures are available.

I would greatly appreciate your giving this matter consideration and discussing it with the proper authorities.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES R. FENWICK.

Confederate Memorial Address, Arlington National Cemetery, Sunday, June 1, 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALL DOXEY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. WALL DOXEY, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me yesterday, June 1, 1941, on Confederate Memorial Day at Arlington Cemetery.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Major Smith and all the heroes who wore the Gray, Major Van Swearingen, ladies, and gentlemen, the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi, Senator THEODORE G. BILBO, regrets beyond expression that it is impossible for him to be with us this afternoon and deliver the main address as had been planned.

Therefore, I, pinch-hitting for Senator BILBO, shall read the address he had prepared for delivery on this Confederate Memorial Day.

Once again we are gathered to commemorate the memories of our Confederate dead, though mindful that our feeble services of commemoration cannot hope to do justice to their unsurpassed valor, self-sacrifice, and devotion to principles. It is altogether fitting that these annual memorials be held in reverent tribute to our Confederate heroes, as an expression of everlasting gratitude. It is our sacred obligation to perpetuate for the rising generations a spirit of appreciation of the terrific price paid for a glorious united democracy such as we cherish today.

When we speak of the heroes of the Confederacy, we refer not only to those renowned military leaders whose names are indelibly engraved on the scroll of time. Not to those alone, for our homage extends to even the humblest soldier of the ranks though he may sleep in an unmarked grave with naught but the green growths of earth and the morning dew to adorn his resting place. We include, by all means, the noble women of the Confederacy whose heroism and untold sacrifices entitled them to lasting fame.

Memorial Day is an occasion of sublime inspiration and solemn reflection, especially so at this time when the specter of war stalks over half the globe; when the whole world is confronted with danger.

The significance and solemnity of the event are intensified by the locale. This sacred shrine supplies its own reflections and evokes its own plaudits.

Here at Arlington tens of thousands of the brave dead of American wars sleep in honored dust, where magnificent marble preserves memories and proclaims the worth of as valiant heroes as the world has ever known. More than 21,000 of them were soldiers of the Civil War.

Here rests the Unknown Soldier of the World War—"known but to God."

"The name of him whose body lies before us took flight with his imperishable soul. We know not whence he came but only that his death marks him with the everlasting glory of an American dying for his country, and greater devotion hath no man than this. He died unquestioning, uncomplaining, with faith in his heart and hope on his lips that his country should triumph and its civilization survive."

Here at beautiful Arlington lived the peerless General Robert E. Lee, commander of the Confederate armies, whose military genius immortalized him as a paragon to be emulated down through the years by military men of this Nation and of nations across the seas.

The cause of the Confederacy is commonly designated as "the lost cause." I have never liked that designation. It seems inappropriately associated with a cause defended by men who have been as conspicuous among men as the cause for which they gave their all will be forever famous among events.

It seems misapplied when we so confidently believe that whenever the last great account of humanity shall be written, in the bright annals of those who have best served and glorified a great Nation shall be found the names of General Lee and Stonewall Jackson and those other brilliant leaders of the Confederate forces. Their eulogies will be spoken on through succeeding ages when we who speak them now shall be forgotten.

Historians are rather well agreed that superb military capacity, fortified by the unrelenting zeal of the Confederate soldiers and their people—this alone—was the thing that sustained the southern armies throughout 4 long years of bitter war. In every other respect, overwhelming odds were pitted against the South from the very beginning; numerical odds of at least 3 to 1, a vast disparity of resources, an overwhelming superiority of sea power, in favor of the antagonists.

The so-called lost cause has taught us some unforgettable lessons. In between the lines of Civil War history are to be found our most convincing sermons on the necessity of "all out" preparedness by any people confronted with potential aggression. Military genius, Spartan courage, and undying zeal are not enough. War is a cold, cruel, ruthlessly practical business. Preparedness to the limit; preparedness to match in numbers and in kind the instruments and the forces of the adversary is the only kind of defense worthy of the name.

In defeat the men in gray were as heroic as they were valorous on the battlefield. Footsore and sick at heart, the Confederate soldier buttoned up his faded gray jacket and turned his steps toward home. Ragged, half starved, enfeebled by hunger, exposure, and wounds, he pulled his gray cap over his tired brow and began the slow trek homeward. At the journey's end, he found there his once happy and prosperous home war-scarred or in utter ruins; his farm desolated; his livestock killed; his barns and cupboards empty; his economy destroyed; his money worthless; his gracious way of life swept away.

The courage and ingenuity of the Confederate soldier and has family in the struggle for reconstruction form many an epic chapter in the history of the Nation. Permit me to borrow a few words from the illustrious Henry W. Grady, of Atlanta, who lived during the Reconstruction period. I quote Mr. Grady:

"Surely God inspired the Confederate soldier in his adversity. As ruin was never before so overwhelming, never was restoration swifter. The soldier stepped from the trenches into the furrow. Horses that had charged Federal guns marched before the plow, and fields that ran red with human blood in April were green with the harvest in June. Women reared in luxury cut up their dresses and made trousers for their husbands; and, with a patience and heroism that fit women always as a garment, gave their hands to work. There was little bitterness in all this. Cheerfulness and frankness prevailed. From the ashes left us by Sherman, that able general who was a kind of careless man with fire, we have raised a brave and beautiful city; and, somehow or other, we have caught the sunshine in the bricks and mortar of our homes and have builded therein not one ignoble prejudice or memory."

All wars have been severe upon the women in an invaded country. The burdens and perils of the fine women of the Confederacy were especially heavy. In addition to assuming the home responsibilities of men gone to war, the women spun and sewed for the soldiers. They deprived themselves of food that it might be sent to the Army. A plan was launched by those good ladies of the South to cut off their hair and sell it to Europe as a means of raising funds for the army. The project failed of consummation only because it was impossible to run the Federal blockade. Every day was one of privation and sorrow. They experienced the horrors and privations of war all about them, but faltered not. When it was all over those gracious women were the very first to kindle a spirit of forgiveness and reconciliation. To them goes the credit for having inspired the National Memorial Day by their beautiful custom of laying flowers upon the graves of Union as well as Confederate soldiers. I am pardonably proud that Mississippi women were the originators of that custom.

Francis Miles Finch, of New York, who served under Grant as a revenue collector, wrote his immortal poem, The Blue and the Gray, upon hearing that the women of Columbus, Miss., had strewn flowers alike on the graves of the Confederate and of the Union soldiers.

"These in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat;
All with the battle blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the laurel the Blue
Under the willow the Gray."

It is a happy commentary on Americanism that so many splendid steps have been taken by descendants of the Blue and the Gray to close the chasm of separation; that we have today a nation so indivisibly united that it can never again be torn asunder by sectional differences. Americans all, joint heirs of a grand legacy bequeathed us by our founding fathers.

Just a few days ago the Descendants of the Participants of the Campaign, Siege, and Defense of Vicksburg held their sixth annual assembly in historic Vicksburg, where descendants of both sides meet annually to clasp hands in eternal friendship.

Still another link will be welded into the chain of unity when, on day after tomorrow, Beauvoir, the Mississippi home of President Jefferson Davis, will be dedicated as a national shrine.

Confederate veterans one by one have passed away. The thin gray line grows ever thinner. As each one goes forth to that Valhalla of the valiant dead, we bend in affectionate sorrow over his bier, realizing that soon the last of his ranks will have passed from the earth. To the few of these venerable gentlemen now in the land of the living we extend hearty felicitations. May their remaining days be crowned with joy and tranquillity; and when the trumpet call of eternity shall summon them to join their comrades on the other shore, may they go forth happy and triumphant in the glory of their valor.

May we, all of us, resolve to emulate the fortitude and heroism of those whom we honor today. Let us all, as true Americans, prove worthy of our precious heritage by giving our last full measure of devotion to the preservation of a glorious united America consummated with their hearts' blood.

PROGRAM OF EXERCISES

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to attend the exercises at the Arlington National Cemetery on May 30 and to witness the impressive ceremonies conducted by the board of directors of the Grand Army of the Republic Memorial Day Corporation.

The ceremonies were solemn and dignified, and the committee is to be commended for the fine and patriotic nature of the exercises.

The following is the printed program, which gives not only historical information regarding the national cemetery but also the program and other interesting facts:

1941 MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES, ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY

(Cut)

Approach to Memorial Amphitheater and Tomb of Unknown Soldier

THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC MEMORIAL DAY CORPORATION, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Grand Army of the Republic Memorial Day Corporation was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, November 17, 1938, by the united action of the District of Columbia Departments of the Grand Army of the Republic, the United Spanish War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the American Legion. A few months thereafter the Department of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War was admitted into constituent membership. The corporation was formed for two specific purposes: (a) To decorate the graves of veterans buried in Arlington National Cemetery and other local and national cemeteries in the District of Columbia; and (b) to hold fitting memorial services on Decoration Day. Memorial services of this character have been held annually by the Grand Army of the Republic since Memorial Day was established, May 5, 1868. Four representatives from each organization constitute its board of directors, no one of whom receives any compensation for his services. The expenses of the corporation when not partially defrayed by an annual appropriation from Congress are borne by small contributions donated by public-spirited citizens who are interested in honoring the Nation's service dead and who value the sacrifice and offer of sacrifice made by those who have followed the flag. The legacy of today and the heritage for posterity come from their sacrifices.

"Whenever a people forgets its worthy past, the day will come when it will not have a past worth remembering."—Dr. Henry Nelson Snyder, president, Wofford College.

GENERAL ORDERS NO. 11

(Cut)

Maj. Gen. John A. Logan

I. The 30th day of May 1868 is designated for the purpose of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of comrades who died in defense of their country during the late rebellion and whose bodies now lie in almost every city, village, and hamlet churchyard in the land. In this observance no form or ceremony is prescribed, but posts and comrades will, in their own way, arrange such fitting services and testimonials of respect as circumstances may permit.

We are organized, Comrades, as our regulations tell us, for the purpose, among other things, "of preserving and strengthening those kind and fraternal feelings which have bound together the soldiers, sailors, and marines, who united to suppress the late rebellion." What can aid more to assure this result than by cherishing tenderly the memory of our heroic dead? We should guard their graves with sacred vigilance. All that the consecrated wealth and taste of the Nation can add to their adornment and security is but a fitting tribute to the memory of her slain defenders. Let pleasant paths invite the coming and going of reverent visitors and fond mourners. Let no neglect, no ravages of time, testify to the present or to the coming generations that we have forgotten as a people the cost of a free and undivided Republic.

If other eyes grow dull and other hands slack and other hearts cold in the solemn trust, ours shall keep it well as long as the light and warmth of life remain in us.

Let us, then, at the time appointed, gather around their sacred remains and garland the passionless mounds above them with choicest flowers of springtime; let us raise above them the dear old flag they saved; let us in this solemn presence renew our pledges to aid and assist those whom they have left among us a sacred charge upon the Nation's gratitude—the soldier's and sailor's widow and orphan.

II. It is the purpose of the Commander in Chief to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept up from year to year, while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of his departed comrades. He earnestly desires the public press to call attention to this order and lend its friendly aid in bringing it to the notice of comrades in all parts of the country in time for simultaneous compliance therewith.

III. Department commanders will use every effort to make this order effective.

By command of:

JOHN A. LOGAN,
Commander in Chief.

N. P. CHIPMAN,
Adjutant General.

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

(Delivered at the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg November 19, 1863)

(Cut)

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as the final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this; but, in a larger sense we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but we can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

EXCERPTS—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness, prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.

We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions do, in the name, and by authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare. That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States.

SOLDIER'S SOLILOQUY

(By Lucille Kendall Griswold)

Here, for long years I've lain.
In winter's cold and snow; in summer's rain.
A "soldier dead"—unknown—unclaimed.
In dusty files, a record bears my name, and to the right of it, three words—one bold—now growing dim, Conceal my fate.
Once I was man.
Once, flesh concealed these bleached and weathered bones.
Once, I had power to breathe, and move, and think—but thinking, gave thought only to the "glory"—never to the broken homes of War.
Little dreamed I, that in a misty dawn-light yet to come,
Death—roaming a blood-drenched battlefield,
Would find me, and finding me,
Would claim me for his own.
But, that morn came, and here am I, alone—yet not alone.
My soul, by God's good grace, unchained and free to roam
Returns to me, and thus—with eyes long sightless—still—I see
The sunset—and the dawn
I hear the beat of soldiers marching—marching on.
Some of them to death: some to fame, and some—God!
Make man tolerant! Let war cease!
Or some of them, years hence when these poor bones are gone to dust
Will be as I am now—a skeleton—a memory
Three words—"Missing in action"—written dimly in a record
Just beside a name.

THE ARLINGTON HOUSE

(Custis-Lee Mansion)

Arlington National Cemetery was established by order of Secretary of War Stanton, June 15, 1864. It now comprises 408 acres, with 10 miles of paved roadways and 3 miles of paved sidewalks. It contains over 50,381 burials of service men from all of our wars and conflicts. Burials now average 4 a day. Over 1,284 were buried during the year of 1940. These service men come from every State in the Union, all of our foreign possessions, and 24 foreign countries. Men of the North and South hallow this sacred ground and sleep in peace together. In 1940 approximately 1,510,346 visitors viewed the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier of the World War. It is estimated that 2,000,000 persons visit the cemetery each year. The Memorial Amphitheater was dedicated May 15, 1920, and the Unknown Soldier of the World War was buried November 11, 1921. There were 319 wreaths, 29 sprays, and 2 medals laid at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier by various veteran, patriotic, and civic bodies during the year 1940.

AMERICA

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty, of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the pilgrim's pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring!

Our father's God to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee I sing;
Long may our land be bright,
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by thy might,
Great God our King.

Prairie States Forestry

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are asking many questions about the farm-forestry projects which have been under way in our prairie States. I will endeavor to answer some of these questions.

First, it should be known that the projects have the official name of Prairie States Forestry project. Formerly the Shelterbelts.

These projects were started under Executive order in 1934. It is comparatively new, but the 6 years of experience we have had indicate it is highly successful.

We now have 14,146 miles of field belts on 22,691 farms in North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas.

We have now planted over 164,000,000 trees, and the project is so popular we cannot keep up with the requests.

Although much of the planting was done during the drought period, only 3 percent rejects is the record. In other words, 90 percent of our plantings will grow into acceptable windbreaks.

The items of value derived from these projects are almost too many to mention. Briefly, they mean protection to the land, crops, improvement of living conditions on the farm, and will help to solve our migration problem.

The main protection is against winds, blizzards, and drought. The projects solve the blow problems on our prairies. It somewhat solves the problem of evaporation and wind control.

It is bringing to us fuel, fence posts, wildlife, and even wild fruits. As a shelter for livestock and domestic fowl it has already proved its worth. One proof is the report of its effects for turkey protection in the blizzard of 1940.

You who live in localities where there are forests may not realize that we in Nebraska know something about trees. We are the tree-planter State of the Union. We are the home of the late J. Sterling Morton, founder of Arbor Day. We have had lessons from our pioneers who took up tree claims and planted the trees from which we have cut much wood. You may be amazed that in 1934 Nebraska produced nearly $2,500,000 worth of wood products cut in our State and used mostly for fuel on the farms and towns and cities and for fence posts. We know and appreciate the value of a tree in Nebraska.

This is not a haphazard program. For 6 years the Forest Service has given us the technical advice and through this cooperative program we have definitely learned what kind of a tree will grow in our peculiar soil. This is the technical service which we must have to continue this meritorious project which I consider a real national-defense program. It will have to be the farmer who is to supply the food for our fighting men. Give him this chance to continue working out a problem which will be of great benefit to us when we face the post-war problem.

Think of it—only 6 years and we have trees which are 35 and 40 feet high. We are already cutting fuel and fence posts. We see the return of wildlife and the nesting bird. We see the farmer enjoying picnics and community gatherings in the shade of trees which never grew there before. We find livestock and farm homes protected against blizzards and we find better crop conditions due to the presence of trees which protect the land from hot winds and storm.

We seriously believe that much of our migration problem can be solved by the continuation of this meritorious project. We firmly believe that already these projects are bringing great value to our farming sections. If these projects had been started 50 or even 25 years ago we believe untold millions of dollars could have been saved to our land by the stoppage of erosion and land damage.

So successful has been this project and so popular it is with our people that last year 12,000 people, including farmers from 21 States, gathered together to visit and inspect these projects and to proclaim the success of this method of tree planting on the prairies of our Nation. No better argument can be made here today in favor of this work than the statements made by the farmers out there in those States who today are asking you in the name of better life on the farm and in the name of national defense to continue this work.

I include herewith a telegram I have just received from the American Farm Bureau indicating the worthiness of these tree-planting projects and also an informative article on same by Mr. Paul Roberts:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 2, 1941.

Congressman KARL STEFAN,
House of Representatives:

Hope it will be possible for House to provide increased funds for farm forestry without jeopardizing other appropriations as this is important part of conservation program.

EDWARD A. O'NEAL,
President, American Farm Bureau Federation.

[From the Land Policy Review for April 1941]

WHO PLANTS A TREE PLANTS PROTECTION

(By Paul H. Roberts)

The Prairie States forestry project (the shelterbelt project) was initiated in the fall of 1934 under an Executive order. Since then, about 14,000 miles of field shelterbelts from 5 to 10 rows wide have been planted on more than 22,000 farms in North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and northwest Texas.

Land and crops are being protected from the damaging effects of wind; small amounts of fuel and fence posts are being cut; in a few instances farm buildings have been moved from exposed locations to the protection of the belts; farmers' wives are putting up jam made from the wild plums; and school children and farm families are picnicking and otherwise enjoying the shade and greenery of shelterbelts planted during the past 6 years.

A great deal of skepticism attended the initiation of this work. It was widely publicized, but the nature of the work and its purposes were not well understood generally. Some foresters looked askance at it, and some still do, no doubt, at least as it may be considered a part and parcel of American forestry. Plains foresters, however, generally acclaimed the idea, and Plains dwellers, who from bitter experience with blizzards and everlasting wind, mostly were firm in the belief that shelterbelts of trees offered a sound means of affording protection from the damaging effects of wind and of improving living conditions.

Skepticism has not been entirely dispelled today, but the miles of shelterbelts distributed over 100 or more farm communities attest that shelterbelts are an integral part of Plains agriculture.

The idea of a shelterbelt north and south through the Plains had been proposed from time to time since early settlement, and the idea generally seems to have been to provide a bulwark of trees against the encroachment of the desert upon the fertile Plains. Apparently the suggestion that gave rise to the present project was that narrow belts of trees be planted at fairly regular intervals through the central portion of the Plains from the Canadian line to the general locality of Lubbock, Tex.

This general idea has undergone considerable adaptation to local physiographic and climatic conditions and to the needs of individual farms, but the idea of a systematic pattern for large areas of soils suitable for tree planting is still being carried out.

Viewed from an airplane or as might be charted on a map, each community concentration of shelterbelts would appear as an incompleted network of parallel and cross belts. In parts, the individual farm and even separate 40-acre fields have become completely enmeshed in the pattern; in others there are blank areas or disconnected segments of the pattern, but it readily becomes apparent that when the pattern is completed each will have a place in the whole scheme of interrelated protection, whether the individual belts run east and west, north and south, or "andy goddling" along contours and stream courses.

The determination of the general area in which shelterbelt protection would do the most good was based upon careful surveys, exploratory work, and correlation of known factors. Briefly this is the transition zone between short-grass, permanent range land, and the long-grass prairies. In other words, the western limits of the area, often referred to as the bread basket of the Nation judged necessary to maintain as permanent agricultural cropland, lie east of the so-called Dust Bowl areas. In this transitional zone agriculture has proved successful in the past, but unprecedented drought and other conditions have upset the balance under which farming, to be successful, must operate. It is significant that there has been a definite concentration of the F. S. A. grant cases in this same "high tension" zone. It is an area where the margin between ability to remain on the land and failure may be very slight.

WIND AND RAIN

Broadly speaking, two climatic factors—moisture and wind—are of primary importance to Plains agriculture. The two overlap at some points, as for example: Wind accelerates soil moisture evaporation and hence influences the effects of precipitation.

There is probably little that man can do about precipitation as such. A great deal can be done about saving it for growing plants, and notable strides in that direction are now being made. If all of it were saved, however, there would still be the problem of the wind, and it would still be an important problem. Probably most people think of wind erosion when one speaks of the wind problem on the Plains because of the dust storms of recent years, and, while wind erosion does take a tremendous toll in the form both of land deterioration and human distress, it is not by any means the only ill attributable to the almost constant winds which characterize the Plains country.

One of the important adverse effects of wind associated with the erosion problem, and one that can largely be averted by properly established shelterbelts, is the factor of "blown out" crops. In the southern plains it is not at all unusual for a cotton farmer to have to replant his field anywhere up to three or four times before he finally gets a stand, and there is a sort of grim witticism among them to the effect that when they plant the first time they are "only practicing."

THE BLOW PROBLEM

In the great winter Wheat Belt many farmers have to fight blowing out of the young wheat crop during the early spring months. Often they run their chiseling or listing equipment day and night during bad storms. Farther north, when corn and spring wheat are the principal crops, the blowing is mostly over before planting time, although occasionally late storms do injure crops. Throughout this area the blow problem must be met by working the land to hold it, whether or not crops are produced. This is a severe drain on the resources of the farmers.

It is well known, of course, that evaporation, at least from a free-water surface, is accelerated by air movement, and that the rate of loss of moisture from the surface of the soil by evaporation is much greater where wind has a clear sweep. There is one other feature of evaporation that is also important, however, and that is transpiration from growing plants. Ever since agriculture began on the Plains, people have noticed and recorded the fact that during the period of critical hot winds that sometimes cut the corn crop in half within 2 or 3 days, crops in the lee of tree windbreaks, bluffs, or other barriers do not fire so readily as those subjected to the direct sweep of the hot wind.

Livestock do better when sheltered from cold winter winds, and they do even better in the lee of windbreaks than they do in sheds. The Montana State Agricultural College investigated and discovered that feed requirements for cattle wintering in the protection of trees were less than for those fed in sheds or in the open. There are also, of course, the very great considerations of human comfort in protection from the wind in summer and winter, and the fuel savings when farmsteads are well protected from the winter blasts.

FUEL

Aside from wind control, shelterbelts and plantations have other definite values on the Plains. One of them is in the production of wood for fuel and other farm purposes. Fuel particularly is a considerable and unavoidable item of expense to Plains farmers, particularly in the Northern States and in this "high-tension" area. Eighty dollars to $100 of fuel grown on the land, instead of being purchased, may go a long way in spelling the difference between success and failure. Moreover, wood and wood products in excess of the farmer's needs find an ever-ready market, and they have the virtue, to a great extent, of being available for harvest when the farmer needs the money. Many a Kansas farmer has tided himself over a financial pinch by cutting posts from his Osage orange hedge for the market, and many another throughout the Plains region has sold cordwood for city fireplaces to get some ready cash.

In the 1934 drought, between $2,000,000 and $2,500,000 worth of wood products were cut in Nebraska, mostly for fuel wood and fence posts.

WILDLIFE

Influence on wildlife, particularly game and insectivorous birds, is another important factor in connection with Plains tree plantations. This was not fully appreciated until the shelterbelt-planting program got under way. Lack of cover rather than feed appears to be the limiting factor in wildlife welfare in this region, and the shelterbelts become thickly populated with both perching and ground-nesting birds just as soon as the trees become large enough to support a nest or to furnish cover.

This protection is important also to domestic fowl. Turkey growers suffered serious losses during the Armistice Day blizzard of 1940. A Norfolk, Nebr., paper reported that losses were greatly reduced where the birds were protected by shelterbelts.

Besides their purely utilitarian value, the shelterbelts also have a high esthetic value. They are oases in a flat country—oases widely appreciated by all farm folk, but especially by children who escape from thousands of barren rural schoolyards to the shelterbelts to lunch and play during the noon hour.

Last summer 1,200 Kansas farmers from 20 counties gathered at the first shelterbelt planted in that State for a picnic lunch and ate from a table a quarter of a mile long set up between the rows. At Neligh, Nebr., 12,000 persons attended a forestry field day sponsored by 21 towns in north central Nebraska

HOW TO GROW TREES

Not all of the Plains is adapted to tree growing, at least on the broad scale demanded of shelterbelts for field protection. The western areas are too dry, even where the soils are friable, except where they be furnished with supplemental water. Even within the zone where average precipitation is sufficient there are large areas where the soils are too thin or too heavy for trees to make acceptable growth. The area, however, where shelterbelts can be made an effective aid to agriculture is still large.

In all belts a number of different species are used, for two principal reasons. It is necessary to have low-growing species to stop the sweep of the wind as the taller trees mature, and to stop and hold snow within the belt. The other is to avoid the possibility that some epidemic of disease or insects might wipe out a shelterbelt because it is limited to one or two nonresistant species.

It is important to use racially adapted strains in growing trees on the Plains, a fact that has not been sufficiently taken into consideration in the past.

One other prime consideration in growing trees here is that they must be cultivated as meticulously as any crop. During the first few years on any site, and perpetually on many where the water table is low, trees depend upon the moisture in the top 2 or 3 feet of soil; if this moisture is pumped out by grass and weeds as fast as it accumulates, the trees will not flourish. In a few cases in the early days of the project, belts were planted along the partition line between two farms, half of the belt being on one side and half on the other. Occasionally one of the farmers did not take good care of his half, although his neighbor did, and the difference in survival and growth is clinching proof that a secret of success is careful cultivation. Of course, cultivation is not needed after the branches of the trees meet and thus shade out competing herbaceous vegetation.

A COOPERATIVE PROGRAM

The program is carried on under a cooperative arrangement with the landowners. Generally speaking, the Forest Service grows the stock and plants it, and the farmer prepares the planting site, furnishes the necessary fences, and cares for the plantation. Actually, because the project is operated entirely through the use of W. P. A. funds, some hand labor (like fencing and hoeing) is performed on the belts by W. P. A. labor. Special machinery has been developed and is sometimes lent farmers for cultivating. Poison materials are furnished the farmer to control rodents. The Forest Service furnishes the technical advice to the farmers in the care of the belts, and for 1 or 2 years subsequent to the initial planting replaces such losses as appear necessary to assure the establishment of an effective shelterbelt.

As mentioned previously, the project uses only W. P. A. money, no specific appropriation having ever been made for it. A definite proportion of the funds must be used to employ relief labor, and the remainder is not enough to carry on the project effectively. To make up the difference counties and municipalities where the program is being carried on help out by furnishing warehouse and office space, trucks during peak periods, and services and supplies of other kinds.

THE FUTURE

The project began its planting work in the spring of 1935, but because of the lack of suitable planting stock only 129 miles of belts were planted on 263 farms. That year the project established its own nurseries, and since that date has planted 14,146 miles on 22,691 farms in the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and western Texas. A total of 164,000,000 trees has been used, including replacements.

Of this, 462 miles of belts, or 3.2 percent, have been written off the books as failures, due either to some fault of location or lack of care by the cooperator. Others will be written off as time goes on, but it is expected that about 90 percent of the belts will grow into acceptable windbreaks.

The shelterbelt planting program is not a panacea for all of the ills that afflict the Plains region, but it is a necessary ingredient in any prescription for a stable agriculture on the Plains. If the program had been initiated 50 years ago, or even 25 years ago, untold millions of dollars worth of permanent damage to the soil would have been avoided, thousands of farm families would now be in a stronger financial position, and the problem of migration from the area would not be nearly so great.

As far back as 1880 the Kansas Horticultural Society said in its annual report: "Those settlers who planted shelterbelts and groves are fixtures on their land, while those who never planted trees have pulled up stakes and gone elsewhere."

Many farmers have "pulled up stakes and gone elsewhere" since the Kansas historian of half a century ago voiced his lament; if planting trees will help these people to carry on as contented citizens and producers of wealth, surely the path is plainly marked.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, OF INDIANA

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address which I made in the city cemetery at New Castle, Ind., on Memorial Day, May 30, 1941, which address follows:

My comrades, ladies and gentlemen, we meet on this Memorial Day, when the people of our country are sad, indeed. There is another threat of war before us. The grim determination of war and the resultant disaster which follows—the greed of ruthless destruction of life and property which becomes an incident thereto—make strong men stand and weep. Our mothers are made firm and resolute in this presence by their fervent prayers for peace. Our people want peace, they do not want war. Their fervent hope is that our American boys may be made useful in the arts and trades of civil life, and that their efforts and energies may be devoted in the future to constructive forces for good and not to the destructive forces of war.

These are some of the elements of thought which this very hour impels. The silence of these tombs which are about us reflect the solemn sentiment of peace. The argument of the warmongers and the urge of the interventionists are not heard here. The voice which comes from the grave is the voice for peace. There is a plea for construction in our Nation, not destruction. That is the voice we hear in this solemn presence today. These comrades, ours, who rest in this beautiful cemetery, seem to cry out to us at this moment.

"To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high—
If ye break faith with we who die
We will not sleep, tho' poppies grow
In Flanders' fields."

Thus, we are reminded of our great responsibilities as American citizens in this hour of peril. This responsibility is ours—it cannot be subordinated—it must be met with the firm determination to stand fast for our country. Every American will meet that responsibility.

In the solemn sentiment of this hour, we are caused to reflect upon the epitaph written upon the simple marble slab which marks the last resting place of the great designer and builder of St. Paul's Cathedral. The nobility of England were buried in that beautiful edifice, and their sarcophagus is adorned in splendor and in beauty. Yet, the designer and the builder designed his last resting place far in the basement, where all was dark, and the simple sentence written upon the plain and unadorned marble slab which marks his place, reads:

"If you would seek a monument look about you."

Today we meet in this beautiful cemetery—the very ground is hallowed about us—and we witness the marble markers which stand in reverence and in silence, guardians of the places where rest all those who have made their faithful contribution to the great progress of our country. Many of them have participated in our wars of the yesterday; others have aided materially in the development of our Government, both State and National; there are those who have witnessed those trying days of our independence—when the Declaration of Independence was adopted and our Constitution became our fundamental law, and the beacon light of liberty and freedom turned the darkness into light. All have made their worthy and lasting contribution to our Nation and to our form of government. We think of peace, as we meet here; we think of peace as we reflect upon those words today:

"Our monument is our Nation. Our memorial is our country."

We meet at a time when sacrifices are made upon every hand. These are serious days in which we live. Yet, to those who have given their all for their country—to whose who are no more among us—we pause for this day; we place the token of love and memory upon their graves; we shed our tears for them; then we turn to our earthly tasks again.

We meet in the shadow of these tombs, and the very sacredness of this spot reflects the solace and the beauty of peace. We are sheltered by the dome of heaven, temporarily safe from the destructive forces from without. The last resting place of our friends, and of the veterans of all our wars, mark the place of our communion. They sleep while the people do them honor. May they rest in peace!

We have had our wars. They are in the past. Every American prays unto God, today, that we have no more of war. We are a peace-loving people. We are united, I am convinced, that our Nation should continue in the path of peace. May it ever be so.

These are ominous days in our country. The souls of men and women are sorely tried. While we meet in this atmosphere of calm and sober reflection we are conscious that we are yet spared from assaults coming from without. We express our thanks today that the Western Hemisphere remains at peace. May that peace continue throughout the future years.

We shudder as we know the Eastern Hemisphere is aflame with war; nations have been invaded, and have fallen; men have given their last full measure of devotion for their country; death, destruction, and devastation may be found on every hand; men and women, and little children, who are noncombatants, constantly pray that the war may soon end and that their country may be saved. Even those civilians meet a similar fate with those who are actually and actively engaged in the war. The war lords continue to pursue their daily task of war and death. The curse of mastery, the unalterable desire of acquisition, and the unthinkable purpose of satisfying a selfish desire—all of these elements, spurred on by the lash of the fervent desire of personal domination and individual dictation, cause this cruel war to continue.

We witness the very sad plight of those nations which are involved in this war; their destiny is yet unknown, and their future is dark, indeed. The demands which may be made upon the people of those nations is yet in secret contemplation. What the tomorrow may bring to their untold suffering we cannot tell. Their future is shrouded in mystery.

There are other people in Europe whose outstanding bravery stands as a shining example of their faith in their country. They are yet holding fast. Every American offers a fervent prayer today that they may be victorious. The nightly raids of bombing planes, which come with the certainty of the darkness, have failed to deter them in their defense of their nation. May they have the courage to continue to resist the assault of the dictator and his hordes. The fathers, mothers, and children of that nation, with a morale as firm as if made of bands of steel, face each rising sun with a prayer upon their lips "that the war will soon end and that their country may be saved." What a tragedy to behold. Their country—their native land—may be destroyed or taken. Their homes may be lost. Their very lives are in the balance. They face the untold cruelty of war and the ravages of the dictator who seeks to dominate. I know their prayers will be answered. Thus we view the present.

Yes, we are yet at peace. No one can forecast our future. I am constrained to say, in this exalted presence, that the fathers and the mothers—the people of our country—express the deepest sympathy for those nations. It is our hope that the destructive forces of the aggressor nations may be transformed into constructive forces for good. Our forefathers and mothers—the pioneers in our Nation—would that the savagery of those who seek to conquer or destroy other nations, that a new philosophy of life may be designed throughout the world, may be quickly changed into the promotion of peace. The creed of our forebears, many of whom sleep the eternal night which will carry them into the light of the new-born day, which was inspired by the goodness of their souls, which is now carved in matchless script upon that tablet which endures throughout the endless space of time, speaks to us: "Let us have peace."

They have loved liberty and freedom, as we have known it in our Nation. It was theirs to enjoy our American way of life. They molded the thought that these should be perpetuated. Throughout their lives they developed the thought that "this is my own, my native land"—and they thought in terms of "the United States of America first." Here they lived, they raised and educated their children, they developed our splendid institutions, they worshipped their God as they might choose, and they made their contribution to our Nation. They knew that the path which leads to war is a false path to liberty and freedom.

As these pioneers would speak to us today, in the face of a world crisis, may I offer as their counsel the words which they would doubtless give—"Keep our country at peace, if possible. If we are attacked, then we will defend our native land, our homes, and our institutions, even to the last man."

Then comes the tomorrow. No one can contemplate what it will bring. As a united nation, we will meet it. We will never falter. We will devote our efforts and our energies in the development of our national defense—each doing his full duty for his country—making that defense so sound and so strong that we may be able to repel any attack of any foe. Ours is not a thought of aggression; ours is not a policy of invading any foreign country or of sending our boys upon foreign soil to fight the battles of another nation; but ours is a policy of national preparation to enable us to defend ourselves in case an attack is made upon us. The present war is not our war. We had no part in its making. Our nation did not participate in any overt act which brought about this war. We have been engaged in the development of the arts and trades of civil life within our own borders. Those who live here and who have an apparent desire to rush our country into this awful carnage in Europe and Asia should be reminded by the great mass of our people, who believe that we should think of the United States of America first, and that we should prepare for our own defense, in case of attack, and meet our own problems at home.

These are sad and serious days. As we face these livid problems, as we meditate over the future, we pause to pay our tribute to the dead. All those who have gone before have made their worthy contribution to our Nation; those venerable men and women who have fought for our country and for the preservation of our ideals sleep while the war continues. They inspire us in our earthly work. We revere their memory. Our universal sadness is expressed at this hour by the solemnity of this occasion, and as we shed our tears and tenderly place our flowers upon each silent mound, we know—

"So still they sleep
Beneath yon verdure deep;
On hill, in vale, by brook and lonely farm;
A scattered army they
Until the day
The bugles of the angels sound alarm!

They died to save
And but their grave
Is left to us the living, we who bow,
And place a chaplet on each sleeping brow!"

Irrigation in Arizona

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS BY COL. DALE BUMSTEAD

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD I wish to include a speech made by Col. Dale Bumstead at the Agricultural Department auditorium on the afternoon of May 23 last month. This thought-provoking address was accompanied by a showing of a colored film picturing the great dams and reservoirs on the Salt River system in Arizona, tracing the precious water which is the life-blood of our State from the deep snows in the mountains down through a series of Alpine lakes, below which it turns the wheels in numerous hydroelectric power plants, and on down through canals and headgates out upon the fertile soil of the valley in which I live, to make of it a productive garden. Our great vineyards, citrus groves, cotton fields, and truck farms growing lettuce, cantaloups, and the like are all described and pictured so that my colleagues may know to what splendid wealth-making uses their appropriations to the Bureau of Reclamation have been put. Col. Dale Bumstead is himself a dirt farmer in this wonderful valley, and he is also a businessman who has been busy helping make Arizona what it is since his military service in the first World War. One of his lectures in Washington delivered at the agricultural auditorium is as follows:

THE LIFE BLOOD OF THE DESERT

(By Col. Dale Bumstead)

In crossing the Nation by surface and by air, at different seasons, and under widely varying climatological conditions, we have been impressed with the importance of your well-directed efforts toward controlling, storing, and judiciously distributing water.

Especially when viewed from the air the losses by drought, on the one hand, and erosion, on the other, appear enormous. One is impressed by the thin coating of vegetation covering the earth, and the almost total lack of any desirable growth over immense areas.

The contrast with areas where irrigation agriculture is practiced is impressive. If biological laws continue to operate, and there are not too many wars, we must provide food for a rapidly increasing population.

Is it right to ask the Great Father for rain—and when He sends too much or too little say meekly, "It is thy will"? Or is it reasonable to assume He expects us to show just a little common sense and store water for the dry years, and to so control it as to prevent erosion when there are floods?

One is never justified in becoming reconciled to disaster until he has done all in his power to prevent it. And even then he should search his own soil and question his own judgment.

In these United States irrigation agriculture is the sturdy child of necessity, and was born in our Southwest.

The earliest settlers in Arizona found in the Salt River Valley great irrigation canals, dug with stone implements, leading from the stream beds over the same lands that are under cultivation today.

There were ruins of cities and towns that indicated a prehistoric population nearly or quite as large as the combined Indian and white population supported on the same land today.

Ditches and buildings showed excellent engineering ability.

One of the large prehistoric canals passed through the date garden you will see in the picture. In digging basins in which to plant palms imported from Africa and Arabia, the workmen discovered worn stone tools used by early Indian farmers.

East and West have met in the Valley of the Sun. The beauties whose aristocratic ancestors graced the gardens of King Solomon and the Pharaohs are happy there—as you shall see; and our women who visit them are probably as attractive as the proud daughters of Egypt and Arabia who found shade, nourishment, and perhaps romance, in those eastern gardens.

Our prehistoric farmers cultivated corn, squashes, melons, cotton; had domesticated turkeys, and hunted deer, bison, and smaller animals and birds.

Men of the different tribes fought for the possession of lands, food, and women—just as men do today.

There is reasonable evidence to indicate that drought may have driven these people northward into our mountains—and to the south into Mexico, where are Indians with similar features, customs, and language.

The same causes that reduced the marvelously beautiful cities and all but destroyed the brilliant civilization of the East, also brought desolation to the Valley of the Sun.

Drought, alkali, and insects—the "Three Horsemen of Agriculture"—laid low the humble works of our Southwest—and Babylon, ancient Phoenix, Nineveh, and Troy: the glittering palaces of a truly magnificent age.

The only certain protection for life and property in such lands is stored water. The first important storage dam in the United States was built by the United States Reclamation Service for a group of farmers organized as a cooperative under the name of The Salt River Valley Water Users Association.

This dam was named in honor of Theodore Roosevelt, that blue-blooded eastern aristocrat whose great courage and fine spirit made him the idol of the West. It was completed and dedicated by Roosevelt March 18, 1911. That was yesterday. Some of the original signers of the articles of incorporation are still very much alive and at work.

This first large reservoir proved inadequate to serve all of the lands; and others have been built, one below the other, until now there are four large reservoirs on the Salt River, one on the Verdi River, and several to take waters from other areas. For the first time all are full—and spilling over.

Not very long ago Theodore Roosevelt was in Chicago and made an important address that is worthy of repetition. Listen to his words:

"I wish to preach not the doctrine of ignoble ease but the doctrine of the strenuous life; the life of toil and effort; of labor and strife; to preach that highest form of success which comes not to man who desires mere easy peace but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardship, or from bitter toil, and who out of these wins the splendid ultimate triumph.

"A life of ignoble ease is as little worthy of a nation as of an individual. I ask only that what every self-respecting American demands of himself shall be demanded of the American Nation as a whole.

"We of this generation do not have to face a task such as that our fathers faced, but we have our tasks, and woe to us if we fail to perform them."

Unfortunately it is becoming the custom to picture the march of our sturdy forebears across the continent—and have them disappear forever in the fogs of the Pacific; to preach that opportunity ended with the settlement of the West.

We hope to convince you that there is still opportunity for individual and cooperative effort and rich rewards, and the joy of accomplishment for those at work now and for others certain to follow through the ages.

The spirit of constructive adventure is not dead but will continue at increased speed and in rapidly growing volume as long as men exist.

Try to visualize our desert as it was before the dams were built. Thirst and desolation everywhere. A few hardy human beings lived near streams and about water holes. When drought came they were driven back into the snow-clad mountains from whence comes the water that formerly crashed in great floods to the sea; now caught and stored in man-made lakes and judiciously distributed, it serves mankind.

We shall take you with us from the snows in our great pine forests down crystal-clear brooks to rivers that discharge their waters into a succession of lakes that nestle, one below the other, between beautiful mountains or in magnificent awe-inspiring canyons, a nearly continuous body of water for more than 60 miles.

Then we shall follow down natural channels to the diversion dam that divides the water and sends it through canals and ditches over all the fertile valley. Our magic carpet will carry you where you can see the results that come from the wise use of controlled water—fields and gardens, herds and flocks, great natural factories for the production of food. We want you to share with us the pride we feel in an accomplishment to which all have contributed and that is for the benefit of all.

All life depends upon vegetation. All vegetation upon sunshine, water, and fertile soil. There has always been plenty of sunshine in the Valley of the Sun, and rich land. Now, for the first time, all the great reservoirs are full and overflowing and there is ample supply of water.

The farmers in Arizona who banded themselves together to fight drought have asked me to show you, their comrades in the battle, this evidence of the fulfillment of the dreams you have shared with them, the result of joint effort.

The day is here. Drought has lost the battle of the Valley of the Sun. Peace and plenty are assured for those who live "in the palm of the hand of God." We now have sufficient water to wash mineral salts down below the root zones and away; we are improving our methods of insect control. We shall not go the way of the East.

If the world is ever conquered it will, we think, be by insects—not by man. And let us not forget those children of water—power and light. The same water that nourishes our plants, and that is essential to all life, passes first through turbines to produce great quantities of electric power.

Millions of slaves struggled for years to build the Pyramids, and it is reported that some of the virgins of Biblical times forgot to bring oil for their lamps. One electrically driven machine does better the work of a thousand slaves. Our maidens can have all the light they desire, for Arizona has become the most highly electrified agricultural section of the world.

With increased reserves of power we hope to build up a balanced economy by increasing the manufacture of those things man needs or desires.

Surely, given all these resources, we shall quickly build larger communities of free, happy peoples, with time to cultivate the arts and sciences and enjoy a richer life.

The Star of Empire moves westward—there are glorious frontiers ahead of and above us.

You have joined with us in our crusade for a better, richer life. You have been marching with us in the faith that the eternal light will continue with increasing brilliance to lead us to a better world.

Look to the stars.

A Statement of Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by John S. Knight, editor of the Detroit Free Press, which was published under date of June 1, 1941:

[From the Detroit Free Press of June 1, 1941]

A STATEMENT OF POLICY

In a searching analysis of the national-defense program last Sunday, we asserted that the American people "are not looking for a dictator in this country but we have a right to demand leadership in critical times."

This statement was based upon:

1. The lack of an understandable foreign policy.
2. The lack of management at Washington.
3. The lack of national unity.
4. The lack of a sound method of financing our war emergency.

Since that editorial appeared in the Free Press, Mr. Roosevelt has spoken to the Nation.

In this memorable address, he made one thing quite clear. He told us in the most direct language that we are embarked upon an undeclared war against the Axis powers. Only a wilfully stupid or pathetically misguided person could construe his remarks to mean anything else. The Free Press is glad to know where Mr. Roosevelt now stands. His previous policy of "saving England" while trying to avoid a "shooting war" was a type of unrealism which we never were quite able to comprehend.

There is no such thing as "half a war." To those of our readers who protested when we said months ago that our program of "cautious involvement" would eventually mean naval convoys, encounters at sea, and another A. E. F., we need now but quote Mr. Roosevelt's words:

"1. We insist upon the vital importance of keeping Hitlerism away from any point in the world which could be used as a base of attack against the Americas.

"2. From the point of view of strict naval and military necessity, we shall give every possible assistance to Britain and to all who, with Britain, are resisting Hitlerism or its equivalent with force of arms.

"3. All additional measures necessary to deliver the goods (to Britain) will be taken."

Nothing could be more sweeping than that. President Roosevelt has defined our foreign policy in words of unmistakable meaning. His hand controls the ship of state. He alone is the master of our destiny.

The free press has opposed every step leading toward involvement in a war which was not of our making. We have seen far too much of Europe's intrigue, the wars that have been fought to preserve its sordid commercialism disguised by noble and high-sounding slogans; yes, too many comrades lying wounded and dying on the battlefield, not to be skeptical of the motives of the statesmen in high places who make these wars.

But now the die is cast. We are in this war quite as though our Congress has made a formal declaration of hostilities.

There is no turning back.

To that end, the Free Press pledges its complete support to President Roosevelt as our Commander in Chief.

We shall support him, not in the mawkish sense of the sloganeer who mouths meaninglessly, "stand by the President," but in the upholding of our best American ideals as reflected in complete freedom of speech and the press.

He will have our unlimited support in any measures designed to safeguard this Nation against foreign aggressors, enemies of the Republic within our own borders and all other termites who would destroy the priceless liberties and blessings handed down to us by our brave and sturdy ancestors.

But, if our Republic is to endure as such, there must always be room for freedom of expression and constructive criticism designed to focus public attention upon the dangers which confront us at home.

From time to time, the Free Press proposes to speak quite as vigorously about the shortcomings in our national-defense policies as does Lord Beaverbrook in his London Daily Express.

This is no time to use a feather duster when a club may be needed.

We propose to have much to say about the petty jealousies and incompetencies at Washington which are slowing up the wheels of production.

We propose to inquire from time to time why it is possible for men in key defense industries to demand their pound of flesh and tie up vital production when the youth of the Nation is preparing to face death at $21 a month.

We propose to keep hammering away at misfits like Madam Perkins and others who have shown a complete incapacity for the important posts they occupy.

We propose to keep talking about the necessity for sound methods of financing our war effort, methods which will avoid the twin specters of inflation and insolvency.

We propose to continue our adherence to the true principles upon which this Republic was founded and to combat with all our strength every attempt to substitute for them anything that smacks of fascism, nazism, or communism.

An alert, informed, patriotic, and intelligent press is essential to any nation which believes that democracy must not be suspended in time of war; that we cannot discard our priceless liberties in a period of national emergency and hope to recapture them once it is ended.

It is in this spirit of adherence to our finest traditions and with every realization of the enormity of the task before you, Mr. President, that we pledge you the loyal support of the Free Press.

May God be with you.

JOHN S. KNIGHT.

Republicans and Federal Reserve Board Favor High Interest—Democrats and the United States Treasury Favor Low Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill extending the time within which the powers relating to the stabilization fund and alteration of the weight of the dollar may be exercised was reported to the House May 19, 1941, by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It is Report No. 592 in the House of Representatives, Seventy-seventh Congress, first session. The report was made by Mr. COCHRAN, a member of the committee. Minority views against the passage of the bill were filed by the Republican members of the committee and printed in the report. In fact, the minority report was signed by every Republican member of the committee.

On page 7 of the minority report, the following statement appears:

Forcing interest rates down was another consequence of raising the world price of gold. As observed in the April 1941 Federal Reserve Bulletin: "Since 1934 the dominant and basic factor tending to reduce interest rates has been the large inflow of gold." In June 1933 the average rate of interest on the gross public debt was 3.56 percent, but by December 1940 it had declined to 2.56 percent. In view of the heavy burden placed upon the Treasury to finance the vast increase in the public debt, can it be said that the Treasury closed its eyes to this hidden consequence of devaluation? Although low rates of interest saved the Treasury millions, abnormally low returns on legitimate business investments have cost the general public billions. Still worse, this policy prolonged the depression, retarded recovery, and thereby has slowed up the people's efforts to rearm America.

When the bill was passed in the House of Representatives, only one Democrat voted against it, and all of the Republicans, excepting fewer than one-half dozen voted against it. All of the Democrats, save and except the one, voted for the passage of the bill. I am not criticising the Members who voted against the bill. That was their prerogative. This matter is being brought out to show a fundamental difference in the two major political parties on the question of interest.

It shows conclusively that the Republicans are complaining about and vote against low interest, and the Democrats are in favor of and vote for low interest.

Before this administration came into power one who purchased a $5,000 home on 20-year terms, and paid the customary rate of interest, paid $1,600 more than the home owner who now purchases a $5,000 home and pays for it over a 20-year period of time. This does not include several hundred dollars now saved through second mortgages, renewals, and other devices.

The farmers are receiving the lowest rate of interest that the farmers of this country, or the farmers of any country, have ever received in the history of the entire world.

Low interest rates have made a great contribution toward electrifying one-third of the farm homes in America during the past 6 or 7 years.

Numerous other instances could be cited which prove the value of low interest rates.

The people, including farmers, workers, and home owners, are now saving billions of dollars a year through the low interest policy of the present administration, as compared with administrations preceding this one.

The vote I refer to is recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, May 27, 1941. There were 222 yeas—for low interest rates—and 138 nays—against low interest rates.

This report of the Republican Members, which was supported by the Republican Members in the House by their votes, contend that low interest prolonged the depression and retarded recovery, as well as slowed the people's efforts to rearm America. No statement could be further from the truth than this one. It has neither logic nor reason to support it.

POUR MONEY IN AT THE TOP

When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was first organized—1932—it was intended to bail out the big banks, insurance companies, and railroads. It did not have the power to help the people generally, as it has now. It was the theory of Mr. Hoover and his advisers in the Republican Party that the country could be made prosperous by pouring money in at the top. This plan failed. It was just as sensible as the Republican plan to help the country by charging high interest rates.

There is not anything that will help the country and the people generally more in an economic way than low interest, and this administration is to be commended for giving the people the low interest rates that have been given to them during the past 8 years.

Organ Pipe Cactus Monument Should Be Opened to Mining as Have Others

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to call further attention to my bill, H. R. 2675, to permit mining within the Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument in Arizona which was objected to a while ago. Let me mention the fact that this bill in identical form has already passed the Senate by unanimous consent. It was introduced by Senator HAYDEN, of Arizona, than whom there is no Member of Congress who is better informed or more vitally concerned about the West. I say this that it may be clear to all that no man alive knows more about Arizona and cares more about Arizona than does Senator HAYDEN, and he thinks, in the light of all circumstances, this is a good bill.

I know objection has been made to the bill, especially by an organization known as the National Parks Association, for several Congressmen have asked me regarding the merits of the bill, stating that they have received protests from this association. The secretary of the association called upon me a few days ago and said he was opposed to it. Having never seen the area, he did not know the real facts concerning it and seemed to assume that Senator HAYDEN and I were callously trying to commercialize a great natural beauty spot in such a way as to destroy it. Apparently there are nature lovers protesting this bill who are entirely unfamiliar with such areas in our Southwest and how to obtain the maximum benefits without the loss of anything.

It is one thing to demand that the primitive conditions which we are trying to preserve in national parks, monuments, wilderness areas, and recreational grounds be not commercialized, profaned, or destroyed, and I am for exactly that. It is another thing, however, to demand that great natural wealth be locked up over 400 square miles and left untouched, simply that certain designated regions may be said to remain in its primeval condition, especially when it is entirely unnecessary that any such locking up be done. Well do I remember about 3 years ago when it was proposed to tunnel under a national park in Colorado in order to carry out a great hydroelectric power and irrigation development. These same nature lovers protested, declaring it would ruin the park. As a matter of fact, among those most anxious to have the bill passed were all Congressmen from Colorado and other high officials of National and State Government and men who have the highest interest of that Mountain State at heart and who know a lot more about Colorado and care more about it than those who did the protesting. How ridiculous that for their small subjective gains in keeping the park thus theoretically untouched they should defeat, or attempt to defeat, the great actual and objective gains of the engineers who could utilize our natural resources to the full in a natural manner.

Gentlemen, this Organ Pipe Cactus Monument is in Pima County, Ariz., in the extreme southern part of the State, and lies along the international border touching Mexico. It contains 400 square miles of area, and I have it on the highest scientific authority that a portion of this area is mineralized. A copper mine has already been opened up at Ajo, which is in the same geological region as the monument. The Organ Pipe Monument lies in that desert region between Nogales and Yuma, where the international boundary line takes a northwesterly direction. This is the territory which the Spaniards called El Camino del Diablo, which means The Highway of the Devil. Congressman COLE said the Spaniards had been over this ground for four centuries, which is true, in a way, but they did not do all the necessary prospecting. Some of the greatest explorers of New Spain—such as Juan B. Anza, Padre Kino, and Padre Garces—literally took their lives in their hands to cross this country several times. History records that several hundred Mexicans lost their lives along this route in 1850, when they were attempting to go from Sonora, Mexico, to our California to hunt for gold. The American prospector who put all of his belongings on the back of a burro and ventured into that dangerous region to locate hidden mineral wealth also took his life in his hands, but such has always been the way mineral deposits have been discovered throughout the Great West. Those prospectors and their burros have done no more hurt in traversing this cactus-covered region than do the coyotes, jackrabbits, and rattlesnakes which prowl, hop, and crawl through that same area.

As I understand it, the School of Mines at the University of Arizona has reason to believe that at least a fourth of this great area is mineralized, and that there is a fair chance of finding something worth while there. An eastern Democratic Congressman said to me a few minutes ago, "I do not like the looks of this, for it seems to me too much like Teapot Dome, or something. Is some big mining company hoodwinking you into unlocking a treasure chest for their benefit?" I assured him that I was not working in the interest of "any big mining company," or any corporation, to try to "steal" something from Uncle Sam and the American people, but that what I was attempting to do had been suggested by several councils of small mine operators in Arizona, which organization has probably 4,000 members in the State made up of prospectors and small claim holders.

These men with rugged individualism are trying against adverse nature and unsympathetic man-made laws to discover wealth in the earth and make it available for human use That is the type of individual that I have in mind, and for whom I am working in sponsoring this bill. If I ever get the bill passed these same hardy individualists may get no more out of their efforts, on an average, in this area than they have out of similar efforts in the whole mineralized portion of our country throughout the history of American mining. No; all we are asking is that the general mining laws apply to this area, with the exception that no ownership of land or title to the surface shall pass to any individual or corporation. If mineral should be found it must be handled under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior lays down.

It is said that this measure would set a precedent which would be dangerous. I have before me Public Law No. 750 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 22, 1936, which opens up Glacier Bay National Monument in Alaska in exactly the same way that I ask to have the Organ Pipe Cactus Monument made available to the prospector and small mining man. An objector earlier today said this idea had not been applied anywhere in the continental United States, but I hold in my hand Public Law No. 49 of the Seventy-third Congress, approved June 13, 1933, in which this same legislation was made to apply to the Death Valley National Monument in California. Therefore, we have examples of the same thing having been done in Alaska and in the State of California.

Let me again assure you, gentlemen, that I am far more interested in the preservation of the cactus growth of my State than are many of those who are protesting against this bill. I want to do two important things—preserve the unique cactus and at the same time allow opportunity to the hardy prospector and mining man to seek, find, and bring forth the hidden mineral wealth which lies beneath the surface. Properly understood, there can be no reasonable objection to the passage of this measure. I ask that the Senate bill (S. 260) be substituted for H. R. 2675 and that it be passed.

Uncle Sam's Rubber Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following interesting article on domestic rubber production. It gives an excellent review of the research work that has been done in developing the guayule rubber shrub into a practical source of supply.

Already the major rubber companies in the United States are anticipating a shortage in crude-rubber inventories for the coming year. The tremendous costs involved in the production of synthetic rubber on a large scale are proving to be a deterrent in the rapid expansion of this industry. Time is an essential factor, and our time is running short.

Guayule presents the only feasible answer to our need for a supply of rubber which can be produced within the United States. We should lose no time in investigating its potentialities to the fullest extent possible.

The article mentioned above, from the June issue of the Country Gentleman, follows:

[From the Country Gentleman for June 1941]

UNCLE SAM'S RUBBER FARMER

(By Frank J. Taylor)

Three decades ago this year, a diminutive, pipe-puffing botanist and authority on desert plant life, Dr. William B. McCallum, left the University of Arizona campus to tackle a job for a big rubber company. The rubber concern wanted to know if he could domesticate guayule, pronounced wy-yoo-lay, a wild desert shrub of the Mexico and Texas plateau region that is as rich in rubber as the tropical Hevea tree, and grow it on plantations.

Ever since 1910, Dr. McCallum has been taming and growing guayule on a string of 150 farms, stretching from Mexico across Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California to the northern tip of the Sacramento Valley. With over 10,000 acres of experimental growing behind him, the wrinkled little botanist is today this country's No. 1 rubber farmer.

In the cool, dry warehouse at his breeding nursery near Salinas, Calif., Dr. McCallum has accumulated hundreds of airtight, 50-gallon drums of choice guayule seed, which is as fine as grass seed and keeps indefinitely. These shiny black drums constitute one answer to what Americans, who use over half the world's rubber in their tires, could do about it if a hostile foreign government tried to cut this country off from its present rubber sources in the East Indies and the Malay Peninsula.

Acre for acre, Dr. McCallum's domesticated guayule now yields as much rubber annually as an East Indian Hevea rubber plantation. Forty thousand farmers, he says, each with a hundred acres of semiarid land planted to guayule, could make the United States independent of foreign rubber plantations within 4 years. Dr. McCallum is convinced that the farmers could grow real guayule rubber cheaper and faster than chemists could make synthetic rubber in chemical plants.

The struggle of the patient Canadian-born botanist to domesticate an obstinate mustang of desert plant life and make it a potential southwest farm crop is an epic of plant breeding. It is a story that is hard to extract from Dr. McCallum, who, in spite of his enthusiasm for guayule, has a Scotchman's weakness for understatement. He likes to puff his old pipe and think a long time before he answers a question. The story, in brief, is this:

Up on the Mexican central plateau, where Intercontinental Rubber Co. operated 3 mills to extract rubber from wild guayule gathered by peons, Dr. McCallum found no fewer than 2,000 distinct varieties of the plant growing. Nobody had grown the gray, stunted, willowy shrub under cultivation before, and he soon discovered why. Guayule seeds sprouted prolifically under hostile natural conditions out on the desert, but in his seed flats and garden he was lucky if he induced one seed in 500 to germinate. That was problem No. 1.

No. 2 was the variety of guayule types. Some ran as high as 10 percent in rubber, some were as low as 5. Some guayule varieties thrived up where it was almost freezing, others where it was dry and hot. Some grew fast, some grew slow. Undismayed by the reluctance of the seed to germinate, the botanist set to work crossing the varieties to get what he wanted: A fast-growing plant, high in rubber yield, adapted to cooler climates farther north. Dr. McCallum can laugh at this discouraging phase of his work now.

"I attempted thousands of crosses," he told me. "So far as I know, not a single one was successful. The guayules just wouldn't hybridize."

After that, Dr. McCallum resorted to selection. Whenever he found a flourishing plant that looked like a good rubber producer, he marked it, gathered the seed, then reduced the plant to rubber and residue in a laboratory. The rubber in a guayule plant is stored in the wood. The only way to extract it is to shred the entire bush, roots included, then pulverize it in a rotating drum filled with smooth pebbles and water. When this liquid is drained off into vats, the wood and bark precipitates to the bottom, while the rubber, resembling chopped up rubber bands, is skimmed like cream from the top of the liquid.

Every time Dr. McCallum found a plant with unusually high rubber yield, he planted the seeds, grew another generation, selected again, repeated the laboratory process. By experimenting with heat and chemical treatments, he increased the germination of seeds until now 95 percent of them grow in sand under nursery conditions. After thousands of laboratory rubber extractions, coupled with careful growing tests, he settled on four choice strains of guayule which ran consistently to 20 percent rubber content, or double the yield when he began.

Though he had successfully tamed the wild guayule, Dr. McCallum's troubles as a rubber farmer were just beginning. About that time, the agrarian Mexican Government began confiscating the farms owned by foreigners. The rubber company officials discovered that though they could mill wild guayule without interference, their holdings might be confiscated if they grew the stuff on plantations. So they hustled Dr. McCallum off to the United States to establish nurseries and trial plantings. His first plantings, naturally, were in southern Arizona. The test near Tucson proved a complete failure, because the rubber yield was low, even from his carefully selected stock. Puzzled, Dr. McCallum made a new discovery. Guayule plants make their growth during the wet winter months, hibernate, and store up rubber, which they extract from the atmosphere, during the dry summer season. In Arizona, the rains come in cloudbursts during the summer. Lacking the alternate droughts, the plants stored little rubber.

Again the tireless guayule grower packed up his equipment and nursery stock and moved. This time Dr. McCallum took no chances. All the way from Texas, where varieties of guayule grow wild in the semiarid western plateau, to northern California he made trial plantings, over 100 of them. The largest were in the Salinas Valley, where he established his laboratory and nursery, and eventually planted 8,000 acres to guayule, some on lands leased by his company, the rest grown on contract by enthusiastic farmers eager to use marginal or worn-out lands. The company erected a half-million-dollar mill at Salinas to extract rubber from not only Salinas Valley plantings but those in the Sacramento, San Joaquin, and Santa Maria Valleys, and in southern California.

Company engineers devised an ingenious machine for planting seedlings in fields at the rate of 14,000 a day, and other labor-saving equipment for cultivating, harvesting, and chopping the plants in the field, and blowing the shredded guayule into trucks, to be dumped at the maw of the mill, which turned out for a considerable period 10,000 pounds of rubber daily at Salinas. One machine, resembling a vacuum cleaner on wheels, sucked seeds into sacks by the millions. The hope of the industry is this efficient machinery, without which American guayule growers could not compete against 30-cents-a-day labor on East Indian and Malayan plantations.

After World War No. 1, when rubber skyrocketed to over a dollar a pound, it looked as though Dr. McCallum's domesticated guayules had brought a bonanza crop to California and Texas marginal landowners. The bubble burst in 1932, when the international rubber cartel collapsed and rubber stocks stored abroad poured into this country in a tidal flood. Dollar rubber tumbled in price to 3-cent rubber, then began the slow climb back. Unhappy Dr. McCallum watched disgusted farmers, on whose lands he had planted guayule on a 50–50 share-crop basis, plow under their guayule and replant to barley or wheat.

"Leave it in," he pleaded with them. "Every year your acre of guayule stores up 300 pounds more rubber. Let the plants grow and the rubber will be there when the prices come back."

Guayule is a peculiar crop for farmers to understand. At 4 years of age, a good stand of guayule, 8,000 plants to the acre, will have stored 1,200 pounds of raw rubber. At 8 years, the harvest is 2,400 pounds, at 10 years, 3,000 pounds. This is exactly the annual yield of a good plantation of Hevea rubber trees in the East Indies. The plants thrive up to 40 years, but for maximum yield per acre Dr. McCallum's crews harvest them between 4 and 10 years, completely stripping the fields with their harvesting machines.

A few Salinas farmers heeded his advice to leave the guayule in the ground. Later, when rubber prices climbed to around 20 cents and the company reopened the factory to process its own crops, the growers came out with a fair return. The Salinas factory opens late in the fall for an annual "campaign," just as does the near-by beet-sugar mill. Last winter's 3 months' campaign practically wiped out both the share-crop and the company plantings ready for harvest. The thousand or so acres remaining in guayule in the valley are in company-owned plantings of Dr. McCullum's improved varieties.

He thinks these will be kept for the seed crop in case the guayule acreage has to be expanded in a hurry. United States Department of Agriculture men were inspecting these fields, the nursery, the laboratory, and the mill, with this eventuality in mind, when I visited the valley recently. The United States Army had already made an independent survey of guayule possibilities.

If the country ever needs rubber in a hurry, Dr. McCallum and Charles Lee, farm manager for the company, have tested a growing program for delivering it 8 months from seed, by sowing the seed like grain in the fields. After it is sown, the seed is covered lightly with sand and sprinkled twice a day, with overhead sprinklers or water wagons which run on ramps. This is done twice a day for the first fortnight, then gradually tapered off until, at the end of the month, the little plants are able to shift for themselves. In 8 months they are 10 inches high and yield 350 pounds of rubber per acre.

This hurry-up rubber is expensive, costing 57 cents per pound, f. o. b. Salinas, where it is processed. Even at this price, it is less expensive than most of the synthetic rubbers.

A MARGINAL-LAND CROP

Dr. McCallum believes that, quite aside from national-defense considerations, a stabilized rubber price of 30 cents or more per pound will see the guayule crop a permanent agriculture in the Southwest where, he says, 10,000,000 acres of marginal land, now used only for grazing or speculative grain growing, are suited for rubber production. Four million acres in guayule, he estimates, would emancipate the country's automobile users from dependence upon foreign plantations, in which, curiously enough, his company is heavily interested.

Thirty-cent rubber would mean $90 worth of rubber per acre stored up annually in average guayule plantings, half for the farmer, the rest to the mill for supplying the nursery stock and harvesting and processing the guayule. Because of the processing problem, Dr. McCallum thinks guayule will always be a crop grown on contract, like sugar beets. In improved varieties now undergoing selection, the rubber content runs up to 25 percent.

THE GROWER'S JOB

The grower's work is mainly cultivating during the first 2 years to keep the weeds down. After that, the guayule plants fight for themselves. Irrigating guayule makes the plants grow faster, but fails to increase the rubber content. Guayule thrives in any well-drained soil, dislikes clay, does as well in wornout as in rich soils.

On the Irvine Ranch, near Los Angeles, a guayule crop pumped so much nitrogen into the soil that beans, planted after the guayule was harvested, yielded three times a normal crop.

Twelve years ago the Italian Government, hearing of Dr. McCallum's success in taming guayule, decided that the shrub was the answer to Italy's woeful shortage of rubber sources. Since then, he has made six trips to Italy to oversee experimental plantings contracted for by the Italian Government-owned subsidiary before Italy plunged into World War No. 2. A good many of those drums of guayule seed stored at Salinas by Dr. McCallum were originally intended for Mussolini's rubber planters in Italy and north Africa. Now the canny old botanist is hanging onto them, because they may be needed for democracy's rubber farms.

Make United States Air Power Invincible

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 26, 1941

ARTICLES FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, on many occasions on the floor of the House and off the floor of the House of Representatives I have urged that this country make itself invincible in the air. We know that a superior air force means victory for one country as against another. Modern warfare is greatly different from the type of warfare employed in the years past. The use of bombers, pursuit ships, scouting planes, and air transports has revolutionized warfare. Again I plead that this Congress take immediate steps to build up our air force so no combination of aggressors would dare attack us. I call to your attention the following news articles which discuss problems of air warfare:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 23, 1941]

AIR POWER BECOMES AN ARMY

However the battle finally goes in Crete, this operation marks a new development in warfare, such as the use of gunpowder, the application of armor to ships, the invention of the land tank.

Here, for the first time, the airplane ceases to be the adjunct of an invading army. Air power is the army. And as such it must sustain the whole operation, at least until such time as infantry and naval units can get through. The men rain down from the skies in parachutes, but they are more than parachutists. They are infantry, artillery, supply corps, medical corps, intelligence corps, all in one.

It is the knell of the older type of warfare and the knell of any nation that chooses to go on slumbering under the false security of the older type. The Germans may or may not succeed in this attempt, but they have demonstrated the power of an aerial army to sail over a fleet and over land forces to establish itself—not as a group of spies and saboteurs but as a fighting force—in enemy territory.

Attack now has a new prong. To the historic army and navy services is now added a new service—the air striking force. It is as distinct from both the army and the navy as these older services are distinct from each other.

This did not come in a day. It has been long in coming. It existed first in the dreams of the Billy Mitchells; of two or three young officers in France who, alas, got no further in the brass-hat circles of Paris than General Mitchell got in this country; of a group of young German officers who received a free hand to carry out their ideas.

America received a heavy jolt just a year ago this month when land mechanization swept infantry from the fields. How we awoke and dug in to accomplish something by way of catching up. Now we all get another jolt as air mechanization demonstrates its power to deal with situations that land mechanization cannot reach.

America might have foreseen this and anticipated it if those who are shaping our defenses had had some imagination of their own. Apparently they have very little. We are still thinking of the airplane as an aid to the Army and Navy; of semiautonomy, perhaps, in belated recognition of what the new warfare means. We are not thinking yet of air power as an army in itself.

We should be without another day's delay. Due to our particular geographic situation, air power as an army can be of more use to America than to any other nation. This thing that the Germans have developed is our spear, if we only claim it.

Take first our bomber situation. We are turning out bombers and assigning them to their respective services, the Army and the Navy, mostly the Army. The process is one of dispersal, with the bombers under the ultimate control of men who still think in terms of infantry and ships.

What we ought to do, without delay, is to create this new and distinct service, build up an organization to deal with technical problems just as the Navy has a free hand to deal with its own technical matters—in short, create a great air striking force of 10,000 bombers, protection fighters, air Army personnel, intelligence service, everything that is needed.

We do not mean by this that we should put all airplanes under such a command. The Army should have its own planes and the Navy its planes. We are talking about an aerial striking force to do the new job that has to be done in warfare.

America is spending the money now to do this job. It is creating the machines. But if it makes an error in organization, much effectiveness will be lost.

Are we to spend twenty or thirty billions and remain always just about a year behind? Let's wake up and get ahead.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 23, 1941]

POINTS A LESSON FOR UNITED STATES IN GLIDER INVASION OF CRETE

SAN FERNANDO, CALIF.—Hawley Bowlus, who taught the Lindberghs to glide, says the German glider invasion of Crete should be a warning for the United States to prepare for possible use of the same means of transporting troops.

Bowlus, glider pilot, designer, and manufacturer, has designed a glider large enough to carry 8 men. He estimated that a motorless craft to transport at least 25 soldiers could be built easily at a cost of not more than one-fourth that of an airplane of similar capacity without its engine.

A large bombing plane, he added, could tow at least three such gliders at 175 miles an hour.

Bowlus theorized that the attack on Crete is a dress rehearsal for a similar attempt on England. He has had recent word from Germany, he said, that factories there are turning out as many as 500 eight-place gliders a month, and that glider pilots are being trained in the open country of Rumania.

"There are two elements which make a glider invasion dangerous," he explained. "The silence of their operation and the fact that a glider train could have one or two ships assigned as carriers for guns, ammunition, and other material.

"It would be possible for a bomber to take up a train of eight gliders over France and for them to cut loose at a high altitude and cross the channel on their own, absolutely silent and virtually undetectable except by visual sighting."

Bowlus said he is informed that Germany has 100,000 qualified glider pilots, while only about 500 are registered in the United States. A glider pilot can be trained in 5 or 6 hours.

Strikes and the Defense Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 29, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN LEGION WEEKLY

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion Weekly in the current issue has written its thoughts on a highly controversial issue of the present time and I take the liberty of including the article under my extension of remarks:

[From the American Legion magazine]

STRIKES AND THE DEFENSE EFFORT

The appointment by the President of an 11-man National Defense Mediation Board, with representatives of industry, labor, and the general public among its members is a realistic approach to a problem that has been threatening to blitzkrieg our national-defense production effort.

The American Legion, composed as it is of every element of American life, has a tremendous interest in seeing that justice is done to both employer and employee, while the sorely needed planes, guns, and matériel needed in our national-defense effort are produced as fast as is humanly possible.

We want no stoppage in this national-defense work. We want no strikes against the national defense. The right to strike should not be abrogated, but the need to strike should be eliminated. There is no need for organizational or jurisdictional strikes now. Labor should not tolerate them at this time.

The real labor leaders of our own country have stated in no uncertain terms that the Communist, the radical, the saboteur, and the destructionists have no place in the ranks of established, organized, honorable labor; and thank God such leaders are in the majority. A determined public opinion should back them in tearing from the breast of labor this poisonous adder.

There are two principles in connection with our expanding national defense that should be kept clearly in mind. First, the object of our rearmament program is not to make a few millionaires or to swell the ranks of labor unions. The object of the program is to make certain that no matter how the situation abroad develops we shall be able to protect our shores and overseas possessions, maintain the Monroe Doctrine in all its vigor, keep the integrity and identity of the United States as a great Nation and insure to ourselves and our children a degree of well-being consistent with our resources and our position as a world power.

Second, industrial management and labor leaders must keep clearly in mind that national security is the commanding consideration of this historic hour, that every stoppage of defense effort menaces that security, and that therefore management and labor owe it to the people of the United States to exhaust every means toward a settlement of disputes before a plant is shut down. For more than a generation the United States Government has had machinery for conciliating differences between industry and the workers and the new defense mediation board broadens the base of that procedure. If in spite of all this, a strike closes down an essential plant, public opinion, rallied by what Woodrow Wilson used to call "pitiless publicity" of the facts of the case, will deal swiftly and drastically with the person or persons responsible.

Labor remembers how in 1917–18 the cost of living was always a jump ahead of wage increases, and working men know that in the present national-defense effort their demands must square with the facts of the situation if they are to be successful. There will be very little profiteering in our expanding national-defense effort, if the laws and regulations in effect are administered without fear or favor. As for the individual citizen of the United States, Mr. Micawber's famous reflection on the interrelation of happiness and income-outgo sounds like good sense: "Annual income, £20; annual expenditure, £19 6s.; result, happiness. Annual income, £20; annual expenditure, £20 6s.; result, misery."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ARTICLES FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES AND THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statements from the New York Times and the Washington Star with reference to the late Charles B. Timberlake, formerly a Representative from the Second Congressional District of Colorado:

[From the New York Times of June 1, 1941]

TIMBERLAKE DEAD; EX-CONGRESSMAN—REPRESENTED SECOND COLORADO DISTRICT, 1915–33; URGED EQUITABLE FREIGHT RATES—SOUGHT TARIFF ON SUGAR—WANTED LEVIES ON PHILIPPINE IMPORTS TO ENCOURAGE THE BEET INDUSTRY IN STATE

STERLING, COLO., May 31.—Charles Bateman Timberlake, Representative from Colorado for 18 years, died today at the age of 86.

Mr. Timberlake was born on an Ohio farm, of Scotch-English ancestry, attended Earlham College at Richmond, Ind., and came to Colorado, where he homesteaded and taught school.

A farmer and stockman himself, Mr. Timberlake championed such interests during his years in Congress. He fought incessantly for equitable freight rates for the Rocky Mountain region. Although he was reelected at each congressional election, his age prompted him to retire from the House of Representatives in 1933.

He leaves a widow, his third wife, whom he married in 1930.

Mr. Timberlake, a Republican, represented the Second Colorado Congressional District in the House of Representatives from 1915 to 1933.

One of his main objectives, which he was never able to completely carry out, was the levying of a high tariff and restrictions on the import of sugar from the Philippine Islands. Mr. Timberlake believed that such a step would greatly encourage the sugar-beet industry of the Rocky Mountain area.

Mr. Timberlake, after becoming a member of the Republican Party, took an active interest in local politics and served as superintendent of schools of Phillips County from 1889 to 1895. From 1895 to 1897 he acted as county clerk.

In 1897 he was elected recorder of the United States Land Office at Sterling, Colo., a position in which he served until November 1914, when he was elected Representative.

Mr. Timberlake, upon his retirement from Congress, returned to his home at Sterling, where he served as vice president and director of the Logan County National Bank. He was a member of the Masons, Knights of Pythias, Elks, and Odd Fellows.

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 31, 1941]

C. B. TIMBERLAKE DIES; COLORADAN, 86, HELD HOUSE SEAT 18 YEARS—LEGISLATOR, RETIRED IN 1933, CHAMPIONED EQUALITY FOR AGRICULTURE

STERLING, COLO., May 31.—Charles B. Timberlake, 86, who represented the Second Colorado District in Congress for 18 years, died today. A Republican, Mr. Timberlake retired from the House in 1933.

As a legislator, Mr. Timberlake concerned himself chiefly as a champion of the farmer.

A farmer and stockman himself, he believed in the equality of the farmer with the manufacturer. He once characterized the deflation in farm and livestock prices after the World War as "the greatest crime the Nation ever experienced."

While primarily concerned about his own district and State, he devoted himself to a study of agricultural conditions throughout the United States and exemplified his conscientiousness by canvassing his district to sound out his constituency on pending legislation.

SOUGHT SUGAR-IMPORT QUOTAS

With equal fervor, Mr. Timberlake studied the needs of the stock-raising and mining interests of Colorado. His was one of the first proposals to limit the imports of sugar from the Philippine Islands, put forth in the belief that only through such a restriction would the domestic sugar industry of the United States, centering in the Rocky Mountain region, be able to survive and flourish.

Born in Clinton County, Ohio, September 25, 1854, Mr. Timberlake was of Scotch-English ancestry. His parents, Alfred and Phoebe Timberlake, embraced the Quaker faith, and he also became a member of that church. From the farm he went to Earlham College at Richmond, Ind., for his higher education. Later he moved to Colorado, where he engaged in teaching. At 33 he homesteaded land in northern Colorado, subsequently moving to eastern Colorado to engage in farming and stock raising.

He served as county superintendent of schools of Phillips County, chosen county clerk, and as recorder in the United States Land Office here. He was elected to Congress in 1915. Thereafter, he was reelected at each congressional election.

Mr. Timberlake married twice. His first wife was Marguerite E. Fall, of Thorntown, Ind., whom he married in 1882 and by whom he had two children. His second wife was M. Catherine Ballard, of Washington. Representative Timberlake made his home here, where he was vice president and director of the Logan County National Bank. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity, Knights of Pythias, Elks, and Odd Fellows.

Of massive frame and strong features, Mr. Timberlake commanded attention on the infrequent occasions when he spoke in the House.

He was a member of the Ways and Means Committee. He voted for the McNary-Haugen farm relief bill and afterward, ever open to suggestion, readily admitted that some other form of relief legislation would perhaps meet the farm problem more squarely.

Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

LETTER FROM GABRIEL LUNDY, HEAD, AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS DEPARTMENT, SOUTH DAKOTA STATE COLLEGE, BROOKINGS, S. DAK.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House, I offer for the RECORD, the very thoughtful observations of Prof. Gabriel Lundy, head of the Agricultural Economics Department, South Dakota State College, on the subject of unemployment.

I would call special attention to these striking sentences in Mr. Lundy's letter:

The contemplated reorganization of all the different industries would call for representatives of the investors, labor, and the consuming public or Government on the general management body which would be formulating policies. This can all be done by democratic methods. If we cannot beat Hitler at the job of providing employment for everybody, our talk of defending democracy is not going to mean much to the rank and file of unsuccessful job seekers and poverty-stricken farmers.

If we continue simply to rely on a public-building program, grants to destitute farmers and W. P. A. jobs for the idle city workers, all financed out of taxes, our Nation will remain on crutches, economically speaking.

The letter follows:

SOUTH DAKOTA STATE COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND MECHANIC ARTS, Brookings, S. Dak., May 17, 1941.

HON. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CASE:

* * * * * *

Industrial unemployment is the big problem and challenge facing our democracy. This is more serious than the European war. We have never failed to defend ourselves successfully when attacked in war, but have quite consistently suffered defeat in our piecemeal, sporadic, and half-hearted attempts to solve industrial unemployment. As of December 1940, the National Industrial Conference Board estimated the unemployed at eight and one-fourth million. Furthermore, during the past decade industry has failed to absorb the surplus population from the farms, with the result that we have possibly 6,000,000 more people than desirable eking out a subsistence on farms. Hence, a large percentage of our population is ill-fed, ill-housed, poorly nourished, unhealthy, and ignorant.

The maximum per capita food consumption is limited physiologically. Improvements in technology enable a declining percentage of our population to produce all necessary food and farm-produced fiber. With a higher birth rate on the farm than in the cities, there should be a resumption of large migration from farm to factory. But first, industry must be ready to increase employment.

The per capita consumption of industrial products is limited only by production and economic buying power. Idle workers reduce both purchasing power and salable products. The expansion in industrial employment would create both increased demand for commodities and an enlarged supply of industrial products. The demand for farm products would also be increased, and a shift of surplus farm population into industry would increase the per capita income of the remaining farmers actually needed on the farms. Thus the standard of living of all could be increased.

One handicap now is that each firm, group, or industry is looking at the problem from the restricted viewpoint of narrow, temporary self-interest. They are not charged with the responsibility of formulating and following a long-time plan for the enrichment and strengthening of the entire Nation. Possibly some of our laws actually hinder the development of this more effective and efficient use of all our material and human resources.

Government encouragement and assistance is needed for industrial expansion of the magnitude here contemplated. Probably each entire industry, such as the iron and steel industry, for example, would have to be organized on such a basis that all the separate plants and companies would cooperate as a unit in assuming responsibility for the expansion and stabilization of employment in the industry. Gradually, and in unison, all industries could be similarly expanded as long as there were idle employable workers. If workers receive fair wages the market, or the demand for commodities, will expand step by step with the increase in employment. By the use of statistics of production and demand, it will be possible to adjust the expanding output to fit the expanding and expansible demand. Agriculture is now in a sense trying to do this through the A. A. A. A fair balance with respect to population, production, and prices would have to be maintained between agriculture and industry. Furthermore, extreme concentration of wealth would have to be prevented in order to give the mass of consumers sufficient purchasing power to buy the enlarged output of goods.

The contemplated reorganization of all the different industries would call for representatives of the investors, labor, and the consuming public or government on the general management body which would be formulating policies. This can all be done by democratic methods. If we cannot beat Hitler at the job of providing employment for everybody, our talk of defending democracy is not going to mean much to the rank and file of unsuccessful job seekers and poverty-stricken farmers.

Even if the Nation is fortunate enough to escape involvement in the current foreign wars, our economic problems will be made more difficult by the fact that we have failed to solve our unemployment problem. This is a drain on our national resources and an indictment of our vaunted industrial leadership. By solving our employment problems we would greatly simplify our problem of financing the defense program, because with full employment our national income and tax-paying ability would be greatly increased.

If we continue simply to rely on a public-building program, grants to destitute farmers, and W. P. A. jobs for the idle city workers, all financed out of taxes, our Nation will remain on crutches, economically speaking.

The post-war depression and unemployment problem, whether we succeed in staying out of the war or not, obviously will be serious when defense workers are laid off and soldiers are demobilized, unless the Nation by that time has a comprehensive plan for expanding productive peacetime employment.

For these reasons the most important problem facing our Nation, it seems to me, is that of providing productive employment for all employable workers in order that we may raise our standard of living and promote genuine democracy.

Because I know you are sincerely interested in the welfare of our great, and potentially much greater, Nation, I pass these suggestions on to you.

Sincerely yours,

GABRIEL LUNDY,
Head, Agricultural Economics Department.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS BY BRIG. GEN. FRANK T. HINES

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, at the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater, May 30, 1941:

Chairman Yaden, gold-star mothers, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, we meet again at Arlington—our national memorial shrine to courage, patriotism, and sacrifice.

Here lie before us the mortal remains of those men and women who have made the supreme sacrifice for their country while in the armed services. In contemplation of their great devotion, we necessarily must reflect upon our history—upon the progress we have made in the century and a half since the founding fathers, armed with their muskets, sallied forth bravely in defense of certain high ideals.

Quite recently, I stood before the beautiful monument, erected in the city of Indianapolis, as a tribute in marble in honor of Indiana World War veterans. Over the entrance door of the memorial were these words: "To vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the world."

As I stood before the memorial, I reflected upon the reasons why those men, in whose memory that marble edifice had been erected, had their names listed there. They had joined up to protect their country, I thought. "Had their service been effective?" I considered, because today we find ourselves again in a troubled world, where the cadence of the feet of marching men is heard, again going forth to vindicate the principles of peace and justice.

Those Indiana boys, I thought, fought for the freedoms which are America's—freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of conscience, and freedom of religion. They fought, in other words, for the true principles upon which this democracy of America has been erected.

We, in America, believe that all men and women should be free. They should be free to live their own lives in their own way. We only require that they, as law-abiding citizens, must have full respect for constituted authority.

We believe in majority rule, and the great majority believes in the Golden Rule.

All of the men and women whose bodies lie here in these hallowed graves in Arlington—from Revolutionary War battlefields, from the War of 1812, from the Mexican War, the Indian Wars, from the fields of valor, both North and South in the Civil War, from the Spanish American War, and in so much greater numbers from the World War—all, all fought for these democratic freedoms of America.

Are our freedoms again challenged? Time alone will tell.

America is inhabited only by free men and free women. No challenge to our freedom, if it be a challenge of force, will remain unanswered.

It is difficult for us, as citizens of this free America, to picture always to ourselves from the headlines in the newspapers or the announcements on the radio, just what is going on in other parts of the world, so distressed by warfare. We cannot always translate these announcements into terms of the deprivation of rights of individual men. We learn of bombed cities, ships sunk, and many battles in widely scattered places in Europe, in Africa, and Asia.

What we cannot see in our mind's eye are the dispossessed families, the homeless children, the orphaned children who may never know their parents' names—whole populations dislocated; people whose farmsteads may have come down to them through direct legal process for hundreds of years—lost overnight, and never to be regained, if the rule of aggressors persists.

Yet, in their years of peace, these people wished for, hoped and prayed—just as we do today—that they could live in peace, unselfishly, neighborly, and in secure possession of those things which they had won by their own labors.

It is hard for us to realize that such a situation could be brought about on the soil of America.

All right-thinking men and women hope fervently that this could not be. They also hope that it is possible for the people of other nations to have peace and contentment again, and that they may overcome those forces of greed, prejudice, and selfishness that have led men and nations away from the roads of peace.

Because Americans are honest, unselfish, neighborly, clean, and free—it does not mean that with these attributes of righteousness they can live in peace, unless all are prepared to defend it. Our fathers looked to God for their direction; there are some today who look to every other place but God. While we still print "In God we trust" on our money, many carry this idea around only in their pockets and should be reminded of this trust from day to day. Unless we are willing to practice these ideals, to unite for them, to prepare to defend them there is real danger that we will lose them.

For more than 150 years our Nation and its people have labored and prospered under the principles of the founders of our country. We remember the sacrifices made by George Washington and the principles that he believed in. We recall that our people believed in his integrity and followed his leadership. We have studied the aims and the work of Abraham Lincoln who preserved our Nation during the great struggle for national unity.

Our Nation has sent forth sons in the defense of these same principles when they were challenged abroad during the great conflict of the first World War. They have made many sacrifices so that our citizens may live in peace and prosperity, but, notwithstanding these efforts, our people are again confronted with a test of their patriotism and of their national unity.

At no time in our history has the need for a sound American citizenship been so great as it is today. At no time before has it been more essential that our people stand squarely united confronting the common danger, which is now bringing about death and destruction in many parts of the world.

Thousands of years ago China built a wall, and her people behind it felt safe and secure. Although the wall stood, her enemies were able to enter the gates, because of disloyalty on the part of gatekeepers. France, following World War No. 1 built a strong defense, the Maginot line, but that also proved to be a vain reliance. It is hard to conceive that she fell through lack of courage of her soldiers. It seems probable that intrigue from within and mechanized might from without were what caused France to fall. She was unprepared and not united.

We are committed in our form of government to abide by the decision of a majority of our people. While we may in honest debate have differences of opinion, when the decision is reached by the majority, America united, responds and follows our national leadership. A majority has already decided that it is necessary to have an adequate defense, and America, therefore, should and must stand strongly behind our President, in a policy of national defense so well coordinated as to be impregnable. We must do more by giving expected aid to those democracies still fighting for those principles in which we believe.

So it is essential that we bring about that type of strong national unity that spells close teamwork between Government, industry, and our people.

It is natural that some should differ on methods of achieving the desired result, but we should not have differences of opinion as to the desirability of getting the result we have already decided upon.

There can be no compromise with American citizenship. We either believe in the principles upon which our Government is founded, or we do not believe in them. If we do believe in those principles, we should stand up for them and be prepared to fight for them, if need be.

What is best for our Nation should be uppermost in our thoughts. We should sacrifice those things which would hamper the desire of the majority. When community interest requires united action for the protection of the ideals of our Nation, any conflicting desires must be put aside.

In the services here at Arlington and throughout our Nation at many other similar shrines we are paying homage to those men who did this very thing in time of national danger—men who responded when the Nation called, regardless of what it meant to them individually, who gave service to the Nation and those ideals for which it stands.

The real issue at this time is simple. All of us—the whole 130,000,000 of us—are confronted squarely with a great emergency, a historic crisis. Our President and the Congress have indicated how great this emergency is by word and by action. This is no time for minorities to argue as to whether the emergency exists or is great enough. This is no time to waste precious minutes and hours in debating procedures. We have selected our leaders to make our decision. It is for us to support them and do all in our power to play our part nobly and well.

In other words, we must have teamwork for national security, for a stronger and better American citizenship, so that we may have a chance to aid in reestablishing peace throughout the world and in maintaining peace in America.

Let our trust be in God, our loyalty to our country, and our faith in our fellow men.

The Meaning of Crete

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of May 31, 1941:

[From the New York Times of May 31, 1941]

THE MEANING OF CRETE

All the lessons of the amazing German victory in Crete will not be known until more details have been revealed and the whole story has been pieced together; but it is possible to draw one or two lessons of the first importance from what is already known. It is the most dramatic and clear-cut victory ever scored for air power. By all traditional standards the British appeared to have every advantage. Crete is an island some 60 miles from the nearest mainland; the British were in possession; they had an army there, with defended positions, artillery, tanks, and other heavy equipment; and they commanded the seas. They even had a small air force already based there. The Germans had no equivalent naval force; they did not have the tanks and other celebrated land matériel of their previous blitzkriegs. By air power alone they landed, equipped, and supplied on the island forces more powerful than those they opposed. Though the British were able to prevent sea landings on any important scale, they did so only at so heavy a cost to their fleet that they recognized long-continued defense of the island by sea to be hopeless. Crete had been made untenable.

The German victory at Crete gives no grounds for supposing that Britain itself could be invaded in the same way. It is protected by a huge army, by heavy mechanized equipment, and above all by the Royal Air Force, with the best pursuit planes in the world. The great difficulty of the British in Crete was that they did not have sufficient planes and airfields there to hold it; they were unable to get sufficient pursuit planes to the island, and, unlike the Germans, they had no mass aviation transports. But what the conquest of Crete does make clear beyond all doubt is that the British Navy is a far less important defense of England from invasion, and the R. A. F. relatively a far more important one, than traditional military opinion even up to a few weeks ago was willing to concede.

In that period we have seen not only the startling demonstration in Crete. We have seen the newest and most powerful battleship in the world, which a few days before had proved her power by sinking the largest ship in the British Navy, herself sought out and found by planes and made a helpless cripple by aerial torpedoes, so that the task of finishing her off by fleet shelling became almost perfunctory. The British Navy will be effective in protecting Britain from invasion only to the extent that it can itself be protected by a canopy of at least local air superiority. Without this local air superiority, we are now forced to recognize that the British Navy alone could not defend Britain today even if it were many times as large as it is.

But the conclusions to be drawn from all this are by no means wholly pessimistic, either for Britain or ourselves. Though it requires years to reverse an unfavorable naval balance, the reversal of an air balance is a far shorter task, particularly for a country like ourselves with the greatest mass production industry in the world. A mass long-range bomber program becomes more imperative for us than ever, both for our own "aggressive defense" and for that aid-to-Britain program which can help to make secure what is now the first line of that defense.

Federal Tax on Motor Fuel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

LETTER FROM THE LOUISIANA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, INC.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

LOUISIANA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, INC.,
University, La., May 26, 1941.

Hon. HALE BOGGS,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOGGS: As secretary of the Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation, I have been keeping up with the situation with reference to further increases in the Federal taxes. It is the opinion of my organization that such new taxes as may be imposed for the purpose of carrying on the national-defense program should be of such a character as not to destroy our system of private enterprise upon which the well-being of this Nation so greatly depends in our present emergency.

But, on the other hand, no persons should be allowed to make excessive profits nor should taxes be levied for purely punitive purposes. Our organization, composed of farmers, does not believe that the existing Federal tax of 1½ cents per gallon should be increased. The highway users of this country are already paying their full and proportionate share of all general taxes. In addition to that, they are contributing, in round figures, about $2,000,000,000 a year in special highway taxes of various kinds, Federal, State, and local. This sum is approximately equal to 14 percent of the total revenues accruing to all the units of government in the United States. Roughly speaking, State and local taxes on highway transportation amount to $1,500,000,000, while the Federal Government is collecting about $500,000,000 a year from this source.

State taxes imposed on gasoline now average 4.4 cents per gallon (here in Louisiana the tax is 7 cents per gallon). The existing Federal levy of 1½ cents per gallon brings the total to 5.9 cents (in Louisiana, 8½ cents per gallon). Adding another cent per gallon for Federal purposes would bring the average total to 6.9 cents per gallon (in Louisiana 9½ cents). At the present retail price of gasoline this would represent a sales tax of more than 50 percent (in Louisiana 76 percent).

So far as agriculture is concerned, motor transportation under modern conditions is not a luxury but an absolute necessity. More than 1,000,000 trucks, or about one-fourth of the country's total, are owned and operated by farmers. A recent survey discloses the fact that with the abandonment of many branch lines of railroads that are no longer profitable there are about 48,000 communities throughout the United States that are entirely dependent upon highway transportation.

The farmer must have his motor-vehicle facilities, and he does not feel that his use of the highways is a proper and adequate measure by which to determine his contribution toward the cost of national defense.

Some idea of the importance of the motor vehicle to the American farmer may be gained from the records of the United States Department of Agriculture, which show that approximately 27 percent of the butter, 29 percent of the eggs, 65 percent of the poultry, 40 percent of the fruit and vegetables, 62 percent of the cattle, 61 percent of the calves, 68 percent of the hogs, 29 percent of the sheep and lambs, and 50 percent of the mules and horses are now moved from farm to market by truck.

When the revenues derived from gasoline taxes are expended in improving and maintaining the highways, there can be no legitimate criticism. However, it must be kept in mind that much of the gasoline purchased by farmers is used for plowing, harrowing, threshing, filling silos, pumping water, operating spraying machinery, sawing wood, grinding feed, and for other purposes that do not involve any use of the highways. Many States properly refund tax to farmers on gasoline used in such ways as have been enumerated. Other States do not make these refunds. So far as the Federal tax on gasoline is concerned, no refunds whatsoever are made. To increase the Federal gasoline tax would, therefore, result in increasing the farmer's cost of production.

The cost of transportation constitutes the biggest single service that agriculture has to pay. The imposition of an additional Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline would make present excessive transportation costs on farm commodities just that much higher. This would be true of the more than 1,000,000 trucks operated by farmers themselves. It would likewise be true of common and contract carrier trucks that transport the products of the farm, and which haul supplies consumed on the farm.

I wish to further call your attention to the fact that Louisiana has more than $103,000,000 in outstanding highway bonds and is dependent principally upon the revenue derived from the State gasoline tax to pay off these bonds as they mature. Should the Federal tax on gasoline be increased and consumption curtailed, which is the result that is predicted by some economists, our State would suffer embarrassment of not being able to meet her road bonds as they mature.

The legislatures in half of the States feel that the intrusion of the Federal Government into a sphere of taxation developed by the States to provide funds for road improvement may be serious as to its effect on State finances, and have memorialized Congress to withdraw from the field of motor-fuel taxation.

I realize that you are extremely busy at the present time with very important matters, but feel that it is my duty to call your attention to facts that I think are very pertinent with reference to further increasing the Federal tax on motor fuel.

Hoping that the information contained herein will be of benefit to you, I remain,

Very truly yours,

MILTON C. TAINTER,
Secretary, Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation.

The Speech of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE WICHITA (KANS.) BEACON

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of May 28:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of May 28, 1941]

THE SPEECH OF THE PRESIDENT

To those who were looking for a declaration of war the speech of the President was disappointing. But to those who were looking for a cold and logical review of past events, a lucid analysis of this country's present situation in world affairs and a forthright declaration of the United States policy in regard to the war the speech was fully satisfying.

The declaration of an unlimited national emergency was the one step forward, the final act of leadership on the part of the Chief Executive, that the President has been urged to take to insure the complete cooperation of all elements of our national life. From Tuesday night forward the eradication of Hitlerism becomes the chief objective of this Government and this Nation.

The President made clear to Germany and to the rest of the world the action this country will take to resist Nazi aggression and where that action will be taken. It will be taken anywhere on the high seas where the traditional freedom of the seas is threatened. That is a direct answer to Admiral Raeder's recent warning against convoying. No nation—Germany or any other—shall drive the United States from the seas.

The President made clear that prompt action would be taken against any threat on the Western Hemisphere and he extended the defense limits of that hemisphere to the Canary Islands, the Azores, and even to Dakar. In view of the President's analysis of our defense area, a clash with Hitler is almost certain if and when he breaks out of Europe into West Africa.

Our aid to Britain will be continued and increased. And more important, the naval forces, and if necessary the military forces, of this country will be used to insure the delivery of this aid. The President declared American warships are already patroling the Atlantic and that they will continue to do everything necessary to insure the delivery of material to the British. Convoying will not be employed because changed conditions make the convoying system obsolete but the newer and, we presume, the more efficient methods of ocean delivery will have the cooperation of the United States Navy.

In the domestic field the President made it clear, even beyond his declaration of national emergency which gives him unlimited power over production, that there must be no selfish interests interfering with the industrial defense efforts. Capital must cooperate, must not take excessive profits, but, more important, labor must abide by the mediation efforts and decisions of the governmental officials and boards set up for their protection. The President made it plain that stoppage of work will not be tolerated.

His respects were also paid to that small group, some of them sincere persons, who still harbor the illusion that Hitler is the kind of a person that self-respecing men and women can deal with. From the stand taken by President Roosevelt Tuesday night this country can no more negotiate with the Nazi dictator than can the Churchill government in England. In America, as well as in England, it must be "Quislings" who will barter with Hitler in the extreme event he is victorious in his dream of world power.

The position of this country has now been made plain, not only to citizens of the United States, but to the entire world. Without a declaration of war this country is dedicated to the task of defeating Hitler in any and every way that defeat can be accomplished. If that be war, then Hitler must make the most of it.

The President is to be congratulated on one of the greatest addresses of his administration, great in its clarity and logic, great in its appeal to the American people, great in its insistence on the rights of this Nation, no matter where they may rest.

Antiwar Petition of Committee of Volunteer Women Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

LETTERS TO THE PRESIDENT AND HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

DE PERE, WIS., May 23, 1941.
The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, District of Columbia.

MR. PRESIDENT: The signatures on the enclosed petition have been hastily gathered by women workers of Green Bay and De Pere, Wis., who have volunteered their services to satisfy a general demand by women in this area.

They represent the wholly voluntary expression of 99.9 percent of all the women who have been approached in the limited time available.

The response has been overwhelming and spontaneous. No opposition or discouragement has anywhere been encountered—nothing but prayers for its success.

These signatures, nearly 1,000 of them, are only a start—more will follow as rapidly as they can be gathered.

Respectfully submitted.

ELIZABETH M. WELLS,
ROSE SCHULDES,
VIRGINIA TROWBRIDGE,
Representing the Committee of Volunteer Women Workers.

DE PERE, WIS., May 30, 1941.
Hon. JOSHUA L. JOHNS, M. C.
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For your information and guidance, we are enclosing herewith a typed copy of a petition with its appended signatures, the original of which was sent by registered mail to the President of the United States together with the letter you will find attached.

The petition was mailed in two installments, the first on May 23, the second today. Other signatures are being gathered as fast as the calls can be made. They will be forwarded later.

This is a purely spontaneous effort made by volunteer women workers, without any organized backing of any kind. It represents the unhesitating and undoubted sentiment and opinion of every woman called upon with but one exception out of a thousand.

The signatures came from all ages and positions in life. They represent every group.

We beg you to use this information to help you make it clear to our Government that the women of America are overwhelmingly opposed to war and to the proposals referred to in this petition.

Respectfully yours,

ELIZABETH M. WELLS,
For the Volunteer Committee of Workers.

Defense of New York-New Jersey Area Deplorably Weak—Should Be Strengthened Immediately

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 27, 1941

LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I addressed to the Secretary of War, under date of May 31, 1941:

MAY 31, 1941.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Recently I completed a 3-day inspection trip of Army camps and forts in the Second Corps Area, and, believing that my observations should be of interest to you, I pass them on for your consideration.

At the outset, let me point out that, as a World War veteran and as a member of both the Military Affairs and Dies Committees of the House of Representatives, I appreciate the need for secrecy. On the other hand, I deem it important to acquaint the American people, as well as yourself and the committees of which I am a member, with facts which you and they should know and which will be of no aid to other nations. Further, I think it highly essential at all times not to follow a policy of fooling the people.

FORT DIX

My visit took me first to Fort Dix at a time when the Forty-fourth Division, under the command of General Powell, was on maneuvers in southern New Jersey. While at Dix, I conferred with Colonel Dowell, camp commander; Major Sexton, plans and training officer; Major Floryck, camp ordnance officer; Captain Karakas, chemical-warfare officer; likewise Maj. John Sharpe, of the One Hundred and Fourth Engineers, Forty-fourth Division. After conferring with these officers, I made a tour of the camp, visiting barracks, mess halls, recreation centers, ordnance depot, and ammunition magazines.

A most deplorable state of affairs was found in both the ordnance depot and in the magazines, there being practically no reserve supply in either. It was usually one of this and two of that. In the magazines there was a great shortage of small-arms ammunition, while there was no ammunition at all for some larger weapons, nor any fragmentation hand grenades. Likewise, in the ordnance depot there was no reserve supply of automatic rifles, machine guns, or antitank guns, and absolutely no reserve supply of field pieces. The ordnance officer estimated that in the whole camp there were probably only 80 rounds of small-arms ammunition per man, which, when you consider the amount of small-arms ammunition used in automatic and machine-gun fire, you can well imagine the very short length of time which would be consumed to fire the entire stock on hand. The post ordnance officer seemed to be more concerned with a shortage of 1,000 17-jewel watches and field glasses, both for officers' use, than about anything else.

The reserve supply of everything in the Dix magazines would be insufficient to repel even an internal disorder occurring in some neighboring industrial center. There is hardly enough small-arms ammunition on hand for ordinary guard duty.

What ammunition and powder there is is stored in four buildings of wooden construction built in World War days. These buildings are on a plot of about 1½ acres surrounded by steel wire. The only guard, day and night, at these magazines is a lone soldier armed with a pistol. This guard is required to report to the guardhouse every 30 minutes by telephone, the guard being inside of the wire fence while the telephone is located on the outside, necessitating the opening of the gate every 30 minutes and easily permitting an entrance at night. As far as I could determine, about the only things which this fence and guard could keep out would be stray dogs and cats.

The barracks at Dix were reasonably well kept and of satisfactory construction, although in some cases the flooring had already begun to wave and the roofing had begun to roughen. Some mess halls appeared to be untidy, caused mostly by the use of soft coal in the kitchen, which in a few months had darkened both floors and walls. Many of these kitchens are supposed to accommodate some 125 men and yet each kitchen contains two large ice boxes where in most cases one would easily be sufficient. I noticed that in many kitchens one ice box was not used at all.

Another observation which I made at this post concerned milk, all milk on the post being purchased from a local distributor who holds a virtual monopoly. The milk is purchased by the Army at the rate of a half-pint bottle per day per man, whether to be used or not. I was informed by an officer that the milk costs 5 cents per half pint; bottled, 20 cents per quart; and, according to officers stationed at the post, is grade B. The milk situation at Dix appears to be a racket and certainly should be investigated, particularly when at Fort Monmouth, only a few miles distant, the price paid per half pint is 3¾ cents, or 14 1/10 cents per quart, for grade A pasteurized.

Officers at Dix report that the War Department has been reducing the allotment of training ammunition to the post by one-third; that no fragmentation grenades are on the post; that 12 pontoon boats and 20 trailers belonging to the One Hundred and Fourth Engineers were standing idle during maneuvers of the Forty-fourth Division because of a lack of trucks with which to haul them.

The chemical warfare officer reported that there was no adequate gas chamber on the post and that there was no money available for building such a chamber, but I learned from a different source that considerable money has already been expended for such nonessentials as a new wing on the officers' clubhouse.

As a result of the shortage of ammunition, the troops of Dix have been unable to even have one round's firing in certain of their weapons, such as antitank guns, and in small arms firing they have had no practice in firing at a greater distance than 200 yards. I was unable to find one antiaircraft gun in the entire fort.

NEW JERSEY MANEUVERS

From Dix I went to the maneuvers of the Forty-fourth Division, where I witnessed the One Hundred and Fifty-sixth Field Artillery, the One Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry, the One Hundred and Fourth Engineers, Division Headquarters, and certain other units in action. Both men and officers appeared to be keenly interested in the work. The morale of the troops good, and both the officers and troops, even with inadequate equipment, well trained.

I would give special mention to a Captain Adyasuna, of the Medical Corps, who gave an excellent demonstration in completely setting up in the field, ready for emergency use, a first-aid station in less than 10 minutes. This unit was most efficient.

While the equipment on the maneuvers, other than Garand rifles, was deficient and antiquated, nevertheless it was well camouflaged and well handled. I think, though, to use 75-millimeter guns and 155-millimeter howitzers against approaching ships, as was the "problem" at Atlantic City, is just plain silly. Further, there was not one single antiaircraft gun to defend any position from air attacks.

While inspecting a 37-millimeter antitank gun on the road, the enlisted men at the gun reported that it had yet to be fired. In fact, while the troops had had 37-millimeter antitank guns for many weeks, they had yet to see their first ammunition.

Other observations which I made at both Dix and on the maneuvers were that recreation facilities at the fort were fair and that general sickness was below average (the average, as I understand it, is 5 percent and the post has been running about 2 percent). Venereal disease is not prevalent (out of 842 men in the One Hundred and Fourth Engineers, only 1 man is afflicted with venereal disease).

There was some criticism about the field rations served to the troops and, if one evening meal I had was any criterion, improvement is warranted. This meal consisted of two slices of crushed bologna, one boiled potato, two slices of bread, a few sliced carrots, a cup of coffee, and a dish of bread pudding. The greatest criticism I heard about the food was that there was an insufficient supply of meat and an oversupply of starches.

FORT MONMOUTH

Early in the morning of the second day I visited Fort Monmouth. I was met at the gate by an M. P. officer, who directed our party to divisional headquarters, where we were met by Lt. Robert Evans, G–2 and public-relations officer. At headquarters we conferred with General Van Duesen, commanding officer of Monmouth; Col. Roger B. Colton, in charge of Signal Corps laboratory; Capt. Leon Fields, assistant executive officer; and Lt. Col. Edgar L. Clewell, post executive officer.

We first toured the reservation, and on this tour I made the following observations:

1. No hand grenades available.
2. Not a single antiaircraft gun.
3. Only about 60 gas masks on hand.
4. Short about 100 trucks.
5. Barracks, mess halls, and various areas in excellent condition and very clean.
6. Sixty rifles on hand in the entire post for some 10,000 soldiers and trainees.

The laboratory is naturally one of the most important spots on this post and is the nerve center for the entire United States Army. Officers estimated that the equipment in the laboratory would be valued at between $30,000,000 and $50,000,000. Protection against sabotage inside the laboratory is good. There has been no evidence of sabotage or attempted sabotage to date, but among the civilian employees, 80 percent of whom are selected by civil service, there are some known Communist sympathizers. An effort has been made by the authorities at Monmouth to have these employees either discharged or transferred, but to date approval has not been granted.

The weakness at this laboratory in connection with the guards is on the exterior. Thirty civilians (civil service) guard the outside of the laboratory building and are at all times on guard, but the laboratory itself is only partially protected by fence. The guards carry pistols only. At night or day no guards are on the outside of the fence. The intelligence officer estimates that if the laboratory were destroyed it would retard the entire defense program of the United States by at least 7 months, so valuable are the instruments and other material in the laboratory.

I recommend to you that the War Department immediately appreciate the need of detailing an entire well-equipped regiment of infantry to furnish an outside guard for this laboratory at all times, that the fence be electrified and extended to surround the laboratory, that floodlights be thrown on the laboratory and the laboratory area as well. Strictest supervision is also essential in that the theater should not be open to the public. No one should be permitted to enter the reservation after dark unless on official business and unless a pass has been issued by the commanding officer. A closer check should be made on civilian employees. All employees entering and leaving the building, as well as all visitors, should be searched. The present system, for example, of not examining lunch boxes of employees is dangerous and should be stopped.

Another glaring weakness is the fact that outside vendors, such as milkmen, laundrymen, soft-drink vendors, etc., are not guarded as closely as they should be. The present system would permit delivery of time bombs in milk cans or concealed in trucks. The driver could abandon the truck near the laboratory.

Considering the vital key position which the laboratory plays in our defense program, no time should be lost in guarding it more carefully and affording better protection.

Likewise, antiaircraft guns, of which there are none now, should be mounted and ready for action all over this reservation, there being no post near to Fort Monmouth that has a mobile battery of antiaircraft guns which could be called upon for quick protection.

Fort Monmouth is the only training base in the entire country for Army carrier pigeons. About 1,900 of them are on the post. The trailer lofts permit quick transportation in event of attack at other points. The system is excellent, but weakness lies in the fact that all of the pigeon carriers for the Army are concentrated at Monmouth. A disease epidemic or sabotage might wipe out the entire flock.

The Communist Party is undoubtedly active at Monmouth. I learned of one employee working in the laboratory who has been writing letters in code to a leader of a Communist organization, telling of laboratory work and secrets. I know of three other cases of known Communists who are being watched and who have been taken away from vital areas. One Communist was detailed by outside Army authorities to the Aircraft Warning Division, where the highly secretive new machine is being assembled. He has since, however, been assigned to another post. It is impossible to understand how such a person could be placed at this most vital spot.

Fort Monmouth in the main, however, is a credit to the United States Army. The command is excellent, the discipline and I. Q. of the men of the highest. Both officers and men throughout the post are to be commended.

FORTS HANCOCK AND TILDEN

Practically no fixed armament received at these most strategic outer defenses of the New York harbor since the World War. Most guns on hand, though very old, are in good shape. Twenty-four hour alert at all batteries.

The lack of modern equipment, including antiaircraft, some classes of ammunition, and directors and height-finders for antiaircraft batteries, and searchlights, is pitiful. The amount of small-arms ammunition at both of these posts would last less than 1 minute in actual combat. Small-arms ammunition is now coming in in dribs and drabs, there being at the moment only about 100 rounds per man on hand of .30 caliber ammunition. Old Springfield rifles are still being used. Only 49 hand grenades on hand. No gas chamber—they use only gas-training masks.

One major-defense position, armed with a 155 milimeter rifle battery, has no sighting devices. There is no rifle range at Fort Tilden and men have not yet fired small arms since they have been in training. There is very little camouflage for batteries at either Tilden or Hancock. No casements or camouflage for heavy guns. One antiaircraft battery which has been in position for months has not yet received any directors or height-finders, so if this battery ever had to go into action, it would be like firing at wild ducks with blank shells from a shotgun. Incidentally, the ammunition for aircraft batteries would last about 3 minutes.

There is needed in the bay a restricted area to permit long-range target practice, but there is also dire need for subcaliber ammunition so that all gun crews could have continual firing practice. There are also needed some 100,000 sandbags for buttresses; now using flour bags which break when damp. Little barbed wire on hand.

There is a good supply of ammunition for 10-, 12-, and 16-inch guns.

Both the Communist and Nazi organizations have also made inroads at Hancock and Tilden, and it is not understandable why the Army should not thoroughly investigate new recruits before sending them to such strategic coastal-defense positions. A change in the system is needed so that men from reception centers at Forts Dix and Upton, who are known to be sympathetic to either communism or nazi-ism be not sent to such important forts as Hancock or Tilden. A more detailed report on the inroads of all these camps by un-American groups will be supplied by me to the Dies committee and to G-2 of the Army.

At Forts Hancock and Tilden, I found the enlisted personnel well trained, the command excellent, the morale of both officers and men high; and, while working with deficient equipment, they are nevertheless prepared to go into action at a moment's notice. General Gage, commanding officer of these two forts, is doing a splendid job.

CONCLUSION

These are the things that I have seen. They are not hearsay. They come from official sources, and I make the following recommendations on the basis of the information I have transmitted to you:

1. As I have said, the morale and spirit of the troops and selectees are excellent. They are working hard and faithfully to prepare themselves to defend the United States. Surely men with this spirit are entitled to the fighting chance which comes with having adequate equipment for, as we all know, in war as it is fought today, courage and physical condition can mean nothing unless they are accompanied by superior equipment. If this war has taught us anything, it is that superior equipment determines the victor.

Therefore, these vital positions defending Greater New York must at once be given the tools with which to do the job.

2. I have shown that subversive agents have been assigned to key positions in these forts. In time of emergency they could wreck the entire defense of the New York area. Therefore, the War Department should see to it that such men, if they must be taken into the service, be assigned to less critical places and that anywhere they are their activities be most carefully scrutinized.

Furthermore, Army authorities should have complete power of supervision, and dismissal, over the activities of the civilian employees on the posts.

3. Strategic nerve centers, ordnance depots, and ammunition and powder magazines at these forts, which at the present time are inadequately guarded, should be given immediately the protection that is so vital to the safeguarding of Army secrets and Army operations, and in this connection coast-defense fortifications should be more carefully camouflaged, and both physical and personnel arrangements made to guard all areas.

4. The total lack of antiaircraft defense in these posts at the present time means that the defenders would be helpless in the face of air attack. This might have the effect of making the positions useless in time of emergency and should be remedied quickly. Further, a more efficient and more pliable working arrangement should be instituted between the coastal positions and nearby supporting air forces.

5. In view of the importance of the New York industrial area, with its large defense plants, its shipping facilities, its tremendous population, its important warehouses, its railroad connections, and its airports, its bridges, power plants, and waterworks, all of which make it the most vital in the defense of the whole Nation as well as for sending aid to Britain, it is imperative that the practice of transferring for export of big guns from these fortifications be discontinued, at least until replacements are at hand.

Only if these things are done can we feel confident that the New York-New Jersey area is adequately defended.

Respectfully submitted.

The Norfork Dam, To Be the Fifth Largest in the United States, Is Now Under Construction on the White River in Arkansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE NORFORK CELEBRATION (LAYING OF THE CORNERSTONE) BY HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS, OF ARKANSAS

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, on May 22, there was held at the site of the Norfork Dam, now under construction on the North Fork of the White River in Arkansas, a huge celebration, attended by some 12,000 people. I insert in the RECORD the address which I made on that occasion:

What we shall say here today is of little importance but that which we have come to celebrate will live with the ages.

We are especially honored that the man who is recognized in Washington and throughout the country as the father of the reservoir method of flood control is with us. It was he who many years ago foresaw the failure of the levee system of control and began advocating holding the waters upstream. It was he also who many years ago advocated the development of hydroelectric power in dual-purpose dams. The man of whom I speak is our own United States district judge and former United States Senator, your friend and mine, John E. Miller.

Except for sections of the country that have been given special attention, such as the Tennessee Valley, the development of projects like this must take place under general authorization laws and general appropriations. For some reason, yet unexplained, the White River not only was never given special attention, it was never given equal treatment under the general laws.

For 2 consecutive years now I have heard the chairman of the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives ask the United States Army Engineers, "Is there a stream anywhere between the Appalachians and the Rockies, except the Tennessee, that has the power possibilities of the White?" And twice I have heard them say, "There is no stream that compares with the White."

The White River, draining as it does all or parts of 44 counties in Missouri and Arkansas, covers a territory of 28,000 square miles—only 12,000 less than the celebrated Tennessee. Twenty-one thousand of those are in the uplands; 7,000 are in the rich alluvial plains below Batesville.

In the valley live an estimated 750,000 people. The average rainfall ranges from 44 inches in the upper to 52 inches in the lower basin. The soil in both the uplands and the lowlands once was very fertile, but erosion resulting from cultivation has taken away one-third of the upland soil. So poor in fact have much of these lands become that the deposits now made upon the lowlands in flood time are a distinct detriment. The average direct flood damage in the valleys of the White, as estimated by the Army engineers, is $2,185,000 annually. This does not include the damage by our waters below the mouth of the White nor the damage by erosion.

If the present process of destruction goes on unchecked for one more century it is estimated that our upland population will decrease by at least a third, for the peril has just begun.

There is perhaps no community in the basin of the White which has not at some time given up one or more of its sons or daughters swept to their death in the raging floods of the White or its tributaries. There is not a farmer in the valley nor a businessman who is not suffering by our past policy of neglect in dealing with this stream.

The Soil Conservation Service and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration are doing splendid work in soil conservation but they have hardly scratched the surface.

The Norfork Dam, with a total capacity of 1,983,000 acre-feet, will store 732,000 acre-feet of floodwaters. This is equivalent to keeping the floodwaters off of 732,000 acres of land for a depth of 1 foot.

Only disaster undreamed of can prevent the Norfork becoming a reality. It was authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1938 for flood control only. Built for that purpose alone it would cost approximately $15,000,000.

Five other projects on the White were authorized at the same time, including the Clear Water Reservoir on the Black River, a tributary of the White, in Missouri. That dam is well under way, but we were crippled from the beginning, for although the Congress authorized the six to cost an estimated $58,914,000 for flood control only, it at the same time placed a limitation of $25,000,000 on the total construction, hence only two could be begun. Worse still, the Congress failed to authorize power production in Norfork, or any other.

POWER

We started to work early in the fall of 1938, and I say "we" because many of us worked on it and I deserve no special credit, for everything I did it was my duty to do. We went to work, determined that we should get some dirt started moving. I came here, as you will recall, with Gen. Julian L. Schley, Chief Engineer of the United States Corps of Engineers, Col. Eugene Reybold, division engineer, and Col. Stanley L. Scott, the district, and now division, engineer. That was in the fall of 1938.

We set to work to obtain the funds with which to get Norfork under way and in the spring of 1939, after a fight, we managed to get $434,350 for the next fiscal year. This was really the beginning. It is much easier to get projects authorized than to get appropriations for them. In the spring of 1940 we obtained, as an item in the general bill, $1,450,000 for this fiscal year, and this spring we have obtained $2,700,000 for the next fiscal year. Nearly two millions have been spent already.

The most desperate fight we have had has been on the question of power. In the spring of 1939 I introduced legislation designed to add power facilities. The bill was referred to the Flood Control Committee of the House. That committee votes out nothing but general bills and any bill dealing with flood control, unless it is in some sort of authority, goes to that committee. There was no general bill in 1939; hence, it died. In 1940 I introduced H. R. 9037, designed to add power. We thought we were going to have a general bill and the Flood Control Committee incorporated my bill into the general bill and voted it out. About that time the President decided there should be no new authorizations and the general bill died on the House Calendar.

Week before last we again held hearings on the question of power at Norfork and authorizations for Bull Shoals, Table Rock, Lone Rock, Mill Creek, and Greers Ferry. Present at the hearing—and every one of them testified—were the chairman and 4 other members of the State flood control commission, its chief engineer, the chairman of the State agricultural and industrial commission, the secretary and 1 member of the State game and fish commission, 1 district and 6 county officials and 25 other prominent citizens from Baxter, Marion, Boone, and Searcy Counties. Clebourne and Independence Counties were also represented.

We are fortunate to have on the Flood Control Committee a member of Arkansas' delegation in Congress, Mr. W. F. NORRELL, of Monticello.

I am confident that we will get the power authorization for Norfork and I am hopeful of getting authorizations for some of the other projects at this session.

I am determined to tell you here a little story that has not been told before. The Budget for the Nation, as you know, is made up every fall. Late last summer I learned with sickening disappointment that the President had requested the Secretary of War to submit to him a list of all reservoirs in the Nation that the War Department considered as begun, and that later he had asked for a list containing only those projects on which the Government had already been obligated and that this was the list that was being studied by the Budget for the ensuing year. This new list did not contain Norfork and seven similar developments throughout the country. I contacted every Senator and every Member of Congress whose projects were likewise left out and we started seeing the President and wiring him and writing him. I hold here in my hand a letter from President Roosevelt, written to me on the 6th day of last September, in which he says, and I quote:

"The present plans make it possible to construct the Norfork Dam to a greater height than that required for flood control alone, in order that suitable provisions may be made for the future development of hydroelectric power. It appears desirable that the necessary authority for the higher dam be secured at this time, not only because of the savings to the Federal Government which would be accomplished by such construction, but also on account of the desirability of providing for the future installation of power-generating machinery."

To convince him that Norfork had to stay in the Budget and to thus obtain an appropriation for this year, we had to convince him first that the power that it would produce would be vital to the defense, and I read you again from his letter:

"In times of national emergency such as these, the importance of an adequate supply of electric power for national-defense purposes cannot be overstressed."

And so the Norfork Dam becomes Arkansas' first huge defense industry.

After all, it was reasoned, generators at Norfork can be producing power long before some of the battleships for which we are contracting can ever float.

We must not anticipate that the present war will end in 1 2, or even 3 years, and we must never again anticipate that there will not be another war.

Then there came the question of the height of Norfork. All I can tell you about that now is that, constructed for flood control only, Norfork would have been only 191 feet high; but the contract was let to build the dam 220 feet high and that is the power dam. Its total cost, with generating facilities, will be approximately $28,000,000.

Norfork is being constructed for an initial power installation of 60,000 kilowatts and an ultimate installation of 120,000 kilowatts. It will produce annually approximately 200,000,000 kilowatt-hours. At the average price of electricity in Arkansas today, the power from Norfork would pay for the total cost of the dam in less than 30 years. If it sells at less than the present price—and it surely will—the people will still get the savings and it will in the end cost the Government nothing. When the Norfork and several other projects are developed and tied together with a system of transmission lines, and when we have been able to firm up the peak power of these dams with the cheap oil and gas and coal from western and southern Arkansas, we will be selling power, we think, at rates even lower than those of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

We have among the highest power rates in the Nation. For instance, here at Mountain Home the first 25 kilowatt-hours cost $1.98. At Tupelo, Miss., under the T. V. A. rates—and I am quoting here from the Federal Power Commission figures—25 kilowatt-hours cost 75 cents, as compared with the $1.98 at Mountain Home.

Furthermore, the people of the T. V. A. region are using more than twice as much current, because of the low rates, as we are using and, therefore, their savings are twice as much. The irony of it is that we are using T. V. A. power right here today.

It is not a question of whether the rates in Arkansas are too high. The point is that as long as they are two and three times higher in Arkansas than in our neighboring States, new industries will not come to us and very few will grow up among us and our country will not be developed and our population will not grow and prosper.

MINERALS DEPEND UPON POWER

The minerals of Arkansas today far exceed those of Tennessee. In oil, in gas, in coal, in zinc, in aluminum, in manganese, in mercury, in lead, in glass sand, and in timber products we are far ahead. She surpasses us in the outstanding ones only in phosphates and marble, and we have unlimited deposits of each of these. Tennessee's industries are growing and increasing by leaps and bounds, faster even than T. V. A. can supply the power.

There are more than 2,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity possible of production from the streams of Arkansas every 12 months, not only on the White but on the tributaries of the Arkansas and the tributaries of the Red, including the Ouachita and Little Missouri. Facilities for steam plants to produce cheap power and to build the peak power of these dams into firm power, plants to be fueled with coal and oil and the cheap gas of our State, are as inevitable as are the dams themselves.

INDUSTRIALIZATION

A proper industrialization of Arkansas is as vital almost as agriculture itself.

Only 20 percent of the people of this Nation depend directly upon the soil for a living. In Arkansas 60 percent depend directly upon it.

The Nation's per capita income is $536. Arkansas'—and we are third from the bottom—is $244 (1939). The per capita income of any State is almost the exact inverse ratio of the number of people depending directly upon the farm. In other words, as our industries increase so will our per capita income. I hold in my hand a letter from the President of the Reynolds Aluminum Co., dated February 21, saying that he would like to locate a plant in Arkansas, "but power is the deterrent."

The high-power rates of Arkansas have kept us from being allocated several defense plants. If I were not in position to prove this, I wouldn't say it.

Arkansas stands out today as the No. 1 State of this Union in all the potentialities of its undeveloped resources and the forty-sixth State in per capita income.

High-power rates constitute barrier No. 1 to our proper industrial development.

On December 6 the Federal Power Commission wrote President Roosevelt that a definite shortage of power was developing in the Arkansas-Louisiana-Mississippi area. And I heard Chairman Leland Olds of the Commission testify last week that the needs of the national defense require an additional 10,000,000 kilowatts of power now.

PUBLIC WORKS

The Norfork Dam will furnish work for some two to three thousand men from 3 to 4 years. Nothing like that has ever come to this country before. The construction will be going on, no doubt, long after this war is over, and at a time when we will need this one and many others like it to help take up the slack in the economic chaos that is bound to come with peace.

RECREATION

The Ozarks have long been noted as a recreational center but the chief tourist attraction is water and the Arkansas Ozarks have no lakes. The Norfork, when completed, will provide one of America's most beautiful freshwater lakes here in a natural setting among these rugged hills, a pool more than 40 miles in length, lying in two States, a lake for fishing and boating and swimming, one in a great chain of lakes that, to use the words of President Roosevelt, will build the Ozarks into America's No. 1 playground.

NAVIGATION

And with the completion of Norfork and several of the other projects will come a regulated stream-flow that in turn will give us navigation for certain commodities peculiarly fitted to that type of transportation, navigation that will indirectly increase traffic on the railroads and highways.

CONCLUSION

Rivers, unchecked, have become paths of destruction; controlled, they are tools of democracy.

We can build all these dams either under the general authorizations and appropriations or under a special authority. If we proceed under the general bills, it will likely take half a century and our losses during that time would be increasingly terrific. We can build them under a special authority in well under a decade. The Tennessee Valley Authority is now 6 years old and the Tennessee is almost completely harnessed, but whether we build them one way or the other, these projects are on an interstate stream as are those on the St. Francis, the Arkansas, and the Red Rivers. Once they are built there must be some Federal authority to operate them scientifically, and by whatever name it is known, it will be very similar to the proposed Arkansas Valley Authority.

Once constructed they will eliminate our barrier No. 1.

With your help we are making a desperate effort to get still other projects under way.

Dam construction promises to be one of Arkansas' largest industries during the next decade.

And so you and I have the satisfaction of knowing that we stand at this hour at the gateway of a new frontier, witnessing the beginning of the construction of a long-time development that shall bring to our State a new day in agriculture, in commerce, and in industry—new hope and new inspiration—the antithesis of defeatism—democracy at work.

Employment of W. P. A. Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

LETTER FROM LESTER W. HERZOG

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a letter I have received from Mr. Lester W. Herzog, New York State administrator, Work Projects Administration, Albany, N. Y., explaining eligibility rules for employment of W. P. A. workers. I think it is well to emphasize that existing law provides for employment of persons who are referred as in need of relief by public-welfare agencies, and it is not necessary for an applicant to be in actual receipt of relief assistance before he can qualify.

Mr. Herzog's letter follows:

[Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration of New York State (exclusive of New York City)]

ALBANY, N. Y., May 29, 1941.

Congressman ALFRED F. BEITER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BEITER: I understand Congressman TABER has accused this Administration of employing W. P. A. workers who have not received direct home relief, and further understand that Congressman CANNON will probably answer this on the floor.

I believe you are fully aware of the very strict regulations in effect in this Administration, and I am sure you will be interested in the fact that, because the act permits it and because we can do it within our quota, we have now broadened our eligibility rules to accept persons who are certified by the welfare departments but who have not as yet been actually granted a relief order.

I give you this information, due to the fact that questions might arise and, because it is New York State, you might become involved, and I think, if so, you certainly know how strict we have been in our assignments to W. P. A.

Very truly yours,

LESTER W. HERZOG,
Administrator.

Classic Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW ORLEANS TIMES-PICAYUNE

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I beg to introduce an editorial which recently appeared in the New Orleans Times-Picayune relative to a Supreme Court decision in connection with the 1940 congressional primaries and which I believe will be of interest to the Members of this House.

The editorial follows:

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune]

CLASSIC CASE

The civil liberties of voters in Federal primaries as well as in general elections are protected by the United States Supreme Court decision in a Louisiana case, in which it stated: "A primary election which involves a necessary step in the choice of candidates for election as representatives in Congress and which in the circumstances of this case controls that choice, is an election within the meaning of the constitutional provision and is subject to congressional regulation as to the manner of holding it."

The interpretation is sound. Had it been made earlier in Louisiana history, one of the hydra heads of State dictatorship would have been lopped off. Its immediate effect is to subject to trial five defendants charged with ballot-count irregularities in the congressional primary of September 10. The facts in the case are still to be established. It was not by accident, we are informed, that the defendant, Patrick B. Classic, was named first in the indictment; the temptation to be able to refer to this case as the "classic" one, literally as well as figuratively, powerfully impressed the staff of the United States attorney.

In many elements it is classic. Political bias was not conceivable, much less subject to any credence. Alleged changes in the ballot count favored T. Hale Boggs, an unquestioned exponent of good government and election purity. He did not need the votes allegedly thrown to him. They could not have been other than embarrassing to a candidate who has heaped his share of derision on the old machine practice of "goose-egging," or nearly goose-egging, the opposition, apparently for the sake of show alone. Alleged changes in another race involved favored a woman candidate also backed by the coalition of antidictatorial forces.

In the national field the decision is so far-reaching as almost to stagger the imagination. If it is not entitled to the appellation "classic" in that connection, it will be because it was reached by a vote of four to three. The Chief Justice took no part in the consideration, and the ninth place in the Court is still unfilled. Hence no more votes actually were mustered for the principle that Federal primaries and general elections should be the same thing as far as civil rights are concerned, than were cast in the indecisive Newberry case of 1921.

Resolutions Adopted at National Defense Meetings in Atoka and McCurtain Counties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

LETTERS OF TRANSMITTAL AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT NATIONAL-DEFENSE MEETINGS IN ATOKA AND McCURTAIN COUNTIES, OKLA.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD letters from Hon. Nelson Newman, Atoka, Okla., and Hon. Bill Kuykendall, mayor, Idabel, Okla., together with copies of resolutions adopted at national-defense meetings held recently in these two towns in my district.

I am proud of the loyal support given our great President by my fellow citizens and their spirit of true Americanism as expressed in these resolutions.

The letters and resolutions follow:

GUARANTY ABSTRACT CO.,
Atoka, Okla., May 19, 1941.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
United States Congressman

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Appreciative of our privileges and duties, 1,000 American citizens of Atoka County, State of Oklahoma, assembled, unanimously adopted and respectfully urge your consideration of our expressed views disclosed by the enclosed resolutions.

Respectfully,

NELSON NEWMAN,
Chairman of Atoka County Defense Committee.

Resolution adopted by Atoka County citizens' mass meeting, Atoka, Okla.

To. Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
United States Congressman:

Be it known to all that we, the God-fearing, freedom-loving citizens of the United States of America living in Atoka County, Okla., do hereby assemble ourselves, by the grace of God and under the rights, privileges, and responsibilities guaranteed by our Constitution, for the purposes of considering the serious problems that affect and threaten the continuance of our democratic way of life and the perpetuity of our Nation.

Because we love peace and want to share its blessings with all mankind we declare the following principles and purposes, and recommend the same to our national leader, President Franklin D. Roosevelt; to our Congress; and to our fellow citizens throughout the Nation.

1. Curtail or eliminate nonessential production to release labor, materials, and plant facilities for maximum speed in producing all adequate defense needs;

2. That capital and labor immediately be forced to subordinate personal gains, as a million draftees have done, to concentrate on every effort toward proper national defense; and

3. That we and all other liberty-loving Americans be called upon to pledge sacrifices for defense and liberty.

Adopted on this the 7th day of May 1941, at Atoka, Atoka County, Okla.

NELSON NEWMAN,
Chairman of Atoka County Defense Committee.

CITY OF IDABEL,
Idabel, Okla., May 23, 1941.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR WILBURN: Under separate cover I am sending you the signed resolutions and amendments as adopted by the McCurtain County national-defense mass meeting held in the stadium at Idabel, Okla., May 11, 1941.

This meeting was a very enthusiastic gathering of the leading citizens of the country and was held with the serious thought of standing behind the Government in the all-out aid to Britain or to any other democracy striving for peace and freedom.

Yours truly,

BILL KUYKENDALL,
Mayor.

Be it known to all that we, the God-fearing, freedom-loving citizens of the United States of America, living in McCurtain County, Okla., do hereby assemble ourselves, by the grace of God and under the rights, privileges, and responsibilities guaranteed by our Constitution, for the purpose of considering the serious problems that affect and threaten the continuance of our democratic way of life and the perpetuity of our Nation.

Because we love peace and want to share its blessings with all mankind, we declare the following principles and purposes, and recommend the same to our national leader, President Franklin D. Roosevelt; to our Congress; and to our fellow citizens throughout the Nation.

First. Curtail or eliminate the nonessential production to release labor, materials, and plant facilities for maximum speed in producing all adequate defense needs.

Second. That capital and labor immediately be forced to subordinate personal gains, as a million draftees have done, to concentrate on every effort toward proper national defense.

Third. That we and all other liberty-loving Americans be called upon to pledge sacrifices for defense and liberty.

Adopted on this the 11th day of May 1941.

WRIGHT CITY, OKLA., May 7, 1941.

We, the undersigned citizens of Wright City, Okla., adopt these resolutions with the following amendment attached, to be presented at the county-wide meeting to be held at Idabel, Sunday afternoon, May 11, at 2:30 p. m.

Amendment: That we go on record opposing strikes and that they be eliminated at all costs. And whereas we are 100 percent in favor of convoying ships to Great Britain and any other democracy fighting for freedom.

Adopted: May 7, 1941.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address given by me at Arlington Court House, Va., at the Memorial Day services conducted jointly by the John Lyon Post, No. 3150, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Arlington Post, No. 139, American Legion, and broadcast over station WWDC, Washington:

We have paused for a few moments to pay tribute today to those who have fought to make our Nation great and freedom a living creed in the world. These men had an abiding faith in the righteousness of their cause and the ultimate destiny of our country. They believed that here in America was the finest haven of freedom in the world and the home of that principle which recognizes the worth of the individual and his right to the pursuit of happiness. To defend that right they gladly gave their lives. What a mockery of that faith to send our young men to be slaughtered again in the useless carnage of a foreign war. In the last World War, Americans fought to end all war, and yet what an unholy fraud was practiced upon them. Shortly, it became all too apparent that, instead of banishing war, the seeds of another conflict had been sown and democracy was fast withering. Are we again to be plunged into the fight to save Europe from itself?

The passions and heat of battle from the Civil War have long since departed into the pages of history, but the brave deeds and self-sacrifice of these men will continue to live in the hearts of all true Americans for ages to come. Now that time has healed the old bitterness, we can all take pride in the courage and steadfastness of these men, clad in blue or gray, who fought valiantly for principles in which they so earnestly believed.

Now in this hour when the clouds of war again hover over most of the earth and threaten to engulf us, we know full well if war strikes, no one will be spared. The mother and child, the sick and the aged behind the lines are in as mortal danger in modern warfare as the man at the battle-front.

While we pay tribute to those who fought in battle, let us not forget the others who sacrificed in the long dread hours—the mothers and wives keeping lonely vigil at home. Nor should we forget those who labored on the farm and in the factory to keep flowing a steady stream of food and supplies—a nation giving its all.

Our liberty was not purchased in the international marketplace; it was bought with the blood and toil of patriots.

Let us renew our pledge to care for the widow and the orphan whom those brave men left as a sacred charge upon the gratitude of the Nation. An even greater duty rests upon us to see that we do not wantonly and recklessly again cause mourning in the homes of America for husbands and fathers sacrificed upon the altar of war.

In this hour let us hope that an enduring peace may yet be achieved in this warring world. The men whom we honor today fought and suffered to achieve peace. Peace founded on justice is the only path to progress and prosperity. War not only destroys the lifeblood and resources of a nation but leaves a terrible aftermath of depression and misery in its wake. Before we again plunge headlong into the dark whirlpool of strife we must be sure that we are fighting in defense of America. Much as we may abhor the barbarism and complete disregard of human values in other lands we should recognize the tragedy of hurling ourselves into the abyss.

We cannot help but realize that only in free America is it possible to gather in meetings of this kind and exercise the right of free speech. Now as the war fever rises we have to be more diligent than ever to insure open and full discussion of the grave problems affecting every American. It is not too late to see that tolerance and understanding, rather than bigotry and persecution, are necessary if we are to maintain our strength and morale in these critical times.

We must beware of the subtle propaganda of those who would lead us into war to serve their own selfish ends. What shall it profit this country to save the world and lose its own heritage? I say to you here and now that we can best serve ourselves and humanity by maintaining inviolate our free institutions here at home. And to that end, realizing our sacred obligation to defend America at all costs, I pledge to you that as long as I represent the people of the State of Illinois in the halls of your Congress, I will not cast my vote to sacrifice the flower of American youth in any foreign war.

St. Lawrence Gateway of Delusion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. WALTER C. PLOESER, OF MISSOURI

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to address the Nation on the subject of the St. Lawence seaway project over the Mutual Broadcasting System on Wednesday, May 28, 1941. The following are my remarks:

The St. Lawrence seaway project before the Congress would create great injury to our national welfare in more ways than one. On May 5, this year, I told the Nation by means of a coast-to-coast broadcast that the treaty—which is being called an agreement—between Canada and the United States would surrender control over Lake Michigan, thereby internationalizing an all-American lake. I said then that on this occasion I would discuss the injury to American labor and industry. It is well to again briefly explain the nature of this project.

The billion-dollar Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway is a plan to open the Great Lakes to ocean traffic and international trade by building a 27-foot channel through the Lakes and river from Lake Superior to the mouth of the St. Lawrence River in Canada.

This seaway, as projected, would be built jointly by the United States and Canada, with the bulk of the cost falling on the American taxpayers. Aside from the cost, this project, if constructed, would enable foreign nations, with their control of the world's shipping and their cheap labor, to invade our own great inland industrial and agricultural empire. It would, therefore, irreparably damage American labor, agriculture, rail transportation, motor transportation, and industry in general.

Because the proponents of this measure claim benefits, some of which are ridiculous, many of which are misstated, I have chosen to entitle this discourse with you this evening "St. Lawrence Gateway of Delusion."

In 1934, when the President urged the approval of the St. Lawrence Treaty before the Senate, he said in his message, "Broad national reasons lead me, without hesitation, to advocate the treaty." It is interesting to note he then called the subject a treaty, but since the Senate failed to ratify he now calls the same subject, rewritten recently, an agreement. I remind you that the Constitution requires a treaty—and it really is a treaty—to be approved by a two-thirds' vote of the United States Senate, while the devious method being used today is to approve the same subject by a simple majority vote of the House and Senate under the false title of agreement. Except for the fact that this circumstance cannot be overemphasized, it has no particular point in our principal phase of the subject at the moment. The President went on in his message to the Senate in 1934 to say, "There are two main considerations, navigation and power." Then we are to believe that according to the President, the two main reasons for building the St. Lawrence seaway are, "navigation and power." Both involve long-range planning, because the treaty calls for 8 years for completion.

Obviously, therefore, the proponents' present claim for defense is completely eliminated by, first, the President's own written words, and, second, by the very conditions of the treaty. Therefore we shall not at this moment worry or concern ourselves about the defense argument, except as it affects the use of necessary labor and materials which are so badly needed for true defense projects. In passing the defense argument for the present, it is only fair to mention to the American taxpayer that it would be a tremendous injustice to him to charge him an extra billion dollars for any project labeled "defense" which is not defense.

Now, if navigation and power are the real reasons for the seaway—and they are—then both reasons are economic. Both reasons affect trade, commerce, industry, and labor. The principal concern to Americans is whether or not the project will be economically beneficial. I am to deal now with the navigation phase only.

Opening the Great Lakes to world trading vessels directly affects other transportation facilities of the Nation and accordingly, and in like proportion, affects the many industries linked to these transportation facilities. When these industries are affected adversely it follows, as simply as the day follows the night, that all labor connected therewith is adversely affected. In addition, all retail and wholesale suppliers of the people employed in these industries suffer. Let us take a very simple example, a town of 5,000 people. This community, we shall say, is a main-line railroad town with a small factory manufacturing motortruck parts. Along comes an act of the Government, which creates an economic situation which causes a tremendous loss of business to both the railroad and trucking business. What happens to this town? It is very plain that with the railroad business curtailed, if not discontinued, and the trucking business in the same situation, this community suffers a terrific blow, and every person in it suffers accordingly without any compensating benefit. This injury spreads throughout the Nation like a cancer affecting every person, who, directly or indirectly, is in any capacity serving these lines of commerce.

Specifically, as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway, injury would be severely felt in the railroads affecting every person who has anything to do with the building, maintenance, or operation of a railroad. Why? Because cheap foreign-vessel shipping rates would take business from all Gulf of Mexico and eastern seaboard shipping ports and also from Pacific coast ports, and transfer that business or commerce to the mouth of the St. Lawrence River in Canada, up the St. Lawrence into the Great Lakes and into the very heart of our great inland industrial and agricultural empire. This would seriously affect our great established system of transportation as well as all the cities, large and small, which they touch, as well as the surrounding agricultural country feeding these cities.

Specifically, the St. Lawrence seaway would affect the great coal industry of America in two major ways. It would greatly diminish the need and demand for coal used by the transportation industries and would likewise open the Great Lakes to the importation of cheaply mined foreign coal, with which our coal producers could not hope to compete. This would cause the reduction of coal mining wages to the level of the virtual slave wages of foreign coal miners. Such a condition would be a virtual calamity in the coal industry, and labor would be the greater sufferer.

Specifically, the iron-ore industry of America would suffer. Importation of foreign ores from Brazil, Chile, Peru, Cuba, and other foreign countries in large quantities through the proposed St. Lawrence seaway, would have a ruinous effect upon the iron-mine operators, shippers, and smelters. It might eventually seriously impair the self-sufficiency of the steel industry of the United States and thereby, in the event of another world crisis, jeopardize our national security.

It is well to briefly review the economic significance of the Lake Superior iron-ore industry. The market for Superior iron ores is confined primarily to the Great Lakes and upper Mississippi Valley region. The industry now supplies about 86 percent of the iron ore consumed in the United States. In 1937 it shipped over 61,000,000 tons of ore to domestic consumers and over a million tons to Canadian furnaces.

The same year over 20,000 persons were employed in the Lake Superior iron-ore industry, receiving wages of about $32,000,000; the industry paid approximately $30,000,000 in State and local taxes, there was invested approximately $300,000,000 in the mines and these supported the operation of 195 blast furnaces within the United States.

The total investment in mines, railroads maintained by the iron-ore business, and the lake vessels carrying that trade, exceeds $600,000,000. The industry pays in wages and in ore-handling charges nearly $150,000,000 a year. This is exclusive of investment in 35 unloading docks on the lower lake ports where the ore is consumed or from where it is shipped by rail to inland furnaces. These unloading and rail facilities represent an investment of many additional millions of dollars, employing thousands of workers annually.

The Lake Superior iron-ore mining industry alone supports 74 cities, villages, and towns. All these communities would suffer great injury.

Specifically, the St. Lawrence project would tremendously injure the great inland-waterway system of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers. It would throw into waste the many millions which the United States Government has already invested in the development of these waterways.

This project would seriously injure the entire Mississippi Valley territory, which is immense and covers practically all of the Midwestern States from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

I will not go on naming the many more industries affected. I do emphasize that when we open the Great Lakes to foreign sea traffic we permanently damage our own well-established lines of commerce, and we open our Inland Empire to cheap imports, thereby causing unknown injury to all American labor and business.

I said at the outset that my reference to the so-called defense claim of this project would be only as it affects the use of necessary labor and materials which are so badly needed for true defense projects.

Since the St. Lawrence seaway is being submitted to the Congress and the people as an urgent defense measure, it is necessary to have a greater understanding as to the quantity of labor and material involved. Because of the prodigious size of the undertaking it is obvious that many thousands of skilled and unskilled workmen, engineers, and technicians of all kinds would be required, together with hundreds of contractors, contracting organizations, and all kinds of mechanical equipment. In the International Rapids section alone some 92,000,000 tons of excavation would be required, over 7,000,000 tons of concrete would have to be used, besides huge quantities of earth fill.

If the work were evenly distributed over a period of just 7 years, at least 43,000 men would be required daily at the site and behind the lines furnishing materials and equipment. Undoubtedly, the daily requirements during the peak period of construction would exceed 60,000 men. If all of the work required for the entire project is carried on at the same time, at least 100,000 men would be required for the work every day for a 7-year period.

According to the very claims of the administration in its rush to produce urgent defense weapons and supplies, we could not divert this labor or material to any such project which does not in any way contribute to demands of the present home-defense emergency.

The more this project is analyzed, the plainer it becomes that it is a pet spending project and a form of pork barrel waste being pushed and rushed at this time in the hope that it might get through under a false banner of defense.

This St. Lawrence seaway project, which I prefer to call the St. Lawrence gateway of delusion, would ultimately spend more than a billion dollars of the American taxpayers money to promote a condition which would not benefit—but instead injure—the business of the Nation. Industry and labor, as I have already pointed out, would suffer as the result of this plan. The people are entitled to know the whole truth. Making that truth known is part of my duty as a Member of Congress.

I am hopeful that the people of this Nation will let their Representatives and Senators in the Congress know of their opposition to this untimely and poorly chosen St. Lawrence seaway project.

National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 3 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. TOM CONNALLY, OF TEXAS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered last night on the Radio Forum by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the subject of national unity.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The civilized world is tonight living under the Damocles sword of armed might. Suspended by a single thread above the liberties of civilized men are massed armies equipped for modern wars. Argosies of the air with multiplied thousands of armored aircraft, with destruction and death in their touch, swarms of submarines lurking in the dark with deadly weapons in their hands, searching the sea lanes to assassinate human beings and to destroy vessels without warning and with merciless and bloody purpose. Civilized nations are challenged either to submit to a single master who directs these engines of death and destruction or to suffer being overrun, conquered, subjugated, and enslaved. These are not idle statements. These are not distempered dreams. These are not wild flights of imagination. Look at Europe since the war began in 1939.

Austria was commanded to join the Reich. Her Government refused. Hitler's legions swarmed over her and overwhelmed her. She was locked in the iron manacles of submission. Czechoslovakia was challenged. She refused. The thunderbolts of armed might subdued her before she could strike. Poland, upon her denial of demands of the dictator, was left in smoking ruins, in devastated and wrecked cities, with a soldier's foot upon her neck. Neutral, peaceful, inoffensive Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, whose only crime was to possess lands which the cupidity of Hitler desired, and liberties which he wanted to destroy, without warning were overrun, conquered, subjugated, and enslaved. Bulgaria and Rumania, first penetrated and saturated with the deadly virus of Nazi influence and under the threat of military force, succumbed to Nazi power. Yugoslavia was harried and machine gunned and bombed and beaten into abject submission. Greece, invaded by Mussolini, in a campaign in which Italian armies with vastly superior numbers were defeated and driven in flight before the gallant Greeks, was at last bombed and battered by Nazi legions until the classic land where Homer sang and Demosthenes thundered against the tyranny of Philip, and where Greek poets, dramatists, and artists and sculptors gave to all the centuries the imperishable gifts of their genius and culture, now lies broken and shattered, in ruin, with the heavy heels of Nazi conquerors upon her ancient liberties.

These events are part of the history of our times. They have not been lifted from the pages of some thrilling volume of fiction. They are not from the chapters of some military and naval writer, predicting what might transpire in some future war. They are not the creation of some poetic mind, soaring on the wings of fancy. They are facts. They are realities. They have happened under our own eyes.

If these things have happened to weaker countries, will they not happen to any other nation, except for the armed might of other nations to resist the waves of aggression and conquest? Does anyone doubt that England, if conquered, will be subjected to an even more tragic fate than that of nations already conquered?

If England should fall and her Navy should be captured, the legions and the navies and the swarming vultures of the air, under the direction of Hitler and Mussolini, would, no doubt, as soon as they should feel strong enough, attack the western world to incorporate us into the new world order and to imprison our institutions and economy in the ancient bed of Procrustes, making our pattern neither longer nor shorter than the pattern which their tyranny might prescribe.

Why will not their military desires reach out to the western world? They reached and encompassed most of Europe. In the Western Hemisphere lie rich lands and great wealth. Here is the citadel of free government which is the deadly enemy of their governmental conceptions. They have done these things in Europe. Why will they not do them in the western world?

Armed might, overpowering navies, and superior forces of aircraft, are the only things that stand between the western world and the mad ambitions of Nazi and Fascist conquest.

These things face America today. They face the whole Western Hemisphere today. They face the whole civilized world today. The United States must let the world know, and must let Hitler and Mussolini and all the Axis alliance of greed and cruelty, and military and naval power, all the Axis compact of aggression and mastery, know just where America stands and just what America purposes to do.

President Roosevelt, in a notable and epoch-marking speech, from the White House on May 27th, gave utterance to the national policy of the United States. The President, under our Constitution, is our leader in the field of foreign relations. In times of stress and peril, we must have determined leadership. It must be definite. It must be clear in its objectives. It must be firm, and it must have behind it the united support of a mighty people.

The President reaffirmed America's traditional policy of freedom of the seas—the freedom of our people to send our ships out upon the seas in accordance with the sanction of civilized nations through the centuries. To surrender the freedom of the seas the United States would be imprisoned within its own boundaries, economically and politically. Hitler and Mussolini cannot dominate the world unless they first master the seas. England now bravely stands in their way. If Great Britain should be conquered, we alone shall be face to face with menacing challenge.

The United States, since Yorktown, has stood for freedom of the seas. Under President John Adams, our Navy resisted European depredations upon our commerce. In the distant Mediterranean, our Navy suppressed the Barbary pirates. In 1912 and in the World War, America adhered to this ancient doctrine. We shall not now surrender nor retreat.

The President, as our national leader, made it clear that we shall resist the efforts of Hitler and Mussolini to extend their influence, their power, or their domination to the western world or to gain control of the seas.

When the repeal of the arms embargo was before the Senate, I prepared and secured the adoption of a preamble, expressly reserving to the United States and its nationals all of their rights and privileges under international law and set forth that the act restricting their shipping was purely a domestic regulation and that we reserved the right to repeal, change, or modify that act as the interests of the United States might dictate. By the Neutrality Act we gave up nothing of our international rights; we surrendered not a jot or tittle of them.

The American people have pledged aid to Britain, and the Congress has translated their desires into legislation. We have pledged military and naval equipment, shipping and supplies to Great Britain. We must, we shall keep that pledge. We must speed supplies across the sea. We must speed production more and more. We have pledged to all of the republics of the Western Hemisphere the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine—that no European power, that neither Hitler nor Mussolini, nor any of their allies shall acquire a single foot, nay, a single inch of territory in the western world.

In crisis the American people will rededicate themselves to Americanism. Thrilled by the sacred memories and shrines of our patriot fathers, out of whose sacrifices and blood this Nation was born and preserved, we pledge anew to protect and defend our country, our liberties, and our institutions. We shall maintain our naval and military forces in readiness to drive back any act of aggression.

President Roosevelt called for national unity. The President, as leader of the Nation, sounded a rallying cry to every element and every group and every portion of the American people. I believe that the American people will respond—will respond with enthusiasm and with a spirit of fervent Americanism—to the President's leadership and to the vitality and vigor of America's lofty purpose.

Our task is gigantic. We are standing at a momentous period in the fate of the human race. All the lights of history are beating down upon us, all the mighty upheavals of the centuries, all the stirring chapters of man's groping and struggling toward liberty and self-rule come ringing down to us through the years. The blood of our fathers commands us to hold the line. We shall, by God's help, hold the line.

We are now building a Navy great enough to dominate both the Atlantic and Pacific. For years I have advocated such a Navy. We must have a Navy strong enough to dominate all the seas. In armed strength we must rely.

We have been shocked by the report that France may give military or naval aid to Hitler and Mussolini. If France gives any military or naval aid to Germany, the United States should seize Martinique, French Guiana, and other French territories in the Western Hemisphere.

The staggering sums which we have appropriated will require not alone sacrifice in service by our people but will demand much more burdensome taxes. Our people are willing to bear these added burdens, are willing to shoulder these heavy responsibilities. They demand that there shall be no scandal or waste. We shall not tolerate swollen war profits in Government contracts. If industry extorts an undue profit because of speed and the Nation's need, it must be recaptured by taxation. Wealth and money and industry owe a duty to the Nation. They must not shirk. They must not be permitted to shirk.

Men who work in the production of munitions and arms also owe a duty to the Nation. The President said, "A Nation-wide machinery for conciliation and mediation of industrial disputes has been set up. That machinery must be used promptly and without stoppage of work." The President means that strikes in defense plants must stop. Production has been delayed by strikes and labor disputes. I hope they may stop through voluntary action, but stop they must, if necessary through governmental action. There is no right to strike against the Government of the United States in the hour of the Nation's peril.

In a national emergency, there is one paramount Union, there is one supreme Union, and that is the Union of these 48 States, the United States of America. That Union must rule or democracy must perish.

There will soon be set up a civilian defense organization in every locality in the Nation. Civilians may and should serve in suppressing un-American and foreign influences, and sabotage and other activities, inimical to the national safety.

President Roosevelt's address has received the commendation and approval of the great body of our people, and of the press. Wendell Willkie, the Republican candidate for President in 1940. Gov. James M. Cox, the Democratic candidate for President in 1920. John W. Davis, the Democratic candidate for President in 1924, and Gov. Alfred E. Smith, the Democratic candidate for President in 1928, have all given ringing approval to the President's assertion of American rights and obligations and America's purposes in the present crisis. They call upon all Americans to follow the leadership of the President. We cannot achieve our lofty purposes or our noble ends without unity or without granitelike resistance to the aggressions and to the ambitions of Hitler, Mussolini, and the Axis Powers.

We must produce more supplies and more airplanes. We must work more shifts in our factories. We must rush more arms and ammunition to England. We must maintain the freedom of the seas. We shall defend America with everything that we have.

To the President's thrilling and stirring address, to his leadership, the American people respond. They respond in loyalty to American ideals and American traditions. They respond in fervid determination to preserve things American—they respond with a firm and immovable resolution that democracy shall not die; that freedom shall not perish; that Great Britain's gallant stand for democracy shall not be overwhelmed; that the western world shall be preserved and defended against every attack, every danger, and every threat from the mailed fists of as cruel and heartless a band of conquerors as ever roved the high seas when pirates reigned on the seas and bloody bandits ruled on the land.

Ideologies for Export

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 3 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY STUART CHASE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Progressive on Saturday, May 31, 1941, written by Stuart Chase, entitled "Ideologies for Export."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Progressive of May 31, 1941]

IDEOLOGIES FOR EXPORT

(By Stuart Chase)

As I write, the military situation never looked darker for Britain. Many of my planetarian (interventionist) friends admit this, but it does not get them down. They come back briskly with the moral strength of the democracies. They say guns do not count as much as "the imponderables." The imponderables are the evidence of things not seen. We shall triumph, they say, because we bring the four freedoms to a world writhing under the lash of conquerors. We appeal to the conscience of mankind, and we cannot lose.

Dorothy Thompson looks at the ruins of the last major air attack on London: "This war is to stop the destroyers of civilization in their tracks. To defend the Abbey, the British Museum, and the Commons. The Abbey stands; the museum lives; the Commons meet. Because the human will cannot be broken."

This reads magnificently. It makes one forget about shortages in bombers, ships, and tanks. It stirs the blood. But will it stir the victims of aggression? Will they rise up and join the great crusade?

HOW ABOUT THE LITTLE MEN?

Who are the victims? They are some 300,000,000 little men—farmers, peasants, shopkeepers, industrial workers, clerks, mechanics, railwaymen, and their families utterly sick of insecurity, unemployment, political chaos, and the threat of being bombed out of their beds. On top of this great mass of common folks is a thin layer of writers, artists, professors, and other intellectuals.

There is no question about the victimization of the intellectuals or of the Jews in Germany, as well as in the occupied countries. All reports from refugees confirm the savage onslaught made upon their freedom of expression, often upon their very lives.

How much are the little men, the peasants, workers, shopkeepers suffering? They are the people who really count if our ideological battle is to be made concrete and eventually won. The plans for victory all bank heavily on revolt by the little men. What have we to promise them that is superior to Axis promises of a new order in Europe?

They must be inspired with the conviction that the American way has more to give them than the dictators have. They must believe in our definition of civilization. Unless this conviction is burning in millions of breasts, the little men will not have the courage to rise against the machine guns of their overlords. They must see clearly what Dorothy Thompson sees, and want it as she wants it.

IT HAS BEEN FOOD OR REVOLT

Here is the rub. We really have nothing to offer them but freedom. "What more do you want?" thunder the planetarians. But little men cannot eat freedom. They want much more than a bill of rights. If that is all civilization means, it is not good enough for them. This is a truth so fabulously immoral that few intellectuals are able to grasp it. Because they prize freedom of expression above all else they think that other classes in the community must do likewise.

This, however, is simply not so. The plain people of Europe have had relatively few whiffs of the Bill of Rights in the last 2,000 years. They have had wheat, pork, turnips every day, or they have risen in revolt.

We have nothing to sell but freedom.

We cannot sell the idea of full employment, for we have had 10,000,000 unemployed for 10 years, and all the world knows it.

We cannot sell security, for our farmers, sharecroppers, migratory laborers, Negroes, industrial workers, have been desperately insecure since the last war.

We cannot sell hope for young people, for we have 4,000,000 youngsters between 16 and 24 who are not in school and who have no work. This great army has been shunted right out of the American community and left there in the dark.

We cannot sell the American high standard of living, for a third of our people have not had enough to eat. Mr. Roosevelt has been hammering the point home for 8 years, with his concern for the forgotten man.

We can hardly sell equality of opportunity. Look at the 60 families.

We can hardly sell free enterprise. Look at the 200 corporations which control the output and prices of a majority of the things which American consumers buy.

We cannot sell world-free markets, in spite of the saintly devotion of Mr. Hull to the cause. Consider the Smoot-Hawley tariff, and the grim determination of American manufacturers to protect their output against cheap foreign imports at all costs.

WORLD IN REVOLUTIONARY PHASE

In short, what we have to sell is a set of abstract principles, a string of lofty words. When it comes right down to jobs, security, access to raw materials, hope for the forgotten man, if we are honest we can only hang our heads in shame.

The world is in a revolutionary phase. Little men everywhere are tired of being pushed around and half starved when they know that an economy of abundance is here. Political freedom will not satisfy them. The reestablishment of old national boundaries in Europe will not satisfy them. The fine words of Mr. Willkie, Dorothy Thompson, Bishop Manning will hit the tiny class of foreign intellectuals right enough, but will go clear over the heads of the great mass.

AMERICA'S UNIQUE POSITION

I happen to believe that we have something here in America which makes us the greatest nation on earth, with the greatest long-term future. Part of it is material—the land itself, its situation and resources. Another part is spiritual, if you like. But this spiritual part is something which cannot be sold, cannot be exported, cannot be lend-leased. It is indigenous to the continent of North America and would die in alien soil.

I refer to the fundamental democratic behavior of most Americans, the absence of inherited class divisions, the deep conviction that one man is as good as the next. This is not so much a matter of voting as it is a matter of day-by-day behavior along Main Street. It is deep in the folkways of this continent—Canadians have a measure of it, too—and is the product of three centuries of the frontier, the melting pot, and the great open spaces.

It is unique in human history, precious beyond rubies, and totally unexportable. Probably the only way other people can get it is to go through generations of pioneering in a similar environment. To identify our democracy with that of the British Isles is sociological nonsense. In Britain everyone has his place in the social hierarchy. You feel it 5 minutes after you get off the boat.

Our economic failures are lamentable and universally known. No other country took such a headlong collapse in the depression of the thirties. But these failures, in my opinion, are transitional. They are symptoms of the break-down of one era and the beginning of a new one. We are working through them, and the New Deal was the first attempt to meet them.

HALF-BAKED BISCUITS

We shall come out on top, if we are not engulfed by an interminable war overseas which drains our lifeblood away. For the moment, however, our economic renovations are like half-baked biscuits. They offer little appeal to foreign customers. Hitler banished unemployment, while we only succeeded in stabilizing it.

So here we are. From the strict military viewpoint, the outlook for Britain is dark, with no assurance that our joining the battle will materially improve it. We are unprepared to fight a two-ocean war. As Mr. Hoover pointed out, we may indeed have to cut down our aid to Britain, if we attack the Axis, because of bombers, merchant ships, supplies needed in the Far East.

We are equally unprepared to win by virtue of the "imponderables." We have no economic or social program with which to rouse the little men of Europe and satisfy their revolutionary aspirations. Our own programs are still in the half-baked stage. It will take several more New Deals to work them out. Britain has offered no programs at all, in any stage of baking—only bombs and blockade. We cannot export our "democracy," for it is a unique product of the American frontier.

I wonder what a French peasant in his blue smock thinks of our planetarians who now throw 40,000,000 Frenchmen into the category of totalitarian devils and propose to make war upon them, along with devils rampant in Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Spain.

Does Jacques believe that civilization will be saved by our bombing his family and blockading his food supply?

Prevention of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. WORTH CLARK

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 3 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] at Indianapolis on May 28, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Keeping this Nation at peace and free from foreign wars is the most patriotic service that Americans can render this Republic. The America First Committee, by these standards, deserves great recognition; and to every man, woman, and child here tonight who is fighting for peace, who is fighting for democracy, I say to you that the greatest glory comes not from battles won or lost but from wars prevented

Peace or war is not a partisan issue; it is an American issue.

This morning I read President Roosevelt's fireside chat. It was more than a chat; it echoed the sentiments of our war makers—of our Rockefellers, Morgans, Dorothy Thompsons, Stimsons, Knoxes, Walter Winchells—and all those who would sacrifice lives that are not theirs to give. These international bankers, jingoistic journalists, and fierce and warlike statesmen would plunge this Nation into war either because of their hate or fear of the little paperhanger from Berlin.

But I was informed over long-distance telephone that the President at his press conference today said he was not going to ask for a repeal of the Neutrality Act. And when asked how he was going to enforce freedom of the seas, he stated, "One way is to keep American ships out of places where they will be sunk." Which statement do you stand on, Mr. President—your warlike speech or your later statements to the press?

The American people hope it is the statement to the press.

In his fireside chat the President said, "The thing we have most to fear is fear itself." With that I agree. But, Mr. President, you sought to implant fear in the minds of the American people. Preaching fear has been the weapon you have used so successfully against your political adversaries. Beginning on March 4, 1933, you preached successively a fear of money changers, a fear of the economic royalists, a fear of munition makers, a fear of the lobbyists, and a fear of the Supreme Court. A year ago you began preaching physical fear—a fear that New Orleans and St. Louis and Denver were in danger of bombing raids. No man in all history, Mr. President, has exploited fear as you have exploited it.

Today, Mr. President, you have forgotten your fear and hatred of the economic royalists. You have forgotten your fear of the munition makers. You have forgotten your fears of reactionary Republicans, which you so fervently preached a few years ago. At this minute you are the leader of the Morgans, the Rockefellers, the Kuhn-Loebs, and the elder statesmen who want war but who are too old to fight. Wendell Willkie is your lieutenant. These, your new-found friends, join in praising the war program which you have raised in the ashes of social and economic reform. Aren't you, Mr. President, a little chagrined by your new-found friends?

Today, as of yesterday, by preaching fear and hate, you, President Roosevelt, are creating intolerance and bigotry. You are turning class against class, race against race, and sect against sect in a country where all races, classes, and all religions have lived together peacefully and tolerantly for generations.

I hate one-man government. I was denouncing Mussolini when Churchill was saying—1927: "If I were an Italian, I would be a Fascist." I was denouncing Hitler when Lord Halifax was shooting wild boar with Goering in Germany.

I am opposed to fascism, nazi-ism, or communism. If there are those within the hearing of my voice who prefer any foreign "ism" to Americanism, I say, go to Russia, Germany, or Italy; and stay there. I say to them there are those who have faith in American institutions, who have confidence in our ability to defend ourselves, who are not afraid to remain at peace, and who believe we can solve our domestic problems within the framework of the Constitution.

During the past month or two I have addressed public meetings from one end of this country to the other. In Cincinnati, in Denver, in Sioux Falls, in Butte, in Boston, and everywhere, east or west, it was the same; the American people are firmly resolved to avoid this war. If I know anything of public sentiment or the temper of the American people, I fear the fate of those who would take them into the hell of war today.

These American people were a cross-section of our population. They hate war today, as you, Mr. President, said you hated war in 1936. They cannot be discredited by your calling them bundists in 1941 any more than you were discredited by those who charged you with communism in 1936. These American people to whom I spoke were not pro-Nazi, pro-Fascist, or pro-Communist. They were simply pro-American.

No blood but English flows through my veins or any of my family. I greatly admire the English; they are smart people.

Today, with the identical tactics that preceded our entry into the first World War, they would take us into another World War.

Then, as now, they were fighting our war. Then, as now, we were to be enslaved. Then, as now, South America was to be invaded. Then, as now, the Germans wanted our country.

Who believes that if we were at war with a foreign power that England would give us her gold, her battleships, her planes, and tanks, and guns, as we give them to England today? And how many believe that if England offered us these gifts of vital military and naval supplies that she would say: You do not need to come after them; we will bring them across war zones to you, even if it means war for England.

I repeat, I admire the English. Wherever you meet an Englishman he is for England first. How I wish we had more Americans who thought of America first. No one has ever called the British silly, sentimental suckers.

They are realists. Listen to what a great English leader—Lord Palmerston—once said: "England has no eternal enmities and no eternal friendships. She has only eternal interests."

The American people resent the untiring efforts of the royal refugees and the British Ambassador to plunge us into war. They know that these royalists did not give their subjects the democracy they now implore us to save. They know that these royalists did not solve the economic and social problems in their lands. They know that when cannon roared and death rained from the skies these royal refugees seized their gold and departed for safer lands. They left their subjects to do the fighting and dying they would now have us do. Their pleas left the American people cold. And so now the President has been induced to lead the crusade for war.

The American people are still moved by noble emotions—but they learned 25 years ago, to their eternal sorrow, that there is no idealism in war. They learned, and President Wilson learned, that economic or political spoils, not humanitarian impulses, govern conquerors. They saw democracy sacrificed on the altar of international selfishness. They know—after fighting a war to make the world safe for democracy—that the four freedoms of our form of government cannot be imposed upon all the people in all the world. Democracy and freedom spring from within.

This Nation is prepared to "face hard, cold, fact." The American people want all the facts—and, with such a full and complete knowledge, they are prepared to decide for themselves. They do not want Mr. Churchill or Mr. Hitler, or even you, Mr. President, to make the decision. They still believe in a government of, by, and for the people. They want a government of law—not one of men—not of executive orders and decrees.

The American people demand a voice in government—a voice that is expressed by their duly elected representatives in the Congress of the United States. Significant, Mr. President, was your complete omission of any reference to Congress in this critical hour. Congress is still one of the three branches of our Government. It is your function to recommend legislation—treaties or policies—but it is the function of Congress to enact legislation—to ratify treaties or to make effective policies. In a democracy Congress or parliament is all important. In a totalitarian nation the parliamentary body is a sham, a mere form to cheer and applaud the dictator. The American people do not want to make of Congress a mere sounding board.

The President, in his most recent fireside chat, said we should be guided by hard, cold facts and not by sentiment or emotion. I agree wholeheartedly. But the President failed to give us all the facts. He failed to make clear his future course of action. Let us ask the President for some facts.

During your recent campaign for reelection, for a third term, Mr. President, did not you promise the American people that you would avoid war and maintain peace? Didn't you say at Boston, "And while I am talking to you fathers and mothers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again, your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars"?

Does your fireside chat last night mean, Mr. President, that you have repudiated this sacred pledge to the American people, even as Mr. Willkie renounced his promises as mere campaign oratory?

Didn't you promise the American people, Mr. President, that there would be no foreign entanglements or alliances? Have you since repudiated that by pledging England delivery of war goods? Does this mean, Mr. President, that you will wage an undeclared war in violation of the Constitution of the United States that provides that only Congress can declare war? Does your fireside chat last night mean, Mr. President, that you will attempt to fulfill the promises of Ambassador Bullitt to Poland that we would enter this war?

Why not tell the American people the facts about our defense program? Is it not bogging and breaking down? Why not tell the American people the fact that we have few planes suitable for combat fighting; that is, equipped with armor plate, adequate firing power, and self-sealing gas tanks? Why not tell the people that our Army is ill-trained, judged by modern standards of war? Why not tell the people, in short, Mr. President, that we are wholly unprepared to fight 3,000 miles from our shores?

And, Mr. President, why didn't you tell the American people that there is no possibility of a military invasion of the Americas? Aren't these cold, hard facts:

That our Navy is the mightiest in all the world—and that it is becoming stronger and stronger.

That the German fleet is inconsequential for long-range invasions and was designed for short-range fighting.

That to invade either North or South America the invading force would need a tremendously superior fleet.

That it would require at least 7 years for Germany to build a fleet that would equal ours.

That if the British Navy were to be captured tomorrow 1, 2, or more years would be required to train men to operate the vessels and then to integrate the units into a cohesive, fighting fleet.

That there isn't sufficient shipping in all the world today to transport an army of a million men and all their necessary supplies from Europe or Africa to the Americas.

These are hard, cold facts, Mr. President. They can be confirmed by almost any well informed military or naval expert.

Mr. President, is each of the following a hard, cold fact?

That many military experts believe that Britain has exhausted much of her air manpower?

That we, in combination with England, cannot land troops in Europe?

That England has lost every major battle?

That the only hope to bring American manpower and airpower to bear on the continent of Europe is to establish a front in the Near East?

That only 2,000,000 tons of American shipping are available for an expeditionary force?

That World War experience taught us that three gross tons were required per man of the expeditionary force?

With less complete control of seas—with mechanized forces, it is probable that 5 tons of shipping per man will be required. And, on this basis, the maximum American expeditionary force would be 400,000 men—a force wholly inadequate to maintain even the security of the air bases established once the expeditionary force and its shipping are committed to a near eastern effort.

How much can American tonnage be augmented by 1943, when we must supply the British with new ships continuously?

And Mr. President, isn't it true that if we were to enter the war today, we would have to fight most of Europe, the dominant Asiatic power, and likely, Russia? And that our entry into the war would mean years and years of conflict before victory?

Just as I know that this Nation can live in peace—just as I know that we in the Americas could repel and throw back any invading force—so do I know that American labor—American industry, and American genius can compete with slave or cheap labor or with totalitarian-controlled industry. To say otherwise, is utter defeatism. To say otherwise is to indicate lack of confidence and faith in American production.

China has cheap labor—even slave labor—but they are not now nor have they ever been a serious competitor. England controls the largest low-wage labor supply in all the world. British factories, with British machinery and British executives—and employing the cheap labor of India and the Malay States—have never been able to stifle American competition.

If facts prove anything, they prove that slave or low-wage labor cannot compete on anything like equal terms with free labor. Facts prove that government-owned or dominated enterprise cannot compete with free enterprise.

I call upon the President:

To reassert his faith in the Constitution of the United States.

To reassert his repeated promises not to send American boys to fight and die on foreign soil in a foreign war.

To reassert his confidence in a government of the people.

To reassert his desire to abide by the law of the land, and his unwillingness to discard the Neutrality Act by Executive order.

There is unity in America today. There is unity for national defense. There is unity to solve our domestic, social, and economic problems. There is unity for freedom and democracy in the United States. And above all else, there is an overwhelming and indivisible unity for peace and against American involvement in a foreign war waged on distant continents.

There is unity for faith and confidence in American Government, in American institutions, and in American peace.

Remember, Mr. President, distrust begets distrust even as faith begets faith and confidence begets confidence.

Commencement Exercises of Wofford College

OF
HON. TOM CONNALLY
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 3 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES F. BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the very able address delivered by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] at the commencement exercises of Wofford College, at Spartanburg, S. C., on June 2, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL UNITY NOW

The President has declared a national emergency. The declaration is timely. America today is in peril. That peril is increased because many Americans do not realize its existence. And our failure to achieve unity of thought and action is making America's position more critical every day.

From the moment that Adolf Hitler launched his merciless drive to destroy democracy, it has been evident to many Americans that his objective is domination of the entire world. Too many other Americans have contended—and still are contending—that this is just another European war, merely a continuance of the centuries-old fight for the balance of power.

Today the British Empire stands alone to block Hitler's bloodstained path across Europe. If Britain falls, the United States must face a Hitler dominating all of the world except the Western Hemisphere.

In all of the countries now under his heel, Hitler has factories in operation, the workers forced to produce vast quantities of material for the Nazi war machine. This releases almost the entire manpower of Germany for military service.

We cannot assume that the same conditions will not prevail in Britain if the gallant defenders of those isles should be compelled to submit. We believe, of course, that Winston Churchill would never consent to the surrender of the British Fleet. But when Britain falls, Churchill will fall. A Laval will then come to power, as was the case in France, for there are in Britain, as in the United States, men who believe in the appeasement of Hitler. The question then will be not what the British wish to do but what they will be forced to do.

If Hitler obtains possession of the British Fleet, only an exceedingly optimistic person would dare claim that with the fleet we today possess, divided between the Atlantic and the Pacific, we could successfully defend the Western Hemisphere against the combined navies of the world and the air power of Germany.

Of course, Hitler announces that he has no intention of invading America. After the invasion of Czechoslovakia he declared, "This is the last territorial readjustment I will seek." There were people in many European countries who believed in him. Today they live in slavery. But there are people in the United States who believe Hitler's statement.

Let us recall the days preceding the war. I was in France in September 1937. The French people were in the midst of a great struggle. Employees were fighting to retain the 40-hour week and to gain further increases in wages. Employers were making no concessions. There were sit-down strikes and lock-outs. Neither faction would stop fighting long enough to take note of what Hitler was plotting at France's eastern border. Today, the French—both employers and employees—are working long hours, for no pay. And they are working for Germany, not for the land of their birth.

From Paris I went to Germany. There was no debate in progress there. Hitler had declared there could be no increase in wages and no increase in the cost of living. There could be no dissent from his decrees.

While I was in Berlin the Germans had their first black-out rehearsal against air raids. No nation threatened them; no nation was prepared to make war against them. Because their intention was to make war on others, they were preparing themselves against air attacks. In nearly every city I saw soldiers marching, invariably singing, Deutschland Über Alles. I visited various sections of the country, talking to all types of Germans. They all feared Hitler was determined upon war.

An overnight trip took me to London. The following day I witnessed a peace parade. Several thousand men, women, and children marched through the streets. They carried placards, such as We Did Not Raise Our Boys for Cannon Fodder, and Peace on Earth. Today in Washington there are men and women parading in front of the White House carrying similar banners. While the British prayed earnestly, Hitler prepared feverishly. These Britons were precisely like the God-fearing, peace-loving people in this and every other community in America. Because they would make war on no nation they could not believe that Hitler would make war upon them.

Twelve months later Hitler struck. There was nothing for Chamberlain to do at Munich except to appease Hitler because he knew that Britain was totally unprepared.

Just 1 year later Poland was invaded. The war was on.

For some years at least 15 Members of the United States Senate voted against any appropriations for the Navy. They were sincere in their view that the appropriations were unwise or unnecessary.

After France had fallen, Congress unanimously appropriated billions for the Navy and the Army. Senators changed their views only because they feared Hitler. If we are in no danger there is no defense for their votes, no excuse for the tremendous expenditures.

During this period many prominent Americans were opposing our preparedness program. They indulged in much oratory against participation in a foreign war. We should bear in mind, however, that if we are to defend the Western Hemisphere, it is just twice as far to some of the South American republics as it is to the British Isles. Should Hitler invade South America these same men would argue that we should fight only in the event the United States should be actually invaded. That policy would meet with Hitler's enthusiastic approval. Germany has always favored fighting on the soil of other nations. As a result the fatherland has known little of the horrors of war.

In this war civilians have suffered as many casualties as have those men wearing military uniforms. Women and children are targets for death-dealing bombs. They must pay a heavy price when a nation waits for Hitler's stukas to scream overhead before taking steps to defend itself

The arguments of those who oppose our assistance to Britain have had some effect. Today, when we are engaged in an attempt to have America produce in 2 years what Germany required 10 years to produce, our people have not yet achieved that unity of purpose essential to our success. Under any circumstances, the task would be difficult. In Germany the man engaged in producing munitions works approximately 2,800 hours per year. In the United States, when we eliminate Sundays, one-half the day on Saturdays, and all holidays, the average working hours per year total approximately 1,800.

Therefore, if the same number of men were engaged at work and the output was the same, it would take us much longer than 10 years to accomplish what Germany did during that period. But we have more workers and our mass-production methods are superior. If we were united and awake to our danger, with the superior skill of our workmen, we could accomplish this seemingly impossible task. But that unity and realization of danger must be had before we can succeed.

Our contribution to the battle for democratic government is measured not by the number of our soldiers but by the volume of our production. Every day lost in the production of defense orders is a battle lost. Some men are being forced to sacrifice their business, go to camps, and work long hours for less than a dollar a day. Those who remain at home, as employers or employees, must realize that they, too, must make sacrifices. A national emergency cannot be used as an excuse for increased profits or increased wages. The administration that has insured collective bargaining and given to wage earners increased wages and better working conditions can be relied upon to preserve our social gains. The duty of patriotic employers and employees is, as the President has pointed out, to submit their differences to an impartial mediation board appointed by the President and put an end to strikes and lock-outs in defense industries. We must not forget what happened in France.

The opponents of our foreign policy warn against slogans. I concur in this warning. Beware of the slogan, "Our children's children will be paying for this defense program." The purpose of that is to appeal to the selfishness of men who hate taxes much more than they hate Hitler.

View with suspicion the slogan, "What will it profit us to help democracy elsewhere if we destroy democracy at home?" It is a false argument that if we make sacrifices for liberty we will thereby lose our liberty. Accept with doubt the statement of those who protest they are in favor of national defense and aid to Britain, but opposed to granting power to a President. The purpose of that is to appeal to those who enjoy hating the President. A democracy can avoid a concentration of power in the Executive in normal times, but when an emergency arises, and government must act promptly, power to act must be lodged with some individual. In America it is lodged—not with a dictator—but with a President elected by the people. It cannot be lodged in the Congress. While Congress debated the wisdom of conferring power upon the President, Hitler could invade South America and the United States.

It is better to submit to a temporary concentration of power now than to a permanent concentration camp later.

The people of the United States conferred unusual powers upon the President in the War between the States, in the Spanish-American War, and in the first World War. At the end of those emergencies the powers were returned to the people. We remained a democracy. In the present emergency concentration of power is inescapable. When this critical period passes the people will have those powers restored to them. If they are not returned willingly, then, at the first election, the people will see that they are returned.

There are some who by the term "warmonger" try to frighten those who profess their love of liberty. They would eliminate from our histories and our memories Patrick Henry's declaration, "Give me liberty or give me death." and for it substitute the battle cry, "Even as a slave, let me live."

Not every person who uses such slogans or makes such arguments is deliberately indulging in German propaganda—but no German propagandist would fail to approve their use.

After debating since 1939 all phases of our foreign policy the Congress recently enacted the lease-lend law. That action of the Congress did not have altruism as its basis. It was enacted only because the representatives of the people believed that aid to Britain was essential in order to gain for ourselves the time necessary to build a navy and to equip and train an army capable of defending the hemisphere we are obligated to defend.

The lease-lend law was enacted in the manner provided by the Constitution. Congress then, by an overwhelming vote, appropriated $7,000,000,000 to carry the policy into effect. The President announced to the world that the munitions purchased with the money of the American people would be delivered. Regardless of what opinion you may have held prior to that time, it is now the duty of every good American to sacrifice his personal opinion and support the policy adopted by the Congress and approved by the President.

It is difficult to understand the views of those who refuse to support the policy of the Government. It takes 7 months to build a ship and less than 7 minutes to sink it. These people would make sacrifices to build ships but do nothing to protect them. They would pay $7,000,000,000 for munitions and would not object if they are sent to the bottom of the sea.

That is not the view of America. We have pledged ourselves to furnish assistance to Britain. We must take whatever steps are necessary to insure the delivery of these munitions. America can do no less. America will do no less.

If we stand idly by while Hitler sends our munitions to the bottom of the sea, what will the people of the world think of us? If you resided in one of the republics of South America, relying upon the pledge of the United States to defend your country against attack, would you think us weak or cowardly? In either event, would you be willing for your country to rely for its safety upon the pledges of the United States?

If you were a British subject, and we failed to deliver the help we promised, Britain fell as a result of our failure, and Hitler served notice that if the fleet were removed you would be forced to suffer for it, would you be willing to suffer further and sacrifice more in order to send the fleet away to prevent Hitler from using it against the United States?

That would be asking much of a people who have suffered much. Daily and nightly their women and children are dying, as in other wars men died upon battlefields. They fight on, encouraged by the solemn promises of your Government, and the courage and the sacrifices of these noncombatants will be remembered as long as the hearts of men thrill to brave deeds.

We are told that if we seek either by plane or surface vessels to insure the delivery of these munitions our planes and ships will be attacked by Hitler, and that this development will plunge us immediately into the conflict. That may be true. No one of us can with certainty say what Hitler will do.

My own belief is that he will hesitate to attack our planes and ships. He has skillfully refrained from doing anything that would inspire cooperation by those he sought to destroy. It would be in perfect accord with his policy to permit the landing of the limited quantities of munitions now available for shipment to Britain rather than to run the risk of bringing the United States, with all its naval power, actively into the war.

America believes in peace, but not peace at any price. I must believe that in France today there are thousands of Frenchmen who would rather be in London suffering the horrors of war among free men than in Paris enjoying so-called liberty among the slaves of Hitler.

Paris became an "open city." Its buildings were saved. In the future, as in the past, Americans will go to Europe. In Paris they will visit the Louvre. They will marvel at the architecture of the magnificent churches. But I believe those who visit London will receive greater spiritual refreshment from the ruins of St. Paul's Cathedral and the damaged walls of Westminster Abbey than they will ever receive from the unscarred buildings of Paris.

In America there are those who charge that the President cannot carry into effect the provisions of the lease-lend law, because the President has declared he will do all in his power to keep us out of war. He has done and will do all in his power to keep us out of war. But I would have no respect for a President who construed such a statement as requiring him to favor peace at any price.

They refer to a statement of the President to abide by the Democratic platform which declared we would not send "our Army, Navy, or air force to fight in a foreign land, outside of the Americas except in case of attack."

There is nothing inconsistent in that statement with the attitude of the President today. I insisted upon the inclusion in that sentence of the words "except in case of attack." Otherwise, I would have opposed the inclusion of the paragraph in the platform. I assumed there would be given to the word "attack" the meaning it has acquired in modern warfare, and not the definition given by the advocates of "peace at any price." It is for the United States, and not Germany, to say where and when we are attacked. There is in this platform declaration and in the statement of the President, nothing to prevent your Government exercising the ancient right of freedom of the seas and insuring the safety of this hemisphere.

If you think differently—if you construe it as meaning that America would not, under any circumstances, fight until its shores are actually invaded, then let me say that, after all, the safety of the American people is more important than the consistency of a Government policy with a party platform. In the crisis confronting us today it is the duty of every man holding a position of responsibility to decide every question in the light of conditions existing at the time of the decision and not in the light of conditions existing at some time in the past.

I realize the mental confusion of persons who attempt to reconcile the acts of Hitler with the conduct of those people in our midst who are German or of German extraction—the law-abiding citizens—loyal to God, country and church, who have contributed so much to the making of America. We must remember, however, that these people never knew the Germany of Hitler. It has been only since he came into power that the German Government has sought to drive religion out of the hearts of its people.

Before you criticize the German people as a whole, consider what would be the effect upon this country if, because of persecution by government, many of our people had never known the teachings of Christ.

I share the longing of the man who loves peace; but, in order to be a Christian, it is not necessary to be a coward. We have seen Hitler persecute the Jews, Catholics, and Protestants—all in an effort to force men to worship Hitler instead of God. We have seen him force the German people to substitute Mein Kampf for the Holy Bible, and as a Christian people we are determined that he shall not do to the people of America what he has done to the people of Germany.

The church of Christ is persecuted in Germany; it can find no comfort in Japan and no solace in communistic Russia. It must fight for its existence in a Hitler-controlled Italy and a Hitler-controlled Europe.

Love of peace will not cause the church in America to give comfort to those who would take from us the priceless blessing of freedom of worship. In a Hitler-dominated world Christianity would perish and the great teachings of the Prince of Peace would be forever lost.

We have declared our policy. There is danger if we carry it out. There is greater danger if we do not. If democracy is to function, we must now disregard our differences and unite in giving the best thought of which we are capable to the problems confronting us.

While this storm was gathering, one man demonstrated outstanding ability to foresee the developments that were to shatter the peace of the world. President Roosevelt lifted his voice again and again. He warned us, as well as the other nations of the world, of the terrible consequences of the war that was brewing. His voice was the voice of reason, but madmen would not listen.

Surely, in this hour, when our lives and our liberties hang in the balance, Americans can forget unimportant differences and unite behind our President. We elected Franklin D. Roosevelt through our democratic process. If we believe in democracy, if we desire its preservation, we will unhesitatingly rally around him. Hitler's policy has been to divide and conquer. Let us unite and win.

I have confidence in the future of America because I have confidence in the people of America.

I am sure they will share with me the sentiment expressed by Stephen Decatur:

"Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong."

America Has a Choice

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 3 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY ROBERT M. HUTCHINS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, which appeared in The Progressive on Saturday, May 31, 1941, the title of the article being "America Has a Choice."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Progressive of May 31, 1941]

AMERICA HAS A CHOICE

(By Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago)

I am for aid to Britain. I am against naval or military intervention in this war.

For 10 long years we tried one expedient after another to recover from a war. That war, for this country, had not been a bad one. But the effects of it, in terms of inflation and deflation, of delirium and depression, of hate and fear, were still being felt after 20 years.

Before 1917 the country had serious problems. The war settled none of them and produced some new ones we had never dreamed of. From 1919 to 1929 we paid no attention to these problems, or anything else, except the price of stocks. From 1929 to 1939 we thought of nothing but these problems.

We applied a whole pharmacopoeia of desperate remedies and succeeded only in doing a few things that ought to have been done years before. We passed the Wagner Act, and the social-security legislation, and the Securities Exchange Act. We started the T. V. A. But there was little fundamental improvement. We were depressed and bewildered. We had some hope that some day we might get somewhere. We couldn't see just how.

IT WAS ONLY 2 YEARS AGO

When the war broke out in 1939, the country recognized that its difficulties were still unsolved. Our liberals had been telling us for years that the first World Was was accountable for many of them. They urged us not to be drawn into another which could only aggravate diseases that had already proved nearly fatal. Leading businessmen warned us that there was nothing in war for business. They knew that though war business would be large, it might not be profitable; that if there were profits they would not last; and that the collapse of industry after the war would cancel them.

We wanted Hitler to be defeated. We knew all about him and didn't like any of it. We wanted the British to win. We like them. They speak the same language. They have an analogous constitutional system. We are accustomed to dealing with them.

In 1939 we felt that a British victory would be advantageous to us. We did not believe that it was our only hope. We did not believe that our safety, the integrity of our institutions, or the contribution we could make to the welfare of mankind depended on a British victory. Nobody offered the faintest suggestion that we should go to war. We knew too much about war to be deceived again.

A DIFFERENT STORY TODAY

How different is the spectacle today. Instead of working still to solve the problems resulting from the last war we have been quivering for months on the brink of another. The President has been conducting a war of nerves against the Axis and against his own people. The speeches of his representatives, from the Vice President down to Senator PEPPER, have all the marks of a concerted campaign to frighten us into war.

We have every reason to fear that we shall enter this war for democracy without resort to democratic processes. Because totalitarian powers do not declare war, but simply start shooting, this democratic Nation, we hear, in its war for democracy should do the same thing.

We have stopped trying to make democracy work. The liberals now tell us that we cannot have democracy in this country unless the British Empire is preserved Many leading businessmen hint that Hitler will starve us if he wins. Everybody tells us that Hitler will arrive in South America, or at the Panama Canal, or at New York City within a few minutes, days, months, or years after he has conquered England.

LET'S NOT COMMIT SUICIDE

This, then, is the spectacle It is the spectacle of a country with appalling problems, many of them resulting from the last war, about to plunge into another in the hope of ending its troubles that way. In the life of individuals this method of solving problems is known as suicide.

If we don't want to commit suicide, if we want to preserve our country, these problems must be solved. Let me recall a few of them. The problem of unemployment. Is the war a W. P. A. project? The problem of social justice, justice to the Negro, to the sharecropper, to the migratory workers, to the exploited members of our economic system.

The problem of clearing the slums and building 10,000,000 decent homes; the problem of the land and of gaining access to it for the people; the problem of the machine and how to direct it to the common good; the problem of starvation in the midst of plenty, politely called the problem of distribution; the problem of adequate medical care; the problem of agriculture; the problem of monopoly; the problem of capital and labor; the problem of political corruption; the problem of education.

Last December Mr. Walter Lippmann said that the prevailing system of education is destined, if it continues, to destroy western civilization, and is in fact destroying it. If Mr. Lippmann is right, and I think he is, we would gain little by defeating Hitler unless we could reform education at the same time. But we obviously cannot guarantee a British victory and reform education, or anything else, at the same time. We cannot fight a total war and at the same time solve the overwhelming problems that must be solved if we are to make democracy work in this country.

WHAT THE COST WOULD BE

We present a strange, and even an unprecedented, spectacle when we look at ourselves from the military point of view. We have not been attacked. We are not prepared. Hitler's public statements about this country, at least when compared with those of our leaders about Germany, have been characterized by moderation and reserve. Certainly no country has ever entered a great war so unprovoked and so unprepared. Military nations have gone to war without provocation. Provoked nations have gone to war without preparation.

For a nation to go to war as unprovoked and as unprepared as we are must be unique in history. We present the strange spectacle of a country dragging itself by its own bootstraps into a war which it did not begin, for which it is not responsible, for which it is not ready, and which, only a few months ago, it was determined never to enter.

I believe that we could win this war. I do not see precisely how we could win it. But I have faith that the vast resources of our land and the technological genius of our people would conquer in the end. But at how distant an end and at how great a cost.

On the basis of anything we know now, we could not expect the end in less than 5 years. The cost is the sacrifice of the institutions we would be fighting to save. The cost is the sacrifice of millions of our youth.

WE DO HAVE A CHOICE

But we are told we have no choice. Hitler will decide. Perhaps we shall be forced into bankruptcy, revolution, and totalitarianism at home. But we must make up our minds now to defeat Hitler or be defeated by him. If we are defeated by him, we shall have all this and Hitler, too.

I insist that today we have a choice—that today we can decide. Will Hitler attack us? Not if we are prepared. Will he penetrate South America? Not if we deal justly and intelligently with her; not, for example, if we adopt Secretary Knox's proposal for an immediate customs union with the Latin-American nations.

Shall we be able to survive in a totalitarian world? The loss of all the foreign trade we have had in the last decade would cost less than 1 year of war. Shall we suffer the fate of Denmark and Norway? Not unless we stop building battleships and bombers; not unless the Atlantic Ocean is rolled back to make a pathway for the enemies of God.

FIRST CHANGE OUR OWN HEARTS

Things will be bad for this country and for the world whether we go to war or not. They will be far worse if we go in than if we stay out. To stake the lives and fortunes of our people and the hopes of the world on the nightmares and bogeys that have been conjured up to scare us in is to betray humanity. We know the horrors of war. They are obvious. They are inevitable. The horrors we are told we shall undergo if we stay out of war are the product of hypothesis and hysteria.

The United States must prepare to meet the totalitarian onslaught if or when it comes. We are working hard on military preparation. Military preparation suffices for defense. It suffices even for conquest. But for the peace that must come sometime another kind of preparation is required. All we have to do is to recall our incompetence to deal in time of peace with those domestic problems that haunted us during the depression. With a multitude of gadgets we were sinking into poverty. With a decreasing death rate we had yet to discover what to do with our lives. With a love of liberty we did not know how to use our freedom or how to free the economic slaves among our population. I have faith that we can gradually muster the military strength to win the war. I see no sign that we possess the moral, intellectual, and spiritual strength to write the peace.

If we would change the face of the earth, we must first change our own hearts. If we will fight for the "four freedoms" with the same devotion that total war demands, we have a chance to get them for ourselves and for our fellowmen.

We are the only people who have. If we plunge into war we shall deprive the world of its last hope. We shall rob mankind of its last chance.

Jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office and the Tennessee Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

COMMUNICATION TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM HON. LINDSAY C. WARREN, COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by Hon. Lindsay C. Warren, Comptroller General of the United States:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 2, 1941.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I regret that I have to report to the Congress the existence of a disagreement between this office and the Tennessee Valley Authority which, for reasons hereinafter stated, requires the enactment of clarifying legislation satisfactorily to settle the fundamental issue of whether it is the intent of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act to exempt the fiscal officers of the Authority from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act and other general statutes requiring an accounting for the disposition of public funds.

Immediately after taking office as Comptroller General, a number of informal discussions were held last November, at the instance of the Tennessee Valley Authority, with Director James P. Pope and another representative of the Authority, in an earnest attempt to settle some then existing differences between the Authority and this office and to establish satisfactory working procedures for the future settlement of their fiscal officers' accounts and for making the annual audit of the Authority's transactions expressly required by section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act as amended by section 14 of the act of August 31, 1935, (49 Stat. 1080). These matters were thought to be progressing satisfactorily when, in response to my suggestion that the Authority submit a written statement of its proposed changes in the procedure, there was received from the Authority a memorandum contending for the flat proposition that by reason of its corporate status and the provisions of section 9 (b) of the act the Tennessee Valley Authority is wholly exempt from the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act and other statutes requiring an accounting for public funds and that the duties of this office in relation to the Authority were strictly limited to the making of the annual special audit of the Authority's transactions expressly required by said section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. (The memorandum went to the length of proposing—apparently for the purpose of eliminating even that prescribed official examination and in disregard of the express requirements of section 9 (b)—that such annual audits be made by the Comptroller General and that the expenses thereof, with one exception, be borne by appropriations made for the General Accounting Office—that this office withdraw its representatives engaged in such audit and that "the Comptroller General should appoint a firm of certified accountants of national reputation to make an annual audit of the accounts of the Authority, the expenses of the audit to be borne by the Authority.")

These contentions of the Authority that it is exempt from accountability under general law were not in accord with the views of my predecessors, but the whole matter was carefully reexamined with the result that I had to advise the Authority that while admittedly there is some room for argument I could not say that I found the views of my predecessors in this office on this point without substantial support or that they went further than appeared to be justified in resolving the doubt in harmony with the basic legislative policy of holding public officers to a strict accounting for the use of public funds entrusted to them. The reasons for my conclusions in this respect were fully set forth in decision of December 21, 1940, addressed to the Chairman, Board of Directors, Tennessee Valley Authority, a copy of which is enclosed herewith as a part of this report. For the reasons stated in the decision it was, and is, my view that any intent of the present law to exempt the Authority from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act and other general statutes is not sufficiently clear to justify me in proceeding officially on that basis. The directors of the Authority remain firm in their contentions to the contrary, however, and, in effect, now refuse any rendition of accounts under general law as is shown by letter dated February 12, 1941, as follows:

"TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
Knoxville, Tenn., February 12, 1941.

"The Honorable LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR MR. WARREN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 21, 1940, which has been studied with great care.

"That letter rules that the accounts of the Authority are subject to final settlement and adjustment in the General Accounting Office under the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, and that the entirely different audit procedure provided in section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act is to be considered as in addition to and not in lieu of such final settlement and adjustment.

"It seems clear that this view is identical with the one taken by a former Comptroller General, the late Mr. McCarl, and departs sharply from the basis for relationship developed tentatively in a series of discussions with your predecessor, Senator Brown. In effect, therefore, we respectfully suggest that your letter of December 21 puts the legal question of relationship between the Tennessee Valley Authority and the General Accounting Office back to where it was when the Authority was created. The only question is the intent of Congress as expressed in the statutes which govern both agencies. At that time (1933) there may have been room for difference of legal opinion as to the intent of Congress as expressed in the Tennessee Valley Authority Act and its legislative history. Since that time, however, repeated attempts to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act to bring it under the Budget and Accounting Act have been defeated in Congress, the last such attempt being through the medium of an amendment to the appropriation bill as recent as 2 weeks ago. In each instance, over a period of years, when the issue was brought before Congress, it has declined to extend the Budget and Accounting Act procedure to the Authority.

"I am sure you will understand, therefore, why the Board of Directors of the Authority cannot acquiesce in the position taken in your letter. We are convinced that the position stated in your letter is inconsistent both with the express provisions of our governing statute and the intent of the Congress clearly expressed in its legislative history and the actions of Congress over a period of 7 years. For us to acquiesce in a requirement of settlement and adjustment of Tennessee Valley Authority accounts by the General Accounting Office under these circumstances would, in our judgment, constitute an avoidance of our responsibility as a board for the administration and management of the project which Congress and the President have assigned to our charge.

"We feel certain you would agree that the issue is an issue of law, depending entirely upon the construction of the relevant statutes. The Board therefore would, under such circumstances, follow the advice of its general counsel. The advice that has been given to the Board both by its present general counsel and his predecessor has been that the jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office over the transactions of the Authority is defined by section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, and that any extension of that jurisdiction beyond the limits there set out is without authority of law. These legal opinions are supported by the independent conclusions of the joint congressional committee specifically charged by the joint resolution creating that body with the duty of determining this particular issue. We have concluded that the only way in which this controversy now stalemated on opposing opinions of law can be brought to a conclusion is by obtaining a ruling on the legal questions by the chief law officer of the Federal Government. To that end we have forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury a letter requesting a revision of procedure, a copy of which is forwarded herewith for your information. We are advised that the Secretary plans to transmit this request to the Attorney General for his opinion upon the questions of law that are involved.

"In disagreeing with your position you will understand I am sure that the Board of Directors is simply trying to discharge its responsibility under the act in full conscience and that it is with the greatest reluctance we find ourselves at issue with you.

"Respectfully yours,
"TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
"DAVID E. LILIENTHAL,
"Vice Chairman, Board of Directors."

I cannot proceed on the suggested basis, heavily relied on by the Authority, that the subsequent failure of Congress to enact proposed amendments which, among other matters, would have expressly required the Authority to render accounts pursuant to the Budget and Accounting Act is determinative of the meaning and intent of existing legislation in this respect. On the other hand, I appreciate that the rejection of such amendments could be regarded as an indication of the attitude of Congress at the time. It is understood that the Authority's letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, referred to in the letter above quoted, is still under consideration in the Treasury Department. However, the conflicting arguments on the issue appear to have been fully developed; and as neither the Treasury Department nor the Attorney General has jurisdiction to decide or determine the matter so as to relieve me of official responsibility in the premises, it is not perceived how the Authority's present course of seeking such collateral administrative opinions can settle the issue.

The result is that I am faced with the alternatives of permitting the Authority indefinitely to continue to withdraw large sums from the Treasury for which no accounting is rendered, which I believe would be contrary to law and my official duty, or of holding that the fiscal officers of the Authority are delinquent in the rendition of their accounts and thereupon to withhold approval of requisitions for further advances from the Treasury as required by section 12 of the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat. 209, as amended, 31 U. S. C. 78). I am loath to follow the latter course, in view of the room for doubt as to the legislative purpose and of the expressed convictions of the Authority's directors that the rendition of accounts would constitute an avoidance of their legal responsibility. Moreover, such disapproval of requisitions would leave the Authority without funds for current activities and would jeopardize not only normal operations but national-defense activities dependent thereon. I see no other course, however, unless the issue be settled by clarifying legislation.

In these circumstances, I must suggest the immediate importance of an amendment to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act to set the matter at rest. Whether the fiscal officer of the Tennessee Valley Authority should receive and disburse the funds appropriated for the activities of the Authority without rendering accounts therefor for adjustment and settlement under the general law is, of course, purely a question of legislative policy. If it be the legislative will that the Authority shall not be required to render an accounting pursuant to general law, that can be accomplished by amending section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, as amended by section 14 of the act of August 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 1080), by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph substantially as follows:

"All amounts appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act shall be paid to the treasurer of the Corporation upon the request of the Board and, notwithstanding the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act or of other provisions of law, no accounting to, or rendition of accounts for adjustment and settlement by, the General Accounting Office for amounts heretofore or hereafter received or disbursed by the said treasurer shall be required. Provisions in appropriation acts directing that appropriations for, and receipts of, the Tennessee Valley Authority shall be covered into and accounted for as one fund shall not be construed as requiring the rendition of accounts for adjustment and settlement by the General Accountng Office."

Conversely, if it be the legislative purpose not to exempt the Authority from accountability under general law, that would be made clear by the addition to the said section 9 (b) of a paragraph substantially as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve the Treasurer or other accountable officers or employees of the Corporation from compliance with the provisions of existing law requiring the rendition of accounts for adjustment and settlement pursuant to section 236, Revised Statutes, as amended by section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24) and accounts for all receipts and disbursements by or for the Corporation shall be rendered accordingly."

I hold the view that any governmental agency charged with the responsibility of conducting operations of the character of those of the Tennessee Valley Authority should have some latitude of authority beyond that needed and usually granted by the Congress to the regular departments and establishments of the Government. In this connection see page 28 of my decision of December 21, 1940, herewith. However, I strongly oppose the view, sometimes expressed, that the only route to such necessary latitude of authority is through exemption entirely from regular accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act for the disposition of public moneys. When an agency of the Government conducts its business under special grants of authority, permitting greater flexibility of action, the audit and settlement of its accounts in the regular way is in nowise inconsistent with the exercise of that flexibility of action, because in the audit and settlement full consideration must be given to the same special authority under which the agency's business was conducted.

During the past few years charges have been made that the close scrutiny by representatives of the General Accounting Office over expenditures of the Tennessee Valley Authority has reflected prejudice of the former against the latter. Such charges have never seemed to me to merit serious consideration; but even if justification for them could be found in the past, none now exists.

It is perhaps not necessary for me to state in this communication that I strongly appreciate the importance of the work of the Tennessee Valley Authority and have always supported legislation to enable it to be prosecuted successfully. My record in this regard is known to Members of both Houses of the Congress, but I also strongly favor uniform and complete accountability of all Government agencies for the disposition of public moneys entrusted to their use.

While it is inconceivable to me that any agency entrusted with the expenditure of mammoth amounts of funds collected from the people of the United States should desire to evade responsible accounting and scrutiny by an independent office created for that purpose, I make no further comment at this time with respect to the situation here presented other than to urge the early enactment of legislation which will definitely settle the question as, in the wisdom of the Congress, it should be settled.

Respectfully,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, December 21, 1940.

CHAIRMAN, BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Tennessee Valley Authority,
Knoxville, Tenn.

SIR: Careful consideration has been given the matters involved in the letter of November 23, 1940, from the Honorable James P. Pope, director, Tennessee Valley Authority, as follows:

"I am handing you a memorandum in compliance with the understanding we had during our recent conversation.

"This has to do primarily with the legal aspects of the questions involved in the relationship between the Authority and the General Accounting Office. You will note that the position of the Authority on the legal questions is supported by the Supreme Court in the case of Skinner & Eddy Corp. v. McCarl (275 U. S. 1), and by the conclusion of the joint investigating committee, pages 109 to 133 of the report. For your convenience, I am enclosing a copy of the report of the joint investigating committee.

"Our desire is to cooperate fully with the General Accounting Office, and to be of every possible service in resolving these questions in a way satisfactory to both agencies."

The memorandum accompanying the letter is as follows:

"STATEMENT OF TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ON PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE AUTHORITY AND THE GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

"This statement does not purport to be a comprehensive study of the history of the relations between the General Accounting Office and the Authority, nor is it intended to explain all the exceptions which the General Accounting Office has taken to disbursements by the Authority. It is, rather, a general discussion of a few of the principal problems now involved in the relationship between the two agencies. Detailed statements on each of the points discussed have already been furnished the General Accounting Office, and further explanation will be supplied to any extent which may be requested.

"I. THE NATURE OF THE JURISDICTION OF THE GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE OVER THE AUTHORITY

"The Authority's prior statements on this matter make necessary only a very brief discussion at this time. The report of the joint committee investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority contains a full study of the question. It is enough to say here that the Authority's relations with the General Accounting Office are prescribed in detail by special legislation, section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. This section makes no reference to the settlement and adjustment procedure by which the General Accounting Office controls the expenditures and accounts of the departments and establishments of the United States. Instead, this section requires that the Comptroller General 'shall audit the transactions of the Corporation.' Thus, in view of the specific provisions of this section, there would be no basis for application of the settlement and adjustment procedure to the Authority unless relations between the Authority and the General Accounting Office were governed not only by the provisions of section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, but also by the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921. In the case of Skinner & Eddy Corp. v. McCarl (275 U. S. 1), the Supreme Court explicitly ruled that the Budget and Accounting Act is not applicable to Government corporations in the absence of specific legislation so providing. This decision was rendered prior to the enactment of the T. V. A. Act, and the act must therefore be construed in the light of the prior decision. In the case of the Authority, moreover, legislative proposals were made in both Houses of Congress in 1935, endorsed by the General Accounting Office itself and introduced for the announced purpose of bringing the Authority under the Budget and Accounting Act. These proposals were voted upon and defeated in both Houses, thus again demonstrating congressional intent.

"It may be added that the joint investigating committee revealed that counsel for the General Accounting Office in 1935 expressed to the then Comptroller General complete agreement that the Budget and Accounting Act was not applicable to the Authority (report, pp. 119, 120). This, however, had no effect on the position of the General Accounting Office.

"What is meant by an audit as used in section 9 (b) of the T. V. A. Act must be determined in the light of the commonly accepted meaning of the word, as well as the intention of Congress as revealed in the congressional debates at the time of the enactment of the legislation. It is clear from both that what was intended was an audit of the type common among commercial enterprises, in which trained auditors would review the accounts and fiscal procedures of the Authority with a view to developing accurate statements of its financial position, in the customary balance-sheet and income-and-expense forms. Such audits are commonly made within a few months after the end of the accounting period under review, so that they may be utilized for appraising the financial status of the corporation at any given time. Such audits have never been supplied to the Authority. Since the activities of the Authority correspond in a number of ways to those of business enterprises, audits of this type are essential, and it has become necessary for the Authority to secure such audits from qualified public accountants.

"The two principal purposes of an audit, as that term is used among businessmen, are to afford a pericdic review of the operating condition and results of the business, and to aid the managers of the enterprise in increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of its operations. General Accounting Office examinations are not directed to either of these ends. They have to do, rather, with the technical legality of individual items of expenditure on the basis of the Comptroller General's interpretations of various regulatory statutes. Under the settlement and adjustment procedure, the General Accounting Office supervises the disposition of all claims against establishments and departments within its jurisdiction, thus participating in the management of the various agencies. Neither of these functions is involved in commercial audits. No effort is made to substitute the auditors' judgment for that of management, either as to the legality or wisdom of any commitment or disbursement. The purpose of private auditors is to present accurate statements of the results which have been achieved by the business in the past and to make such suggestions for the establishment of internal accounting and fiscal controls and procedures as to insure that accurate financial statements will be forthcoming in the future. They are free, of course, to criticize and report on any past expenditure or action, or on any method of operation or internal control concerning which they feel the public should be informed. It is the position of the Authority that under section 9 (b) it is audits of this type which the General Accounting Office is required to make. This was also the conclusion of the joint investigating committee.

"II. NATURE OF THE EXCEPTIONS TAKEN BY GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

"Perhaps because its staff does not contain many certified public accountants and it is therefore not well equipped to make business audits, the General Accounting Office has carried over to the Authority the same procedures with respect to examination of accounts as are applicable to the departments and establishments of the Government under the Budget and Accounting Act. This has given rise to a vast number of exceptions to particular expenditures and transactions. Most of these exceptions have been released after the Authority has supplied additional data or information. There still remained, however, as of October 31, 1940, exceptions to items aggregating $6,737,646. While the Authority does not agree with the propriety of the procedure under which these exceptions were noted, so long as the General Accounting Office sees fit to operate in this way, it will, of course, be the effort of the Authority to explain and justify, so far as possible, the items to which exceptions are taken, and to attempt to secure the release of the exceptions. It may therefore be helpful to state generally the types of exceptions which have been made and the reasons why the Authority believes they should be released.

"Most of the exceptions fall within three general classes:

"(a) Exceptions based upon differences of opinion between the General Accounting Office and the Authority as to the legality of disbursements.

"(b) Exceptions based upon differences in judgment on questions of fact.

"(c) Exceptions based upon claims of inadequacy of supporting papers for disbursements.

"These will be discussed in order:

"(a) It is the Authority's view that even if the General Accounting Office is to continue to apply its exception procedure to the Authority, exceptions should not be taken on the basis of differences of opinion between the General Accounting Office and counsel for the Authority. The determination of legal questions is no part of the normal auditing function, whatever part it may play in the settlement and adjustment procedure. Private auditors accept without question the opinions of counsel for the agency subject to audit. To do otherwise would mean the substitution of the auditors' judgment on legal questions for that of the counsel for the agency.

"It should be emphasized that none of the exceptions taken on legal grounds are even alleged to be based upon willful violation of the law. They involve doubtful questions of legal interpretation, where the auditors of the General Accounting Office have taken one viewpoint, and the legal department of the Authority has taken another. The statutes involved relate, for the most part, to technical and procedural matters, and no question of fraud or personal honesty has been raised.

"A few examples will show the nature of the items upon which the G. A. O. auditors and the Authority's lawyers have taken conflicting positions.

"A large number of exceptions have been taken to the purchase of land for the reason that no approval of title was secured from the Attorney General. It was contended by the General Accounting Office that such approval was required under section 355 of the Revised Statutes, which by its terms applies only to departments and establishments of the Government and not to corporations. The Authority's general counsel construed this statute as being inapplicable, and counsel for the General Accounting Office was of the same view (hearings of the investigating committee, p. 120). It is interesting in this connection to note that the revision of section 355 adopted by this Congress (Public, No. 825, 76th Cong., 3d sess.) carries the following provision:

" 'The foregoing provisions of this section shall not be construed to affect in any manner any existing provisions of law which are applicable to the acquisition of lands or interests in land by the Tennessee Valley Authority * * *.'

"The amendment was sponsored by the Department of Justice, and the quoted provision had the approval of the Department. It is, therefore, apparent that Congress, with the acquiescence of the Attorney General, has left undisturbed the Authority's interpretation of section 355 as having no application to the purchases of land by the Authority.

"Another large volume of exceptions has been taken to the Authority's purchases of cement, on the ground that such purchases were not made on the basis of competitive bids. At the time of entry into the contracts under which most of the purchases were made, there was no requirement in the Tennessee Valley Authority Act for competitive bidding, and it was the opinion of counsel for the Authority (and, as it subsequently developed, of the G. A. O.) that section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which carries a general requirement of competitive bidding for Government departments, was not applicable. As a matter of fact, however, competitive bids were invited. When received, the bids proved to be identical. The Authority considered that the identical nature of the bids indicated collusion and that the bids were too high. After long negotiation, and after the Authority had stated that unless bids were reduced it would build its own cement producing plant, contracts were entered into with a number of the companies at prices much lower than those contained in the original bids. The General Accounting Office was therefore in the position of insisting that the Authority enter into contracts on a highly disadvantageous basis because of the requirements of a statute which counsel for the Authority, as well as counsel for the General Accounting Office, considered to be inapplicable. It may be asked with what propriety the Authority could pay higher prices for cement when advised by its own counsel that there was no requirement that it should do so.

"Among the other items to which the General Accounting Office has taken exception are the purchase of rubber boots and goggles, firearms for Authority safety officers, and noiseless typewriters, and the payment of accumulated leave to employees transferred from an annual to an hourly basis. In each case the Authority was advised by its counsel of the legal propriety of the disbursement.

"It is not intended to argue here whether the legal interpretation of the lay auditors of the General Accounting Office or of counsel for the Authority was correct in these cases. It is intended, rather, to suggest that the taking of exceptions based solely upon a difference of opinion with counsel for the agency under examination on questions of legal interpretation is wholly outside of the auditing function.

"(b) Exceptions based on the alleged erroneous computation of liquidated damages are examples of exceptions based on differences of opinion as to questions of fact. A number of exceptions have been taken to the computation of liquidated damages due the Authority because of disagreement on the part of the General Accounting Office auditors with the various officials of the Authority concerned on the facts which were the basis of the computation. Here again it is no part of the duties of auditors to substitute their own judgment for that of the business officials of the agency under examination in regard to facts or the inferences to be drawn from them in order to arrive at a mathematical calculation.

"Exceptions have also been taken where purchases have been made without advertisement because of the existence of an emergency requiring immediate delivery. Section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, as amended in 1935, specifically permits purchases of supplies and services without advertisement when an emergency exists. The General Accounting Office's exceptions have been based upon a difference of opinion between its auditors and the Authority's Materials Department as to whether the facts in given cases constituted an emergency.

"The General Accounting Office has also excepted to disbursements made by the Authority in settlement of claims made by private litigants. It need hardly be remarked that the Authority, unlike ordinary Government departments, is subject to suit in its own name, and its general counsel, who is responsible for the conduct of litigation in which claims are sought to be enforced against the Authority, is in a better position than are the auditors of the General Accounting Office to decide what settlements from the Authority's viewpoint are financially desirable. The practice of the General Accounting Office in taking exception to settlements because it disagrees with the judgment which the Authority's general counsel has exercised in given cases has nothing to do with the auditing function which the General Accounting Office is directed by law to perform.

"(c) Various types of exceptions have been taken by the General Accounting Office based on the inadequacy of papers furnished to support particular disbursements. Examples are exceptions taken to identification of 'extras' increasing material costs of contract prices; proof of circumstances warranting the award of contracts without advertisement; failure of supplemental vouchers to make reference to all previous vouchers; failure to append certification to statements and bills; proof that payment of rentals and repairs is not in excess of the limits fixed by the Economy Act. Exceptions of this nature are not deemed to constitute a problem of serious import, inasmuch as such exceptions are readily released after additional information is furnished. Such exceptions nevertheless greatly and unnecessarily increase the amount of paper work the Authority is required to perform and are therefore responsible both for reduced efficiency and increased cost of doing business. The Authority welcomes suggestions for the improvement and simplification of its forms and procedures, but no suggestions to this end have been made by the General Accounting Office, and few, if any, of the exceptions are based on criteria other than a formalism divorced from business judgment. The requirement that statements and bills carry formal certificates that the money is justly due frequently necessitates the return of such statements and bills to contractors for revision. In not a single case has this requirement affected the amount billed. No such certificates are required by any business organization, and they have no legal, moral, or other effect whatever.

"III. UTILIZATION OF GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE AUDIT REPORTS

"The Authority has been served by the General Accounting Office with Certificates of Settlement of Account for the period from July 8, 1933, to July 1, 1934. These certificates 'find a balance due the United States' in the aggregate amount of $31,596.95, and state that immediate action should be taken by the treasurer of the Authority to recover this amount from the officers who made the disbursements to which exception was taken. The exceptions in question are all of the nature above described. Such certificates and demands are part of the settlement and adjustment procedure, and are entirely out of place in the relations between the Authority and the General Accounting Office.

"As has already been indicated, it is the position of the Authority that the periodic audits which the General Accounting Office is directed to make have no relation to the settlement and adjustment procedure applicable in the case of ordinary Government departments subject to the Budget and Accounting Act. Section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act specifically provides that the General Accounting Office's audit report shall not be published until the Authority has had an opportunity to reply to it, after which the report and the reply are to be submitted by the Comptroller General to the President and Congress. The act clearly contemplates that the Authority shall take such action with reference to criticisms appearing in the Comptroller General's report as it deems proper; Congress, after receiving both the General Accounting Office report and the Authority's reply, is then in a position to take such measures as may be necessary. In other words, the General Accounting Office's report is to be treated as the report of a private auditing firm would be treated by a private business. The Authority is free, unless Congress otherwise directs, to take only such action as it may deem advisable.

"IV. RECOMMENDATIONS

"1. The General Accounting Office should discontinue the exception procedure as applied to the Authority, recall its representatives now in Knoxville reviewing transactions of the fiscal year 1941, and withdraw the request for collection of the amounts involved in the certificates of settlement for the period ending June 30, 1934.

"2. The Comptroller General should appoint a firm of certified public accountants of national reputation to make an annual audit of the accounts of the Authority, the expense of the audit to be borne by the Authority.

"3. If the General Accounting Office insists on continuing the application of its exception procedure to the Authority, the following would aid in establishing more helpful relations between the two organizations:

"(a) The General Accounting Office should expedite its decisions on exceptions to which replies have been made or which are similar to those already released. Releases should be sent to the Authority as soon as determined. Opportunity should be given the Authority to restate its replies on any items proposed to be disallowed.

"(b) The General Accounting Office should recast its reports for the past 7 years in the interests of accuracy, the elimination of exceptions already released, and in order to insure that financial statements, if included at all, are in a form comparable with the statements published by the Authority.

"(c) Representatives of the two organizations should review the proposed final report in order to remove as many classes of exceptions as possible. No future exception should be taken to the classes thus eliminated."

The controversy, in its various aspects, as to whether the Tennessee Valley Authority was intended to be subject to the requirements of the Budget and Accounting Act and other statutes generally controlling the expenditure of, and accounting for, public funds extends back over several years. The matter has given me much concern, and I have made a careful review of the subject, including the conflicting views stated in the majority and minority reports of the Joint Committee Investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority. While admittedly the law is not entirely clear and there is some room for argument, I cannot say that I find the views of my predecessors in this office on this point without substantial support or that they went further than appears to be justified in resolving the doubt in harmony with the basic legislative policy of holding public officers to a strict accounting for the use of public money entrusted to them.

First and foremost, the Tennessee Valley Authority Act does not expressly exempt the Authority from such requirements as would be expected if that were legislatively intended. Implied exemptions from the provisions of general law are not lightly to be presumed (see Morgan v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 28 F. Supp. 732). In this connection it is to be noted particularly that section 3 of the act expressly exempted the Authority from the requirements of the civil-service laws. This was not left to implication but was expressly stated and it is only reasonable to assume that if other exemptions were intended they, too, would have been expressly stated and not left in the twilight of doubtful implication. The Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, approved June 13, 1933 (48 Stat. 128), was enacted contemporaneously with the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. Section 4 (a) authorized the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and section 4 (j) not only exempted such Corporation from compliance with the civil-service laws but expressly provided that it "shall determine its necessary expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditure of public funds." This indicates that when the Congress intends such exemptions they are expressly stated, and the omission of any such provisions in the Tennessee Valley Authority Act—enacted at almost the same time and similar in various respects—cannot but be taken as most persuasive that the Congress did not intend in that act to confer any such exemptions. It was said in Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company v. Wheeling Bridge Company (138 U. S. 287, 292) that "an alleged surrender or suspension of a power of government respecting any matter of public concern must be shown by clear and unequivocal language," and, in Brown v. Duchesne (19 How. 183, 195), that "neither will the court, in expounding a statute, give to it a construction which would in any degree disarm the Government of a power which has been confided to it to be used for the general good—or which would enable individuals to embarrass it, in the discharge of the high duties it owes to the community—unless plain and express words indicated that such was the intention of the legislature." The will of the legislature is to be discovered as well by what the legislature has not declared as by what they have expressed (Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1), and it is difficult to conclude that the Congress without express mention intended to leave to the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority the expenditure of hundreds of millions of public money free of the restraints of general law governing spending and accountability.

The position of the Authority, nevertheless, that the Congress impliedly intended to exempt it from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act is founded on the proposition that the Congress created it a corporation and, therefore, that there is for application the principles of Skinner & Eddy Corporation v. McCarl (275 U. S. 1), where it was held that the Comptroller General could not be compelled to settle a claim against the Emergency Fleet Corporation. In its opinion the Court said, inter alia:

"For the Fleet Corporation is an entity distinct from the United States and from any of its departments or boards; and the audit and control of its financial transactions is, under the general rules of law and the administrative practice, committed to its own corporate officers except so far as control may be exerted by the Shipping Board."

The Court said respecting the Fleet Corporation and various other "Government-owned private corporations" that:

"Indeed, an important if not the chief reason for employing these incorporated agencies was to enable them to employ commercial methods and to conduct their operations with a freedom supposed to be inconsistent wtih accountability to the Treasury under its established procedure of audit and control over the financial transactions of the United States."

But a careful reading of that case shows clearly enough that it does not go to the extent of fixing a rule that an act of Congress giving a Government agency a corporate status ipso facto establishes such agency as an entity so entirely separate and distinct from the United States as to divorce it from accountability under general statutes governing Government establishments. On the contrary, the Court quoted section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act amending section 236 of the Revised Statutes to provide that "all claims and demands whatever by the Government of the United States or against it, and all accounts whatever in which the Government of the United States is concerned, either as debtor or creditor, shall be settled and adjusted in the General Accounting Office" and, with respect thereto, said:

"The language of this grant, if standing alone, might possibly be broad enough to include authority to audit accounts and to pass upon claims arising out of contracts made by a Government-owned corporation 'representing the United States.' But there it must be construed in the light of the statutes dealing specifically with the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation, of the latter's origin and character and of the administrative practice prevailing with regard to it and other similar corporations."

The Court then proceeded to point out that the Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized by the United States Shipping Board pursuant to specific authority conferred on it by the original Shipping Board Act of September 7, 1916, in contemplation of war, to form one or more corporations, to be dissolved at the expiration of 5 years from the conclusion of "the present European War"; that all of its stock was subscribed and paid for by the Shipping Board on behalf of the United States and that it was thus an instrumentality of the United States. The Court then said:

"But it was organized under the general laws of the District of Columbia, as a private corporation, with power to purchase, construct, and operate merchant vessels. The act authorized the Board 'to sell with the approval of the President, any or all of the stock of the United States in such corporation, but at no time shall it be a minority stockholder therein.' Being a private corporation, the Fleet Corporation may be sued in the State or Federal courts like other private corporations; it does not enjoy the priority of the United States in bankruptcy proceedings, Sloan Shipyards Corporation v. United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation (258 U. S. 549); and its employees are not agents of the United States, subject to the provisions of section 41 of the Criminal Code. United States v. Strang (254 U. S. 491). Compare 34 Opinion Attorney General 241."

The Court then referred to various other Government-owned private corporations employed by the United States as its instrumentalities in several other fields during the World War and in the conduct of activities essentially commercial in character, pointed out that at no time had the financial transactions of the Fleet Corporation passed through the hands of the general accounting officers of the Government or been passed upon as accounts of the United States either by the Comptroller of the Treasury or the Comptroller General, but that the accounts of the Fleet Corporation, "like those of each of the other corporations named," had been audited and the control over their financial transactions had been exercised, "in accordance with commercial practice," by the board or the officer charged with the responsibilities of administration. It was with reference to such Government-owned private corporations formed or utilized for such purposes that the Court remarked that "Indeed, an important if not the chief reason for employing these incorporated agencies was to enable them to employ commercial methods and to conduct their operations with a freedom supposed to be inconsistent with accountability to the Treasury under its established procedure of audit and control over the financial transactions of the United States." It was these circumstances relating specifically to the origin and character of the Fleet Corporation as a private corporation and the administrative practice prevailing with regard to it and "other similar corporations" employed as instrumentalities of the United States that were stated by the Court in sustaining the contention of the Comptroller General in that case that he was without jurisdiction to consider claims against the Fleet Corporation, notwithstanding the broad language of section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act, supra, which the Court indicated might otherwise be applicable. Thus, the decision is limited to the Fleet Corporation and the principle of the decision to other similar Government-owned private corporations, and cannot be viewed as establishing or intending to establish any rule that the corporate status of any governmental agency ipso facto exempts it from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act.

Now, unquestionably, there are wide and material differences in such respects between the origin, status, and purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Fleet Corporation and such differences have been recognized by the courts. While the formation by the Shipping Board of the Fleet Corporation was authorized by statute, it actually was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia as a private corporation to engage commercially in purchasing, constructing, and operating merchant vessels, and it was held to have the attributes of other private corporations. The Court said in Sloan Shipyards v. United States Fleet Corporation (258 U. S. 549, 565), that—

"The Shipping Act contemplated a corporation in which private persons might be stockholders and which was to be formed like any business corporation under the laws of the District, with capacity to sue and be sued. The United States took all the stock but that did not affect the legal position of company."

The Tennessee Valley Authority was not so formed. It finds its origin in the language of section 1 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 58, as follows:

"That for the purpose of maintaining and operating the properties now owned by the United States in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, Ala., in the interest of the national defense and for agricultural and industrial development, and to improve navigation in the Tennessee River and to control the destructive floodwaters in the Tennessee River and Mississippi River Basins, there is hereby created a body corporate by the name of the 'Tennessee Valley Authority' (hereinafter referred to as the 'Corporation'). The board of directors first appointed shall be deemed the incorporators, and the incorporation shall be held to have been effected from the date of the first meeting of the board."

Thus the Authority was not incorporated "like any business corporation" under general incorporation statutes, but was by express declaration of Congress "created a body corporate" for the purpose of performing functions primarily governmental in character, its organization, duties, powers, authority, and character being expressly delineated in the act, as for any other governmental establishment or agency, without reference to general incorporation statutes or without respect to attributes which might inhere under such statutes or general corporation law. Is such Government agency, by virtue of thus being "created a body corporate" for the purpose of performing specified Government functions, necessarily to be regarded as a "Government-owned private corporation" within the principles of Skinner & Eddy Corporation v. McCarl? In Osborn v. Bank of the United States (9 Wheaton 738, 823, 827, 860), the Court, by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, said:

"The case of the Bank is, we think, a very strong case of this description. The charter of incorporation not only creates it, but gives it every faculty which it possesses. The power to acquire rights of any description, to transact business of any description, to make contracts of any description, to sue on those contracts, is given and measured by its charter, and that charter is a law of the United States. This being can acquire no right, make no contract, bring no suit, which is not authorized by a law of the United States. It is not only itself the mere creature of a law, but all its actions and all its rights are dependent on the same law. Can a being, thus constituted, have a case which does not arise literally, as well as substantially, under the law?

"This distinction is not denied; and, if the act of Congress was a simple act of incorporation, and contained nothing more, it might be entitled to great consideration. But the act does not stop with incorporating the Bank. It proceeds to bestow upon the being it has made, all the faculties and capacities which that being possesses. Every act of the Bank grows out of this law, and is tested by it. To use the language of the Constitution, every act of the Bank arises out of this law.

* * * * *

"* * * The bank is not considered as a private corporation, whose principal object is individual trade and individual profit; but as a public corporation, created for public and national purposes. * * * It is not an instrument which the Government found ready-made, and has supposed to be adapted to its purposes; but one which was created in the form in which it now appears, for national purposes only."

In United States v. Strang (254 U. S. 491), after referring to the organization of the Emergency Fleet Corporation by the Shipping Board under laws of the District of Columbia, the court said:

"The corporation was controlled and managed by its own officers and appointed its own servants and agents who became directly responsible to it. Notwithstanding all its stock was owned by the United States, it must be regarded as a separate entity. Its inspectors were not appointed by the President, nor by any officer designated by Congress; they were subject to removal by the corporation only, and could contract only for it. In such circumstances we think they were not agents of the United States within the true intendment of section 41 of the Criminal Code."

But in Posey v. Tennessee Valley Authority (93 F. (2d) 726), the court said:

"The Tennessee Valley Authority is a corporation created by act of Congress, 48 stat. 58, section 1, 16 U. S. C. A., section 831, for the purpose of managing certain properties of the United States developed in consequence of the World War, at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and of building further dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries to improve navigation and control floods, and to dispose of surplus electricity generated thereby. There is no capital stock. The operations are paid for by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States. The lands acquired belong to the United States. The great functions of the Authority are governmental in nature and might have been performed directly by the officers of Government. But a corporation consisting of three publicly appointed officials was created, and by section 4 (b) of the act, 16 U. S. C. A., section 831c (b), it was given power to sue and be sued in its corporate name. Notwithstanding the corporate entity and its subjection to suit, the Authority is plainly a governmental agency of the United States, and except as Congress may otherwise consent, is free from State regulation or control. McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316 4 L. Ed. 579); Johnson v. Maryland (254 U. S. 51, 41 S. Ct. 16, 65 L. Ed. 126). It may be emphasized that it is not a corporation created under the general laws of some State or territory whose stock the United States happens to own, as was true of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Panama Railroad Co.

* * * * *

"That section (sec. 3 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act) deals comprehensively with employees of the Authority. Evidently Congress regarded the employees as being substantially employed by the United States, and therefore takes off the fetters of the civil-service regulations which otherwise might apply.

* * * * *

"* * * it is a case in which a new sort of corporation is directly created by the legislature as an instrumentality of government; and in the same act the corporation is authorized to employ persons, and their injuries are considered and provided for, and then suit allowed where there is no otherwise provision.

"The true intent of the whole act is to be sought, in the light of its novel subject-matter and the intimate relation to the Government of the employments under it.

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, on December 6, 1940 (No. 8427), affirmed the lower court's dismissal of Dr. A. E. Morgan's suit for salary as a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority after his removal from office by the President, and, in the course of its opinion, stated in part as follows:

"It required little to demonstrate that the Tennessee Valley Authority exercises predominantly an executive or administrative function. * * * It is not to be alined with the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or other administrative bodies mainly exercising clearly quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial functions—it is predominantly an administrative arm of the executive department."

Thus the concept drawn from the statute is that the Tennessee Valley Authority, though denominated a "body corporate," is in reality an arm—an integral part—of the Government, as distinguished from "an instrument which the Government found ready made" (Osborn v. U. S. Bank, supra) or has formed or has had formed to facilitate its work, as exemplified by the Fleet Corporation and other corporations referred to in the Skinner & Eddy case, a distinction between the arm and the instrument it uses, and as the arm may be viewed as a member apart in the performance of its functions although inherently an integral part of the body, so the Authority is to be viewed as administratively an integral part of the Government although functioning as a corporate entity.

For these reasons the conclusion appears required that the Tennessee Valley Authority has a governmental status materially different from that of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and other similar Government-owned private corporations, and, therefore, that neither the reasoning nor the result in the Skinner & Eddy case applies to the Tennessee Valley Authority or would justify holding that the Authority was intended to be exempt from accountability under section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act.

In the conference report on the bill which became the Tennessee Valley Authority Act (H. Rept. No. 130, 73d Cong., 1st sess.), the managers on the part of the House stated, at page 19:

"We are fully persuaded that the full success of the Tennessee Valley development project will depend more upon the ability, vision, and executive capacity of the members of the board than upon legislative provisions. We have sought to set up a legislative framework, but not to encase it in a legislative straitjacket. We intend that the corporation shall have much of the essential freedom and elasticity of a private business corporation. We have indicated the course it shall take, but have not directed the particular steps it shall make. We have given it ample power, and tried to prevent the perversion and abuse of that power. We have set bounds to prevent its liberty from becoming license."

This statement of the managers for the House that the Tennessee Valley Authority was intended to have "much of the freedom and elasticity of a private business corporation," taken in its context, shows that it was not regarded as actually being constituted a private corporation, but in its functioning was to have "much" of the freedom and elasticity of such a corporation. However, "freedom and elasticity" in operations does not connote freedom from accountability. From the first the yearly appropriations for the Tennessee Valley Authority have been made in extended detail as to the purposes for which such appropriations might be used, the same as for other Government departments and establishments. See the act of June 16, 1933, 48 Statutes 295, for the first such appropriation, and the act of April 18, 1940, Public, No. 459, page 30, for the last, to date. Under all such appropriations, funds have been requisitioned and advanced to fiscal officers of the Authority on accountable warrants, the same as for other Government departments and establishments. Beginning with the appropriation made by the act of August 12, 1935, 49 Statutes 596, for the Tennessee Valley Authority for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, each yearly appropriation act has expressly provided that the sum appropriated, together with the unexpended balances of prior appropriations and the receipts of the Authority from all sources, with one exception, "shall be covered into and accounted for as one fund," to be available until the end of the particular fiscal year. A former Comptroller General construed this new language, incorporated in the appropriation acts, that the Authority's appropriation and receipts should "be covered into and accounted for" as one fund, as removing any doubt that the fiscal officers of the Authority were required by law to render their accounts to this office pursuant to the Budget and Accounting Act for the disposition of advances and collections, the same as in other departments and establishments.

It has been said that such new language was included in the appropriation acts at the instance of the Tennessee Valley Authority and, therefore, should not be viewed as intended to affect its status with respect to accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act. But the effect of the language is to be interpreted in the usual sense of the words as they were employed and adopted and apparently intended by the Congress, and not by what may have been intended or not intended by the Tennessee Valley Authority, and, on that basis, such provisions must be given substantial weight as showing that the Congress did not consider the Authority to be exempt from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act. It has been urged that such effect should not be given such provisions because contemporaneously with the first of such provisions and in connection with the amendment of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act in various particulars by the act of August 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 1080), there was a failure to adopt two different proposed amendments, one in the Senate and one in the House, expressly requiring, among other matters, that funds of the Tennessee Valley Authority be covered into the Treasury to be withdrawn only on accountable warrants. However, a reading of the debate on the two amendments (79 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 7465, et seq., May 14, 1935; id. 10972, et seq., July 10, 1935) shows that the opposition was directed primarily to other provisions of the amendments, particularly those restricting the power of the Authority to make contracts and purchases without advertising pursuant to section 3709, Revised Statutes.

In the House it was said by Representative HILL, page 10973, that the language of the amendment as first proposed "gave the Comptroller General more power over the Tennessee Valley Authority than the Comptroller General had over any department or any division of the Government," and that even as modified "it means that the Tennessee Valley Authority cannot even purchase a lead pencil without first coming to Washington and getting the permission of some auditor or other accountant in the Comptroller General's office." In the Senate it was said by Senator MCKELLAR, page 7466, that when he examined the amendment he found that it had a very different purpose from the one he thought was behind it and that "I find also that the Comptroller General does have jurisdiction over the accounting of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and for that reason I have changed my mind entirely with reference to the amendment." Under these circumstances the rejection of the amendments may not be viewed as detracting from the effect of the specific language later incorporated in the appropriation acts requiring the funds of the Authority to be covered into and "accounted for" as one fund, even though such procedure was involved as a part of the amendments theretofore rejected.

Moreover, it appears that the Tennessee Valley Authority has consistently been regarded as subject to the budgetary provisions of title II of the Budget and Accounting Act and has followed the regular Budget procedure thereunder in requesting, justifying, and obtaining its appropriations. Section 2 of title I, Definitions, of the Budget and Accounting Act, 42 Statutes 20, provides:

"When used in this act—

"The terms 'department and establishment' and 'department or establishment' mean any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government, including the municipal government of the District of Columbia, but do not include the Legislative Branch of the Government or the Supreme Court of the United States."

This definition is clearly broad enough to include the Tennessee Valley Authority as an "agency, or other establishment of the Government." The definition applies to the whole act; to title III establishing the General Accounting Office as well as to title II establishing the Bureau of the Budget, and it would at least be most incongruous to regard the Tennessee Valley Authority as an agency or other establishment of the Government for the purpose of justifying and obtaining its appropriations pursuant to title II of the act but as not such an agency or estaolishment of the Government when it comes to accounting for the disposition of such appropriations pursuant to title III of the act.

As originally passed by the House of Representatives the bill, H. R. 5081, which became the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, provided in section 10 (b):

"The board shall require a careful and scrutinizing audit and accounting by the General Accounting Office or its successor in performing similar duties, during each governmental fiscal year of operation under this act, and said audit shall be open to inspection to the public at all times, and copies thereof shall be filed in the principal office of the Authority at Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama. At least once during each fiscal year the President of the United States shall appoint a firm of certified public accountants of his own choice and selection which shall have free and open access to all books, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other places and records belonging to or under the control of or used by the Authority in connection with the business authorized by this act. And the expenses of such audit so directed by the President shall be paid by the board and charged as part of the operating expenses of the Authority."

As amended by the Senate and finally enacted there was substituted for these provisions the ones appearing in section 9 (b) of the act, 48 Statute 63, as follows:

"The Comptroller General of the United States shall audit the transactions of the Corporation at such times as he shall determine, but not less frequently than once each governmental fiscal year, with personnel of his selection. In such connection he and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property and places belonging to or under the control of or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with and balances in depositaries. He shall make report of each such audit in quadruplicate, one copy for the President of the United States, one for the chairman of the Board, one for public inspection at the principal office of the Corporation, and the other to be retained by him for the uses of the Congress. The expenses for each such audit may be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. All such audit expenses shall be charged to operating expenses of the Corporation. The Comptroller General shall make special report to the President of the United States and to the Congress of any transaction or condition found by him to be in conflict with the powers or duties entrusted to the Corporation by law."

Thus there was substituted for the provision of the House bill for periodical special audits by outside firms of certified public accountants, in addition to "a careful and scrutinizing audit and accounting by the General Accounting Office," a provision for such periodical audits to be made by the Comptroller General with personnel of his selection. This substitution and the use of much of the same language with respect to such periodical audits strongly indicates they were intended to be of the general character which the House bill contemplated would be made by a firm of certified public accountants, except that they were to be made under the Comptroller General by personnel of his selection instead of by a firm of certified public accountants appointed by the President.

The original provision for having such special periodical audits made by outside firms of certified public accountants denotes no purpose to exempt the Tennessee Valley Authority from general accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act, but such audits were apparently intended to be in addition to the accounting required under that act, and it would follow that this accounting requirement was not changed by the elimination of the provision for audits by outside firms and the substitution therefor of the provision requiring the Comptroller General to make such character of periodical audits. That is, the provisions of section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, supra, were not intended to limit the functions of this office to the duties there prescribed, but such duties were intended to be in addition to those prescribed by general law in the Budget and Accounting Act. That the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius does not apply under such circumstances (see Morgan v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 28 F. Supp. 732).

As stated above, the various matters involved are not entirely clear. But on the whole record, and in the light of the considerations herein discussed, I am constrained to hold, in the absence of clarifying legislation, that the Tennessee Valley Authority is not exempted from accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act, and that the duties imposed on this office by section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, as amended, of making periodic audits of the transactions of the Tennessee Valley Authority are in addition to the duties of settling and adjusting the accounts of the fiscal officers of the Authority pursuant to section 236, Revised Statutes, as amended by section 305 of the Budget and Accounting Act.

Applying these conclusions will entail primarily (1) the resumption of the procedure of submitting disbursing and collection accounts to this office supported by original vouchers and necessary data for examination here by the Audit Division of this office and settlement as in the case of other Government departments and establishments, subject to review under my personal supervision of any disallowances upon appropriate request therefor, instead of having vouchers examined and exceptions raised as a part of the periodic field audits under section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act; (2) the deposit in this office of Tennessee Valley Authority contracts pursuant to the provisions of section 3743, Revised Statutes, as amended, 41 United States Code 20, requiring that "All contracts to be made, by virtue of any law, and requiring the advance of money, or in any manner connected with the settlement of public accounts, shall be deposited promptly in the General Accounting Office," and (3) making the periodic field audits pursuant to section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act on a basis as analogous as practicable to that of a financial or balance-sheet audit, and leaving generally to the settlement here of the disbursing accounts such questions as may arise as to the legality of particular expenditures.

Respecting the various points of past differences between the Tennessee Valley Authority and this office as to certain classes of expenditures, I think these should be resolved in the light of the statutory purpose of establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority as a body corporate so that it might have much of the freedom and flexibility of a private business corporation. Prior to the amendment of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act by the act of August 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 1080), there was no requirement in the act that purchases and contracts be made after advertising, that apparently being left to the sound discretion of the directors under the broad corporate powers conferred on the Authority, it appearing from the legislative history of the amendment of August 31, 1935, requiring such advertising with exceptions there stipulated, that it was not regarded that the general provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, were theretofore applicable. The same principle would be true of such matters as the purchase of "rubber boots and goggles, firearms for Authority safety officers, and noiseless typewriters," mentioned in the Authority's memorandum, supra. The records of this office show that the Acting Comptroller General held in intraoffice instructions of December 16, 1936, that the corporate powers conferred on the Authority to purchase and condemn real property carries with it the power to determine the validity of the title to be acquired and, accordingly, that section 355, Revised Statutes, requiring generally the approval of titles by the Attorney General, does not necessarily apply to acquisitions of real property under such powers. This view of the matter appears to be confirmed by the provision cited in the Authority's memorandum, supra, from the act of October 9, 1940 (Public, No. 825), revising said section 355, Revised Statutes, that "The foregoing provisions of this section shall not be construed to affect in any manner any existing provisions of law which are applicable to the acquisition of lands or interests in land by the Tennessee Valley Authority."

Respecting the certificates of settlement covering the period from July 8, 1933, to July 1, 1934, and the pending audit reports for subsequent years, you are advised that if the Authority will submit a statement indicating as to each disallowed item or exception—either directly or by reference to prior statements—the Authority's reason or reasons for disagreement, such items will be reviewed on the basis of the principles herein stated with a view to the allowance of credit and the removal of exceptions where such action appears justified, and the settlements and reports will be revised accordingly. Such action should be taken as promptly as possible so that revised audit reports may then be submitted to the Authority without further delay for the Authority's statements to be filed with the final reports pursuant to section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act as amended.

In the absence of further legislation determining otherwise the matter of the Authority's accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act, arrangements should be made as early as practicable to render accounts to this office supported by original vouchers and data for examination and settlement here, and to deposit contracts in this office as required by section 3743, Revised Statutes, supra.

Respectfully,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, some time ago, I called to your attention the conditions existing here in the Nation's Capital. As a result of the big influx of Government workers there is a scarcity of housing facilities and the available office space is not sufficient, in my opinion, to meet the requirements of the rapidly expanding Government departments. In addition to the need for added space on the part of the Government, there is also a demand on the part of private business for office space and housing facilities for the many employees who must necessarily be present here in Washington in connection with the defense program.

Today, I again wish to remind the House that local conditions are becoming worse and the need for action is most pressing. It has been suggested that several of the departments occupying valuable space here could be easily transferred to other cities where there is unlimited facilities in the housing and office fields. Such a transfer would serve a twofold purpose; first, it would allow the departments performing vital services in the defense program to expand, and secondly, the employees that would follow the transfer of the departments, would find housing accommodations more plentiful and at a more reasonable cost. In addition to all of the other reasons why it would be well to make a shift in certain departments, is the heavy load placed upon the transportation companies, electric-light company, telephone company, and the restaurants by the folks now in residence here.

The real-estate division of the Department of Commerce of New York City has had representatives here in Washington making personal calls on the various heads of departments outlining to them the type and cost of office space in New York City. There are more than 5,000,000 square feet of office space which might be occupied at once at an average rental of $1.25 per square foot, a rate which compares most favorably with the rate charged in this city.

I particularly referred to the advisability of transferring the Maritime Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission to New York, because practically all of their work originates in that city. It is interesting to note that the building at 24 Broad Street, New York City, adjoining the Stock Exchange, has been offered to the Government on the basis of a rental of $1 a year. Could you find a more appropriate or convenient location for the Securities and Exchange Commission? Certainly, you could not obtain space at a more reasonable rental.

I hope that the Members of the House will join with me in my efforts to move some of the departments out of Washington to other cities and by so doing, relieve the congestion here, thereby increasing the efficiency of the employees and the departments and at once increasing the limited housing facilities which are so badly needed at this time, here in the Capital of the world.

Resignation of Chief Justice Hughes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the announcement in this morning's press of the resignation of the Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, brings a feeling of great regret. With his retirement, which unfortunately is motivated by considerations of health and age, he closes an outstanding career of public service, extending over a third of a century.

As Chief Justice since 1930, he has come to symbolize, in the public mind, the majesty and dignity of the Supreme Court and the impartiality of its proceedings. His stately appearance and noble countenance commanded respect and confidence.

As the Washington Post so well states, his retirement "is like the passing of a landmark from the national scene."

Few men ever had so distinguished a career as Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, or left so great an imprint upon the events of the Nation. As a young member of the bar, his public service, and with it his rise to fame, began with his investigation, first, of gas rates and then of insurance companies as counsel to commissions set up by the New York Legislature. His disclosures in connection with these inquires swept him into the Governorship of New York State, in which capacity he served two terms. It was during the latter part of his second term as Governor that he was named by President Taft as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, which office he assumed on October 10, 1910. As a new member of the Court, he represented a liberal viewpoint, based on fundamental constitutional principles.

In 1916 the Republican Party chose Justice Hughes as its nominee for the office of President of the United States, and, in one of the most dramatic elections ever held in this country, he was denied the Presidency by the small margin of 3,777 votes. It will be recalled that he was at first thought to have been elected, until the late returns from California gave President Wilson that State's electoral votes and with them the election.

Following his defeat for the Presidency, Mr. Hughes resumed the practice of law. However, when Warren G. Harding was elected President, he asked the former Justice to become his Secretary of State. Mr. Hughes filled the office with great distinction for 4 years, from 1921 to 1925, after which he returned to the practice of law.

When illness forced Chief Justice Taft to resign on February 3, 1930, President Hoover the same day nominated Mr. Hughes to that office. His nomination was confirmed by the Senate on February 14, 1930.

The Washington Daily News, in its editorial today, pays tribute to Mr. Chief Justice Hughes in the following language:

Although he is 79, and his retirement has been long predicted, still it is a shock to see him step out of a public life that he has adorned in so many high capacities. His very physical presence, his kindly dignity which invariably commands the word "Olympian," his massive frame, and splendid beard have been a sort of symbol in this country—a symbol of the benignant powers and protections that issue from the basic law.

But the Chief Justice has been much more than a symbol. There is no need to recall in this space the record of his public service; suffice it to say that, whether as legislative counsel, or Governor, or Presidential candidate, or Secretary of State, or Chief Justice, he has served his country well.

Not that he has been immune to criticism. In the early days when he was letting daylight into the corrupt practices of the insurance kings he was pilloried as a radical. Later, as a corporation lawyer, he was abused as a reactionary. And on the bench he has grown used to sharp words from both left and right.

The fact is, it seems to us, that he has been neither radical nor reactionary, but rather the inheritor of the mantle of the great compromisers who sought to smooth the history of this country's middle years. It is commonly thought that his generalship, his skill at give and take, at steering a course between the election returns and the precedents helped mightily to preserve the Supreme Court from degradation in the crisis of 1937.

The writer of the editorial concludes with the thought that "we do not envy President Roosevelt his task of choosing a Chief Justice who will not look too small in the chair of Justice Hughes." It will indeed be difficult to find a man who will measure up to his stature.

I am sure I speak the sentiment of the House when I say that while we have a selfish regret in his retirement we sympathize with his desire to lay aside the cares of his high office after so many years of faithful and distinguished service, and wish that his health may be fully restored and that he may enjoy many more years of life.

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER OF A CONGRESSIONAL SECRETARY

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the Congressman was ill, but the letter to the home folks had to go out, so the secretary wrote it, and here is her idea of the news of the week:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

One of the most interesting results of the President's message to the Nation and to the world, heralded as an epoch-making event, is the reactions it has produced. Those who are in sympathy with the President's foreign policy hail it as a clear-cut outline of the course we should follow. Those who disagree say it is but another effort to confuse the people; that it says nothing that the President has not said before, except that it brings us just that much nearer to the accomplishment of his purpose, that is, our active participation in the war.

Since the delivery of the President's message, I received a letter from a resident of the District, inquiring as to what the President meant and what he would do now. Well, as the saying goes, "That is a poser." We all know from past experience that what the President says does not necessarily indicate what he will do. Quoting from a Pennsylvania daily:

"What the President said, for the most part he had said before. * * * What the President meant is another matter for which his fellow citizens will wait patiently while he interprets his meaning in his acts. Meanwhile, question marks must stand in the place of interpretations."

What the President did not say was what we are to use for the destroying of the Axis Powers, just where the battle is to be fought, or what we are to do with Germany after she has been defeated. Are we to join the British in a new nobility, with a few American lords, and establish a ruling class in Germany, to be maintained by the armed forces of America, paid for by her taxpayers?

OIL

Mr. Ickes, the august Secretary of the Interior, holds, by appointment from the President, the position of Petroleum Coordinator for National Defense, and it is his duty to make recommendations with regard to that product. One news commentator has stated that, under the unlimited emergency declaration of the President, the recommendations of Mr. Ickes for the conservation of our oil supply would virtually amount to decrees. Mr. Ickes says that, because transportation facilities have been greatly curtailed by the taking over of oil tankers for defense purposes, unless some arrangement can be made to transport oil, our citizens may have "gasless Sundays," and that the price of gasoline may skyrocket.

The threatened oil shortage is causing grave concern and it has been indicated that President Roosevelt may take steps to eliminate any possibility of interruption of the national-defense program. He already has warned that "restriction of oil consumption to essential uses" is a "distinct possibility" and has urged Congress to authorize acquisition of rights-of-way to provide for construction of oil pipe lines from the South to the East.

In this connection, it is a little difficult to understand the policy of the Government in permitting oil exports to Japan. In March, last, America shipped more than 1,500,000 barrels of oil to Japan, and this was about one-third of former shipments. To quote the President of the Honolulu Oil Corporation:

"All American oil companies have told State Department officials that they are prepared to halt these shipments, but we have not received such instructions."

UNITED STATES TO TRAIN BRITISH PILOTS

Secretary of War Stimson has announced that June 7 will see the beginning of a program to train Britons as Royal Air Force airmen in the United States. The plan calls for the training of 4,000 as fighter and bomber pilots annually through the same instruction as now given for flying cadets of the Army Air Corps; annual training of 3,000 as fighter and bomber pilots according to Royal Air Force course of instruction, and the training of approximately 1,000 annually as aerial navigators.

MORE BILLIONS

During the week beginning June 2 the House is scheduled to begin consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, which calls for appropriations of approximately $9,000,000,000. And can you remember back to 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, when the average total appropriation for the operation of the entire Government was a little over $4,000,000,000?

Tennessee Valley Authority

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the greatest safeguard that this country has against usurpation on the part of the Executive is the auditing of the accounts of the different agencies of the Government by the Comptroller General. In this connection, I call attention particularly to the letter sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the Comptroller General, Hon. Lindsay C. Warren, on the 2d day of June 1941, wherein he reports to the Congress the fact that the Tennessee Valley Authority has defied the Comptroller General and refuses to submit its original accounts and vouchers to the Comptroller General with every audit.

Corporation Normal Profits and Excess Profits Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. PADDOCK

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

STATEMENT BY JAMES F. STILES, JR., VICE PRESIDENT AND TREASURER, ABBOTT LABORATORIES, NORTH CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the 1941 tax bill is one of the most important documents in American history. By its provisions, our great Republic apportions among its citizens the enormous cost of unprecedented appropriations for national defense. We must make every effort to distribute these burdens with justice and sound judgment.

Mr. James F. Stiles, Jr., is a businessman who has been a serious student of taxation. In his recent appearance before the House Ways and Means Committee, he made recommendations which deserve our careful consideration.

The statement follows:

The problem of taxing equitably growing companies is unquestionably one of the most difficult which we have to face. The fair application of an excess-profits tax seems to me to be even more puzzling. The fact that you have recognized the unjust discrimination which the original revenue bill of 1940 worked against growth companies and corrected it in part by H. R. 3531 was most encouraging. In fact, your attitude in that matter, especially your prompt action on sections 713 and 742, inspired me with sufficient courage to request a hearing before this committee if for no other reason than to express my sincere appreciation of your action.

I have a problem which my company and hundreds of other relatively small growing organizations face in connection with the excess-profits tax if it remains as it now stands. I feel it is a privilege to present that problem to you, and at the same time also submit to you what seems to me to be a simple and fair solution.

I am convinced that while it is necessary for you to levy, and all of us to pay, all the taxes that can be raised, it is not your intention to tax normal profits of any company as excess profits, when it is possible to determine what are normal profits.

Every growing organization today must, through constant research and development work discover better means of making new and more useful consumer goods which must be sold for less money if they expect to keep on growing. Such companies form the backbone of our normal peacetime economy. Their discoveries during the past have made, and in time to come will continue to make, our country outstanding in the world in that respect.

If such growth companies by reason of their research are able to contribute to the economic welfare of our Nation, and in so doing increase not only their profit but their pay roll, then I believe you will agree with me that at least that increase in profit which bears the same relationship to their pay roll as their normal profit bore to their pay roll during the base period is and can be justly called normal profits.

I, therefore, submit to you for your consideration the following simple formula for determining normal profits of a growing company:

Determine the average ratio during the base period of pay roll (subject to social-security taxes) to net profit (net income after deduction of normal tax) and use such ratio to determine the base credit for normal profits in each subsequent year, for example:

Total pay roll (subject to social-security taxes):
1936	$1,000,000
1937	1,500,000
1938	1,400,000
1939	2,100,000
Total	6,000,000
Net profit (after deduction of normal tax):
1936	600,000
1937	900,000
1938	800,000
1939	1,200,000
Total	3,500,000

Net profit—58.33⅓ percent of total pay roll subject to social-security tax.

1941 pay roll: $3,000,000×58.33⅓ percent—$1,750,000, which becomes base credit for the year 1941 to be used to determine excess profits.

1941 net profit after normal tax	$2,500,000
1941 base credit allowed as normal profit	1,750,000
Subject to excess-profits tax	750,000

In presenting this formula for determining normal profits in a growing company, I desire to make very clear the following:

(1) It is not offered as a substitute for any of the present methods but as an additional provision or yardstick.

(2) It is not offered as a panacea for all difficulties nor do I presume to say it is the only method. I it is a simple, logical, and fair one.

(3) I do believe its adoption will definitely encourage those companies, whose pay roll in the lower brackets expands as they grow, to keep on growing—and thus they will pay more normal tax plus excess-profits tax if their net profit after normal tax increases faster than their pay roll.

(4) If adopted as an additional alternative, I believe it will very definitely be an incentive to cooperation in increasing employment, stimulate research and development work, and thereby strengthen our national industrial relationships.

(5) Its simplicity makes it easily understood and at the same time it can be applied to thousands of organizations which operated at a profit during the base period, each one of which might have a different relationship between pay roll (subject to social-security tax) and net profits (after normal tax), depending on many factors peculiar to their own business.

(6) I believe that growing organizations will play a vital part in the economic readjustment which must take place after the defense spending is discontinued. The knowledge they acquire by continuous research and development work, as well as the steady employment and normal profits which will arise by new discoveries, will not only help to pay the defense bill but put us in a position as a nation to meet competition in the new world relationships which will arise after this conflict is over. Certainly we need not and must not stop all present development and postpone all progress until the emergency is over.

All this formula does is to use the average earnings method with pay roll (up to $3,000 annual salary per employee) as a common denominator. It says to every one of us:

"If you are a growing corporation, if your nondefense business and your profits increase, and if at the same time your pay roll increases in the same proportion, then your growth is normal; the kind we wish to permit and encourage; and your profits will correspondingly be considered normal."

It does not interfere with the defense program but it does encourage industries to keep on growing and find new ways to replace materials now needed for defense. It rewards them for putting men to work—which will be the real problem when the defense spending stops.

The success, nay even the preservation, of our entire economic system will depend on what we can and will do after this great struggle is over.

This suggestion in a sense involves a little long-distance planning. One thing is certain: It does not take away from anyone any other benefit the present law gives him. It would focus some attention on employment in the lower-income brackets, which I am sure you will agree is a good thing for everyone.

I have suggested that "this option should not apply to any part of a corporation's profits arising directly out of defense contracts or subcontracts." In making this suggestion I had no thought of profiting by increased employment due directly to defense spending.

I believe that this formula should not be applicable to any company whose net profits after normal tax exceeded its pay roll, but your committee with the aid of your experts can decide that question better than I can.

The idea that capital alone makes profit is fundamentally wrong. Only when capital employs "human effort" or when it is loaned to an enterprise which employs "human effort" is economic value created and profits accrue to the entrepreneur. Therefore, pay roll, the basis for compensating the producer of economic wealth, related to the net value of what he creates (profits) is to my way of thinking a practical, simple yardstick for measuring normal profits.

Finally, these growing companies in the main supply the peacetime requirements of our Nation. For that reason they could and did maintain employment during the depression. The continuous production of such commodities and the development of new products should maintain a supply of needed goods which in itself will help offset dangerous inflationary price tendencies at least in the products which they produce.

Federal Mediation Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, in these critical days when the fate of our democratic world hangs in the balance I hope I will be pardoned if I attempt to discuss, through the medium of two cracker-box philosophers, one important current event.

In order to center attention on the Federal Mediation Board and its brilliant chairman, Dr. Clarence A. Dykstra, I have listened in, so to speak, on an argument between "Old Bill" and his crotchety friend "Si" and am here reporting their reactions to one of the phases of the strike problem.

Old Bill hunched his shoulders and observed: "I been a-readin' in the newspapers that that there Board that the President appointed has been settling strikes."

"They sure have!" said Si.

"Well," says Old Bill, " 'taint no surprise to me. That there President of ours is one wise feller. He done picked a good Dutchman. Not no German, but a real Dutchman, that there feller Dykestraw. Oh, maybe his name ain't got no 'w' on the end of it, but that don't signify nothin'. Dykes is the salvation of the Dutchmen. If 'twer'nt for the dykes in them there Netherlands the whole country would be under water. But, jest the same, that there feller Dykestra, or Dykestraw, that makes no odds, is one fine feller. He used to be a perfessor, out California way, that's agin him I admit. But perfessor or not, he went ter Cincinnati and he sure did a whackin' job in that there city."

"But," observed Si, "what's that got to do with strikes?"

"Well, ye pesky old varmint, it's got a lot to do with strikes! This here feller Dykestra, I'm usin' your own spellin', is, what all sensible people call a realist. He ain't a union partisan. He ain't no Democrat partisan, he ain't no Republican partisan, he's an American partisan. He looks on a strike as something that interferes with national defense and with aid to the democrats, that is furriner democrats. I ain't never been too sure about them furriner democrats, but a friend of mine onct told me that them there Greeks really invented democrats. Anybody that invented democrats is got my sympathy. I always thought that Jefferson invented democrats, but the feller that I talked to argeed so well that I was fool enough to agree with him that the Greeks really invented democrats. That bein' so, I'm for them there Greeks. I don't like their cookin' but I'm still for 'em."

"Let's see. That there Board, headed by a Dutchman, did settle some strikes. No doubt about it. That there Allis-Chalmers fandango was a-goin' strong after about 70 days, wasn't it? Well, old Dyke and his pals finally got a shot at it, and bingo, it was over. I say Dyke and his pals because I happen to know Dyke. I happen to know that he is one smart feller. He's one of them perfesser fellers that keeps his feet on the ground."

"Oh!" observed Si. "He's one of them practical idealists. I read them there words in a book. I had to spell out most of the stuff and it didn't mean much to me, but that there 'practical idealist' thing kind of made sense."

"Well," observed Old Bill, "this here town, Bass Center, is not as bad off as I thought it was. If Si can get it through his thick head that there be such a animal as a practical idealist, then it is a sure bet that there must be about 100,000,000 peepul who can understand it. That's turrible encouraging. I just do hope that them there Congressmen, the fellers that represent the peepul, will also see the pint.

"Of course, what the highbrow fellers call the 'processes of democracy' are jest in our blood. We believe that democracy is not just a name but a principul. I'm still sorry we didn't invent it, but we've invented almost everythin' else, so Hoo ray! for them furriners, the Greeks, I mean."

"What do you mean, feller, by the processes of democracy?" asked Si.

"I mean jest what I say. I mean that in this here country, which ain't no furrin country, that democracy means just this. It means that we fellers, ignorant, bawdy, illiterate—thems words I read in a book—are still the fellers that say what's what. As long as we can say that we are Democrats—oh, I know the highbrow fellers say that's democracy—but I ain't no fussboddy about words. I am one of the fellers that is strong fer action. That's what the President's Board got. Action. Even if a Dutchman is chairman of that there Board, I'm still fer him. He is like that other Dutchman that stuck his hand in the hole in the dyke—he stopped the flood. That's the kind of action I go fer."

Freedom of the Seas

OF MICHIGAN

EDITORIAL FROM COLDWATER (MICH.) DAILY REPORTER

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include excellent editorial comment by Mr. Roy Newberry, editor of the Coldwater (Mich.) Daily Reporter, in the issue of Wednesday, May 28, 1941:

[From the Coldwater (Mich.) Daily Reporter of May 28, 1941]

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS

Before our soldier boys march away to battle for "the freedom of the seas"—an issue which was declared paramount in President Roosevelt's fireside talk last night—why not let someone define the expression so that those of us who listened in may understand it?

Since the war first started the "seas" have been far from free. Thousands of men, women, and children have found watery graves in blockades of shipping lines and millions of tons of boats and cargo have come to rest in Davy Jones' locker. A very large percentage of the shipping loss has been British, but Germany has suffered, and is still suffering, terrific losses.

One of the first objectives of Britannia has been to "rule the waves" and she has in bygone years made very little bones about it and has heralded the fact in song and story. One of the first objectives of that same Britannia today is to "rule the waves" with a "far-flung battle line" so that Germany may be deprived of the sinews of war.

Can America expect or look for "freedom of the seas" under the conditions which prevail in Europe today? Can America with all its resources establish and maintain such freedom? To assume such a possibility is pretty farfetched and the best America can hope for is to restore to Britannia her fabled prestige of bygone days when she, by sheer force of naval supremacy, arrogantly commanded the lanes of commerce of the seven seas.

And if our boys die, they will die fighting England's battles. Is that to be the great aim of national devotion? Is that to be the objective of our patriotism and loyalty?

Life and Character of Jefferson Davis, the First and Only President of the Confederacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALL DOXEY
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. WALL DOXEY, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me today, June 3, 1941, on the life and character of Jefferson Davis, at the foot of his statue in Statuary Hall, United States Capitol, commemorating his one hundred and thirty-third birthday.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Madam Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it has been said, "A people pays tribute to itself when it gives due recognition to true greatness."

Today we as a united Nation honor ourselves by commemorating the birthday of that great soldier, leader, patriot, and statesman—Jefferson Davis.

Here in the most beautiful Capitol of the greatest Nation on earth—here in historic Statuary Hall, the Nation's Hall of Fame, at the feet of this imperishable bronze statue presented to this Nation by the great State of Mississippi as one of her two favorite sons, we gather to pay tribute, honor, and devotion to the first and only President of the Confederacy—Jefferson Davis.

One hundred and thirty-three years ago today, Jefferson Davis was born in what is now Fairview, Todd County, formerly Christian County, Ky., on June 3, 1808.

Early in life he moved with his parents to Wilkinson County, Miss. He was well educated and was graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

As a very young man he served with distinction in the Indian Wars and made a name for himself as a gallant soldier.

He resigned from the Army and married Miss Sarah Knox Taylor, daughter of Col. Zachary Taylor, afterward President of the United States. They went to his plantation—"Briarfield" in Warren County, Miss., about 20 miles below Vicksburg. In a few months, however, his wife died, and for some years he lived in great seclusion, but in valuable preparation for his future career, as his time was spent in wide reading, constant study, and deep thought.

His entrance into political life was in 1842 when he was elected to the Twenty-ninth Congress as a Democrat from Mississippi, and served as Congressman-at-large from Mississippi in this very hall in which we are now gathered.

He shortly resigned to take command of the First Regiment of Mississippi Riflemen in the War with Mexico in 1846. His distinguished and gallant service in the Mexican War, especially at the seige of Monterey and at the Battle of Buena Vista, is well known to all of us.

He served as United States Senator from Mississippi and was appointed Secretary of War by President Pierce and served 4 years.

Then he was again elected to the United States Senate and served in that body as a Senator from Mississippi from March 4, 1857, until January 21, 1861, when with other southern Senators he withdrew from the Senate.

He was chosen President of the Confederacy by the Provisional Congress and was elected by the Confederacy as President of the Confederacy, serving as President of the Confederacy during the duration of the War between the States.

He was captured by the Union forces, imprisoned for 2 years, indicted for treason, released on bail, and his case was finally nolle prosequi by the Federal Government.

He returned to his beautiful home, "Beauvoir," on the Gulf coast of Mississippi, where he spent the remaining years of his life. Here he prepared his great book on the Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government.

During these trying years, one of the great sustaining forces of his life was his second wife, Varina Howell Davis, of Natchez, Miss., whom he married in 1845. She shared with him the glory and honor of achievement, together with the sorrow and humiliation of defeat, having those strong, heroic qualities of character that enabled her to bear, with matchless fortitude, the varying fortunes of her eventful life.

When he was a prisoner in Fortress Monroe, she plead for the privilege of sharing his imprisonment, and during the last year of his captivity this was granted and she was with him, cheering and encouraging him.

As his faithful companion and comforter, Mrs. Davis fully met the demands of misfortune as she had his years of success.

He died December 6, 1889, and is buried in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Va., the city where he was inaugurated president of the Confederacy.

Mrs. Davis survived him for some years, and in these years did honor to his memory in her excellent biography, Memoirs of Jefferson Davis, in which she presents him as he was: "The great soldier, marked and fitted for more than fame; the citizen, fashioned in the old faithful type; the Christian, who was a lover of all high and righteous things."

Before the death of Mrs. Davis, which occurred October 16, 1906, she gave to the State of Mississippi, as a home for Confederate soldiers, beautiful Beauvoir, the last home of Jefferson Davis.

On this very day Beauvoir is being dedicated as a national shrine to be known as Jefferson Davis Shrine.

Truly this favorite son of the South was a wonderful man with a remarkable life. He lived in the bosom of his country, friends, and family.

This afternoon, as we gaze upon this beautiful statue and pay homage to his memory, we as Americans are inspired and thrilled by his eventful life and brilliant yet tragic career.

This country will never again produce a man who was idolized more by some and spurned more by others. However, through it all he was a man among men, a leader among leaders.

In peace as well as in war, he always played a commanding part and gave his all for others and the country he loved so well.

As time goes on and the history of this great country is written and rewritten, the name of Jefferson Davis will be listed among the bravest of the brave. Truly one of God's noblemen.

At this critical time when the war clouds again hover over these United States and as a united people, believing in the principles of democracy, our pleasant way of life is being threatened, we as sons and daughters, grandsons, and granddaughters of men and women who have made this country great and powerful should cry out, "Give us more men and leaders whose souls are inspired with lofty ideals and noble purposes as was the soul of Jefferson Davis."

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK SUN

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following special to the New York Sun under date of May 31, 1941:

[From the New York Sun of May 31, 1941]

PRESIDENT'S POWERS GROW VAST AND CONGRESS HAS FEW LEFT—COMING GRANT OF AUTHORITY IN R. F. C. BILL WILL MAKE HIM ALMOST AS SUPREME AS TOTALITARIAN DICTATORS

(By Phelps Adams)

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Congress, already reduced to the status of a mere kibitzer on the Washington scene, was moving rapidly today to confer on President Roosevelt the broadest grant of authority he has received since the enactment of the lease-lend bill.

Today the President is perhaps almost as independent of Congress as the foreign dictators are of the parliamentary bodies of their own respective lands. By his emergency proclamation of last Tuesday he has seized the extraordinary powers conferred on all past Presidents in time of war. In addition, he wields many other powers which Congress has delegated to him during the last 8 years as the country has progressed from one emergency to another—powers specifically vested in Congress by the Constitution, but now exercised by the Executive.

In actual practice Congress today performs only three functions in connection with the crisis which confronts the Nation: It levies taxes, it appropriates money, and it passes bills giving away more of its power to the President.

This third function is becoming less and less important as more and more of its power goes to the White House. The second has already been delegated to the President in large measure under the Lease-Lend Act, and under the pending R. F. C. bill, which gives the administration vast sums to spend at its own discretion without further consent by Congress.

Only the first function—the levying of taxes—remains the exclusive task of Congress, and it is to this duty that the legislative branch is expected to devote the major part of its attention during the next 2 or 3 months.

Theoretically, of course, and constitutionally, the Congress also retains the exclusive right to declare war, but the President, as Commander in Chief of both the Army and Navy, can plunge the Nation into an undeclared war anywhere in the world, and send troops, planes, and ships to fight in that war.

So Congress daily becomes a factor of smaller importance in the affairs of Government, doing less and less about more and more as time passes, and Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, isolationist, of Montana, in a radio address this week, pointed out that the President, in his dramatic fireside chat to the Nation, did not bother anywhere in the course of his 45-minute address to so much as mention the Congress of the United States.

The new powers which Congress is expected to hand over to the Executive during the coming week are embraced—almost parenthetically—in a bill to increase the lending authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and so sweeping is their scope that critics of the measure have charged that it would enable the President and Federal Loan Administrator Jesse Jones to create a Fascist state.

The legislation itself is in the form of an amendment to existing provisions of law enacted several months ago, when the Congress expanded the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank to permit a wholesale program of loans to South American republics in promotion of the good-neighbor policy.

At that time the R. F. C. was given authority to create or organize governmental corporations to implement the national-defense program by performing various functions set forth in the law in precise terms. These corporations were empowered to produce or acquire strategic materials needed in the rearmament effort; to buy or lease land and build or expand and equip plants for the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and implements of war; to lease these new plants to private operators or to operate them directly under a Government agency.

It will be noted, however, that this language limited the administration to the creation of corporations empowered only to manufacture arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

PROPOSED LIMITATIONS BEATEN

The new legislation which has been passed by both Houses of Congress in slightly different forms and is now in a conference committee of the two Houses where those differences are to be composed, would wipe out that limitation entirely by the mere addition of the words "and to take such other action as the President and the Federal Loan Administrator may deem necessary to expedite the national-defense program."

In other words, the President and Mr. Jones are authorized to create corporations empowered to do anything that the administration may desire to have done, and the only limitation imposed upon them under the language of the House version of the bill is that the R. F. C. may not have more than $100,000,000 outstanding under this particular provision of the law at any one time.

Critics of the bill were quick to point out that it would permit the President, for example, to proceed immediately with the construction of the St. Lawrence River power project despite the fact that Congress once refused to authorize it, and would enable him further to revive the Passamaquoddy tidal-power scheme and the Florida ship canal despite the action of Congress in killing both projects.

To meet this objection the R. F. C. itself recommended an amendment to the language of the bill which would have specifically outlawed the expenditure of funds on the St. Lawrence, Passamaquoddy, the Florida ship canal, or the Tombigbee River project; but under the White House lash administration forces in the Congress beat down all attempts to write these limitations into the bill.

WEAKENING THE NEUTRALITY ACT

Of interest to observers here, too, was the fact that while the President disavowed at his press conference this week any present intention of seeking revision of the Neutrality Act, this bill would further erase from that battered law a proscription against the extention of loans to belligerent nations. The bill specifically authorizes the R. F. C. to lend money to foreign governments who can provide collateral in the form of American securities, either governmental or private.

Representative JESSE H. WOLCOTT, Michigan, Republican, who led the opposition forces in the House when the measure was under consideration, pointed out today that the language of the bill was so loose that a foreign government could create an American corporation with whatever capital it desired and then use the stock of that corporation as collateral for a loan from the R. F. C.

The principal virtue of the bill, of course, lies in the fact that it disposes of large quantities of red tape, permitting the President to move quickly to meet some defense program need not now foreseen, but its fault lies in the fact that the abuse of the broad power it bequeathes would permit the President virtually to wipe out any private industry that he might wish to obliterate, whether or not that industry was in fact connected in any way with the defense program.

Shall We Submit to a Supreme Personal Government?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I personally feel that it can be stated with much truth that the people of the United States, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, has embarked upon the most gigantic and far reaching program ever undertaken by any people. In making this observation, I do not in the least except the program of England in creating and attempting to manage the whole British Empire. Our specific and categorical commitments to Canada and all of Latin America; our historically entrenched entanglements in the Philippine Islands and their relation to the far eastern problems; and our recent enunciations with reference to the "four freedoms," acting as an arsenal of ideas, of food, of manufactured equipment of all kinds, and of financial resources and raw materials all constitute a considerable program. Are our people mentally prepared to proceed to a successful conclusion of this ambitious program? Speaking very frankly, I do not believe they are and this, because they have not been given specific and sufficient information in the form of facts to prepare them for the great undertaking.

Mr. Speaker, we can well afford to go back and carefully review the political history of England from 1933 to 1939, both inclusive. We can well afford to carefully study the debates in the House of Commons and observe the excuses, the alibis, if you please, the specious arguments presented by the political leaders of England during all of the 7-year period. It would be well for us to compare that period and many of its developments with many of the presentations being made in our own country at this very hour and the things we are not accomplishing. In addressing my remarks to one of our very important Cabinet members just the other day, I observed that I personally felt the administration and the Cabinet were almost criminal in their pussyfooting attitude, plans, and procedure. Any fairly intelligent person who cares to inform himself must conclude that we are making such a slight degree of progress in our defense approach, in our preparation for a defensive war, in our preparation for carrying out the obligations announced by the President, that it is all no less than criminal against our people.

Mr. Virgil Jordan, president of the National Industrial Conference Board, Inc., in his address of May 21, 1941, made some very pertinent observations, which I now submit for the RECORD:

ADDRESS OF VIRGIL JORDAN, PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE BOARD, BEFORE THE GENERAL SESSION OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD IN TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING, WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY, MAY 21, 1941

In the minds of millions of Americans today there moves the shapeless shadow of a nameless fear which confuses their spirit and paralyzes their efforts. They sense that they stand in the same profound peril as the people of the French Republic 2 years ago, and the people of the British Empire today. The roots of that peril reach deep into the same dark morass of indifference, delusion, deception, and moral disintegration in which the people of France wandered till they were destroyed. We know that by that defeat and those which have followed it, vast satanic forces of evil festering for centuries in the poisonous swamps of political perfidy and exploitation in Europe and Asia have been let loose to range the world, infecting the spirits of men everywhere, corrupting their integrity, crippling their creative power, crushing their bodies and shattering their civilized life. We know that by the blindness and indolence of their leaders toward this peril in their time and place, the people of Britain may soon be beaten or absorbed into submission and their Empire broken. We know that when this is done we must stand alone in a world laid waste to face in utter isolation these powers of darkness which have destroyed it, and bear the solitary burden of battle with them, or become their final victim, as all others did who failed to defend themselves in time because their leadership was too false, too feeble, or too faithless. Though few among them can even imagine its meaning, many Americans are beginning to be dimly aware that we, too, have been out-tooled, out-armed, out-witted, and outstripped, as these others were, and that by unseen and silent disintegration and dissipation of the community resources we may suddenly find ourselves, like them, silently absorbed by the enemy, and subjected to its power, though we never see the invader's uniform, his airplanes, or his fleet.

The peril and the fear which so many Americans sense today lie deeper in their hearts than any prospect of destruction and death by the battleships or bombers of any enemy abroad. They could face a foreign foe with confidence and courage, and find leadership for such a struggle, if they did not feel that even in victory they still must face for an indefinite future the same enemy among and within themselves. The grim Guggernaut of supreme personal government in Germany, Japan, Italy, and Soviet Russia seems to many of them merely a magnified image of their own—its insect society in human form a mere reflection of themselves in the mirror of modern life. Millions of Americans today already feel like refugees in their own land, much more than those who have fled to it from others. They are beginning to believe that the America they have known and loved has already disappeared, its essential spirit of expansive faith in human freedom long since surrendered, absorbed, and submerged in the spirit of the ancient world, the normal world of those Asiatic hordes and European masses of humanity who for untold centuries have been concerned solely with bare subsistence and sheer survival.

They feel that long before the war began, or their Government invoked their aid in it, the democracy they are asked to deliver to the oppressed peoples of this ancient world had died or been destroyed in every nation involved in it, and their own as well. They fear that by blind pursuit of absolute personal and group power in their political life, and their passive and complacent acceptance of its bribes for their ballots, the great American experiment in human freedom has ended. They have seen the control of their Government pass out of their hands and become a private personal and group interest, as it is everywhere else in the world, an entity separate from themselves, to which their life, their labor, and their resources are dedicated, and for whose sustenance and nourishment they must henceforth live, work, and die. By their self-centered indifference and lack of foresight they have seen the initiative in creative community effort for security and for productive cooperation of labor, management, and tool-providers in the community pass to the sterile hands of the state, to be exploited for purposes of political power. They have seen that imperative and indispensable copartner of all democracy, their productive enterprise, subtly undermined and destroyed, the consumers it serves absorbed into the single stomach of the absolute state, and its management and labor transformed into camp followers or kitchen police of the political commissariat. They have seen the willingness and the strength of great masses of their fellow-men, and of themselves, to assume the risks and make the sacrifices of life and labor wane and weaken, to be replaced by a persistent search for passive security and ease at any price, which they expect someone else to pay. They have seen one group after another among them recklessly destroy for some immediate imagined advantage to themselves those constitutional and institutional defenses of freedom and justice upon which these and all the rest of us must one day depend for our very survival, knowing that those who take the sword of the supreme state into their own hands for purposes of personal or group power shall perish by that sword.

They have been told, by those who ought to know, that in all these things they are seeing beaten out before their eyes on the anvil of experience, in blood and bitterness, by shattering bombs and subtle brains, a new world, not so brave as the old, but more orderly and less dangerous and hard, in which the gods of some omniscient management or some providential political power will give them their daily groceries and gadgets without risk, sacrifice, responsibility or cost.

They are dimly aware that in the delirious drive of their leaders in this messianic mission their minds are being deliberately kneaded like dough—and with it—and their emotions insistently needled by drugs of ignorance and deception into participation in a cosmic crusade to save for others something they have lost or wasted for themselves.

Seeing everywhere the violent and reckless struggle for personal and group advantage and gain, the devious evasion, the contemptuous flippancy, the complacent arrogance toward the community which accompany the conduct of this holy crusade for the rescue of democracy on the part of government, labor, and business management, they wonder whether this war for which their sacrifices are demanded is not indeed a mere incident in the domestic framework of American life—a mere incident of the same divine mission of permanent power to which its protagonists in Europe and Asia consider themselves called by God. If this be true, they fear that, long after the struggle to bring freedom to other nations shall have ended, whether in success or failure, the struggle to find it for themselves will only have begun again, and must go on for generations still unborn.

Sensing these things they wonder where and what is the freedom they are to defend. Where, then, and what, the dower of democracy with which they are to endow the world? If these things be blessings, why did these peoples of Europe and their leaders not fight for them to the bitter end, and if they did not, how can we deliver them who are in bondage to the same master as ourselves and like them have sold our birthright for the same mess of pottage?

So, when we search our hearts for the source of that pervasive fear which cripples and confuses our efforts in this crisis, whether we see our danger at home or abroad, we find that those powers of darkness which dismay us rise in the end out of those deep-seated weaknesses of spirit which have developed in the past quarter century in the people of our own and other countries, and which are expressed in the personalities and purposes of their leaders today. The collapse of European civilization and our own peril are rooted in the failure, both among the community of men and its leadership, of those essential qualities of integrity, independence, self-discipline, and responsibility upon which any enduring civilization depends. To recreate and revitalize them throughout the community and its leaders is the great task, not only of the future, but of today. It is necessary not only for reconstruction, but for survival.

It is their disintegration which is reflected in the destruction, conflict, and chaos of our time. The world we have known and lived in has crumbled to ruins around us, but the rubble of the bomb-shattered cities of Britain is but a symbol of a catastrophe far more profound. This was the most abnormal world the human record has ever known, a world of unparalleled progress and unimagined plenty, of unprecedented stability and peace born of the momentous discovery that truth, integrity, and responsibility, embodied and applied in the political and economic institutions and the public and private life of the community, could make men free, prosperous, and secure. It was the most revolutionary discovery ever made by the mind of man, but in the world it built it lasted only a little more than a century, a mere moment in human history. The normal world to which we sometimes dream today of returning, the world in which men had lived for unnumbered centuries before, was a world of treachery, terror, ignorance, and enslavement. This is the world to which the leaders of our time have once more turned the spirits and the immense productive powers of men which a mere century of human freedom and faith enabled them to command.

But today the time for post mortems is past. Whatever the sources of the peril and the fear that confuse and cripple us, we cannot now escape the task to which by fate we have been committed for the future, the most colossal task that has confronted any community of men in human history—the task of saving ourselves from the destructive power of the supreme state which has subdued the world, so that by grace of God we may help to restore among us many communities of men as may have the aspiration and the strength to sustain it elsewhere that essential structure of truth, integrity, and responsibility upon which the possibility of a humane civilization and human progress depends.

What any of us here may do or say cannot much matter to ourselves, for our lives are largely spent, but it will matter to the America that comes after us and the world in which she lives. We cannot give her integrity or liberty; her people will have to attain and preserve it for themselves; but we can at least transmit to them the aspiration and the opportunity which were entrusted to us by our ancestors who won it for themselves.

Despite all that I have said about the doubts and dangers that burden them today, the impulses, purposes, and aspirations of the American people in this crisis are noble in spirit and worthy of their character and the traditions of their country, a deep expression of that love of liberty, that hatred of tyranny, that generosity and sympathy toward the unfortunate and oppressed which have always marked America. We may be proud to be part of a people who can impulsively present such a spirit to an unhappy and tortured world, and implement it even to the point of folly.

But I submit that it were a tragedy too brutal and too humiliating to be borne by the broken heart of mankind if the spirit of such a people were to be betrayed or exploited by anyone, whether for a few pieces of silver or for the scepter of political power. In this dark hour of their great adventure America surely deserves and as surely desperately needs the utmost candor, competence, courage, and integrity which she can command or which a merciful Providence can grant in the leadership of her government, business management, and labor.

We have a right to ask whether those who urge and lead us to this colossal task understand what it means, and do they mean it themselves? Are they clearly conscious of the task, the suffering, the sacrifice, to which they ask the American people to commit themselves, and are they willing to commit themselves to it? Are they ready to accept for themselves the stern and uncompromising discipline it implies? Are they aware that it will require the sacrifice of numberless lives, and the resignation of all hopes of peace, prosperity, security, comfort, and social or political gains for an indefinite period? Are they willing to tell the American people that, in utter honesty and complete candor?

This is too great a Nation to need or deserve to be brought to defend itself or to fight for a great cause by any synthetic circumstance, or political manipulation, by having its Government range the world begging for a bomb or praying for a politically appropriate provocation. The true America does not move to its battles or its ballot boxes on its belly. It has something more to fight or vote for than its public corncribs, its political swill barrels, or its silver pigsties.

I am sure that, despite the doubt, confusion, conflict, and fear which afflict them today, the American people are willing to follow with unquestioning unity and allegiance any leader or group among them whom they can feel with complete confidence are utterly committed to the same cause as that for which they are called to make their sacrifices and endure their endless burdens and sufferings, and who is as prepared as they are expected to be to put aside all private purpose or aspiration of personal power, position, privilege, or pleasure in every aspect of life or work. They will make these sacrifices freely and unflinchingly and follow to the bitter end any who commands them in the name of this supreme cause, whenever they know in their hearts that he has won the right to command them by his unqualified acceptance of them.

Desperately as they may need and nobly as the deserve such leadership today, whether they get it or not, the American people should remember that the rescue or wreckage of their country does not lie in the hands of those walking shadows, those poor players of political power, who strut and fret their brief hour on this world's stage and are heard no more. It rests in the end in the hearts and minds and muscles of the nameless millions of men and women in America who must and will carry through whatever task and pay the price of whatever waste and suffering the weakness of their leaders has committed them to. No matter how supreme its power, or how complete its competence, the State can create nothing that does not already live and grow, nor destroy anything that is not already dead in the spirit of its people. It is at best but the scavenger of time and human aspiration.

They should remember that liberty is not granted us by grace of governments, constitutions, courts, or congresses, nor can we depend upon them permanently to preserve and protect it for us. It does not prevail or persist by the power of political traditions, parties, personalities, or laws. Liberty springs solely from the spirit of those common citizens who have the will and courage to create it for themselves, the strength and integrity to accept its responsibilities and pay its price, the valor, vigilance, fortitude, and fidelity to defend it even with their life against its unseen, incessant, and insidious enemies—indifference, ignorance, indolence, and injustice. Save as it is more precious to us than prosperity, peace, comfort, or security, it will never exist or long endure among us. Every man in each generation must renew and replenish its spirit in himself, and none can demand it for himself and deny it to others without destroying it for all.

The civilization by which we live is a vast invisible web ever woven anew of countless acts of sacrifice, fortitude, faith, and foresight by unnumbered, nameless men. Thread by thread these unseen strands of individual aspiration, effort, adventure, and accomplishment are spun into those indestructible cords of endurance, industry, independence, and integrity of spirit which bind society together. This frail fabric from the ceaseless loom of generations of unremembered lives is the strongest and most precious substance in the world, for by it alone we hang suspended above the abyss of savagery.

Save for these things, the story of the great adventure upon which America has embarked must be but as a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing, and all her yesterdays will have only lighted fools the way to dusty death.

We shall win prosperity only if we have the strength to suffer poverty; leisure, only if we have the will to labor endlessly; security, only if we have the courage to risk all; and peace, only if we have the pride to die fighting for freedom, truth, and honor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the Academy of Music in New York on Friday, May 23, 1941, during I Am An American Week, entitled "American Heritage":

As a Member of Congress, it has been my privilege for many years to serve on the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House of Representatives, and the last decade or so I acted as chairman thereof.

As such, it came to my lot to pass on legislation affecting the position of the alien in the United States. It was through my committee that laws were passed which provided for the naturalization of these aliens. I therefore became more than ordinarily conversant with the problems of the foreign-born, and all the steps taken by the alien to become an American citizen.

Many of us in the audience today are foreign-born—men and women who have come from many countries in the world to escape oppression and tyranny, and to make their homes with us under the protection of the American Constitution and the American flag. It is these men and women particularly who realize what it means to be an American. It is they particularly who will shout with glee and joy the message of "I am an American." Just as a person appreciates his good health only after he has gone through a long illness, so does a naturalized American appreciate the blessings of our liberty, where he and she came to this country to escape oppression and tyranny.

It is quite obvious that the blessings of liberty cannot be obtained without a struggle and without a desire to preserve those liberties at all costs. It is not enough to say "I am an American" and let the other man fight for the preservation of our cherished ideals. All of us, whether native or foreign born, who love and cherish this country, who believe in its institutions, and who pride themselves on being members of our community, must remember that the blessings of liberty can only be preserved if we are ready to fight for them. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and it is that eternal vigilance to which we must dedicate ourselves on this patriotic "I Am An American" Day. We must fight all subversive activities both from within and from without, and I can assure you that as long as the Lord spares me, you will find in me a protagonist and a fighter for these ideals of liberty and justice for which the American commonwealth stands.

A Department of Air Power—Why?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, there are many who look upon our air forces as simply auxiliaries to Navy warships and Army divisions. Recent European experience has proven that the air force is no mere subsidiary to the main branches of the military services but has its own place as a definite force for offense and defense. France might well have traded her Maginot line for a real offense and defense in the air. Even England with her mighty Navy has depended on the air force to defend her coast and naval bases. Comparatively small as the R. A. F. is, it has been the main defense of the British Isles.

In America, the ability of air power to strike at long range fits it admirably for defense of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, as the main air force can be shifted from one coast to the other in a matter of hours, rather than the many days required for the transfer of a navy through our canal bottleneck.

Why have we refrained from putting air power in its true position?

LET US TAKE A LOOK AT THE RECORD

First. Military aircraft manufacturers, in general, prefer foreign orders because they are not hamstrung by continual change orders but when the foreign governments accept a standardized product they stick to that design until completion of the contract. This is in direct contrast to our constant changing of designs and lack of standardization of material between our two services as well as the fear of the red tape and other restrictions which hinder rather than help production.

Second. We have no fixed continuous policy toward the development of the aircraft industry. We have no fixed policy toward air safety or the development of air power. There are those who would rather let our country fall than to give up their preconceived ideas as to what makes for supremacy in war.

Third. The necessity to develop airports and landing fields has been a matter of concern to all aeronautic experts. In fact, direct action by the Chief Executive was necessary to secure a decent sized airport for our Nation's Capital. Our airports have been developed without tactical regard to their defense situation and this has led to waste of vast sums of money, when the same amount judiciously expended would have given us strategically located airports, training fields, and concentration airports for our air power.

Fourth. Money alone will not build up our air power. Wide-awake executive control, good engineering judgment, and a working knowledge are also required. Congress has appropriated plenty of money in the past but the technical experience needed for a strong national defense is lacking.

Fifth. It does not require a genius to see that our present national-defense effort is lagging and that we are woefully behind other nations in our air power. We need coordination of air-power activities under one two-fisted department so that we can have, first, simplification of standard combat aircraft to make real production possible and make military needs in aircraft manufacturable and not just laboratory ideas; second, we need a single control of air power so that we can standardize and simplify our methods of manufacture to take full benefit of the well-known American production methods.

Sixth. What we must have is the greatest amount of defense per tax dollar that it is possible to get. Would not our people rather have 1,000 bombers with a speed of 350 miles an hour than one 45,000-ton battleship that has to have planes to protect it? Great Britain, possessing a great array of splendid capital ships, finds no way to engage them against the Nazi planes flying over England. Navy has its place in the war scheme, Army has its place, but do not forget for a minute that air power is the deciding, as well as the contributing, factor in any invasion threat as well as in any defense effort today.

We realize now that Col. William Mitchell was right in his contention that air power was destined to be the deciding factor in modern warfare. Accordingly, I am advocating as he did that a Department of Air Power be set up so that we can be fully prepared.

Air power is an absolute necessity for this country with the resultant calm planning and development of long-range aircraft which will keep control of the air and keep the enemy from our shores. Just the types of planes attached to an Army division or the planes attached to carriers and warships are not the ones that we most urgently need.

We have had to acquire outlying air bases because we have been shortsighted in our long-range airplane development. Had the money poured into the outlying air bases been spent on development of long-range fighting planes, we would not be worrying today about our national defense.

Air power is a most necessary and vital part of our defense mechanism, and our military leadership should be divorced from the control of air power and the control placed under a separate department.

We must have such a department, not only for our national defense and security, but also for our national air development and for the orderly and safe planning of civilian flying. We must always remember that when war clouds have cleared away, the immense war effort must be transiated to peaceful pursuits—and the Department of Air Power would have planned and prepared for that.

The emergency, with its Nation-wide stimulus to all phases of aviation, has created certain extremely urgent problems, and in order that our people may take full advantage in a long-range, well-planned program, I have introduced the following bill, H. R. 4790, to establish a Department of Air Power. Other nations have made rapid strides in this field and I believe such a department, if established, would be a more modern approach to the whole problem of America's national security. The prospect of a new era in civil-aviation development at the end of the war gives further incentive for long-range planning which can best be effectuated by the passage of H. R. 4790.

[77th Cong., 1st sess. H. R. 4790. In the House of Representatives, May 19, 1941. Mr. BEITER introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. A bill to establish a Department of Air Power]

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of national defense and economy in operation of our armed forces there is hereby created an executive department in the Government to be called the Department of Air Power; with a Secretary for Air who shall be the head thereof, to be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate; and whose tenure of office shall be like the heads of other executive departments. The provisions of chapter 1 of this title shall be applicable to the said Department. The purpose of the Department of Air Power shall be to foster, promote, and develop the art and science of aeronautics, both military and civil, and to bring together and to coordinate under one Department and head all of the governmental activities, both civil and military, now existing and vested in any executive department, military or civil, or in any board or independent agency of the Government: Provided, That the Bureau of Aeronautics with a limitation of 6,000 planes with necessary military personnel to maintain and operate them and the Air Corps of the United States Army with a limitation of 7,500 planes and necessary military personnel to maintain and operate them will be maintained under their respective departments.

SEC. 2. Assistant Secretaries: There shall be in said Department an Assistant Secretary in charge of Military Air Power and an Assistant Secretary in charge of Civil Air Power, to be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate. They shall perform such duties as may be assigned them by the Secretary or required by law.

SEC. 3. Bureaus and offices in the Department: The following-named offices, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service and all that pertains to the same shall be under the jurisdiction and supervision of the Department of Air Power:

1. The Aeronautical Board;

2. The Civil Aeronautics Board of the Department of Commerce;

3. The Weather Bureau in the Department of Commerce;

4. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics;

5. The Langley Memorial Aeronautical Laboratory and the branches thereof;

6. All agencies of the Government connected with the procurement of aircraft or aircraft supplies for the United States Government or any agency thereof;

7. All material and matériel, including airports, airdromes, factories, laboratories, etc., not required by the Army or Navy for the maintenance and operation of the planes assigned to those particular Departments.

SEC. 4. Bureaus, records, etc.: The official records and papers on file in and pertaining exclusively to the business of any bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service transferred to the Department of Air Power, together with the furniture and equipment in use in such bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service, are transferred to the Bureau of Air Power.

SEC. 5. Duties and powers invested in Department: All duties performed and all power and authority possessed and exercised by the head of any executive department in and of any bureau, office, board, branch, or division of the public service transferred to the Department of Air Power, or any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, or in relation to the duties performed by and authority conferred by law on such bureau, officer, office, board, branch, or division of the public service, whether appellate or revisory or otherwise, shall be vested in the Secretary of the Department of Air Power.

SEC. 6. Transfer of statistical or scientific work: The President is authorized to transfer the whole or part of any office, bureau, division, or other branch of the public service engaged in statistical or scientific work from the Department of War, Department of the Navy, or Department of Commerce to the Department of Air Power; and in each case the duties and authority performed and conferred by law upon such office, bureau, division, or other branch of the public service or the part so transferred, shall be hereby transferred with such office, bureau, division, or other branch of the public service or the part thereof which is so transferred. All power and authority conferred by law, both supervisory and appellate, upon the department from which such transfer is made, or the Secretary thereof, in relation to such office, bureau, division, or other branch of the public service, or the part so transferred, will, immediately, when such transfer is so ordered by the President, be full conferred upon and vested in the Department of Air Power, or the Secretary thereof, as the case may be.

SEC. 7. Records and papers and equipment transferred to the Department: The official records on file in and pertaining to any office, bureau, department, branch, or division of the public service transferred to the Department of Air Power, together with the furniture, equipment, etc., in use in such office, bureau, department, branch, or division of the public services are transferred to the Department of Air Power.

SEC. 8. Annual and special reports: The Secretary for Air shall annually, at the close of each fiscal year, make a report in writing to Congress giving an account of all moneys received by him and his Department, describing the work done by the Department in fostering, promoting, and developing the aeronautical science and making such recommendations as he shall deem necessary for the effective performance of the duties of the Department. He shall also, from time to time, make such investigations and reports as may be required by the President or by either House of Congress, or which he himself may deem necessary and urgent.

SEC. 9. Report on coordination of duties etc.: The Secretary for Air shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the Secretary for Air Power with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, boards, and departments, so far as they relate to aeronautics and its field, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers with a view to further legislation to further define the duties of the Department of Air Power.

SEC. 10. Transfer of personnel: The transfer, to the Department of Air Power under this act, of officers and employees of the different bureaus, offices, departments, branches, or divisions affected by this act shall be without change in classification or compensation, but the Secretary for Air Power is authorized to make changes in title and designation and prescribe such changes in the duties of such officers and employees as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. Military personnel in Air Power: (1) There are hereby created in Air Power commissioned officers of such number as the President may determine to be necssary, but not to exceed 22,000 in all grades and branches. The President is authorized to establish appropriate grades, titles, and ranks for such officers.

(2) The President is authorized—

(a) to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to the commissioned offices in air force flight officers from the Army or Navy, and such other individuals as he may determine to be fitted to perform the duties thereof;

(b) to prescribe the pay and allowances for the offices created by this section until otherwise provided by the Congress, but no officer so appointed shall receive less pay and allowances than officers of equal flight rank in the Army or Navy. No officer transferred from the Army or Navy shall receive lower pay or allowances than he was receiving as an officer of the Army or Navy when so transferred;

(c) to establish appropriate grades and ratings in Air Power, to assign thereto warrant and ratings from the Army and Navy with relative pay and allowances, but no warrant or enlisted rating shall receive lower pay or allowance in Air Power than he was receiving in the Army or Navy;

(d) to consolidate, eliminate, or redistribute the functions of bureaus, commissions, boards, and departments or divisions, to create new ones and fix the powers, duties, and functions of their executive heads and to take such other action not inconsistent with this act which he may deem necessary for perfecting the organization and coordinating the activities of the Department of Air Power.

SEC. 12. Governing laws and regulations: Where practicable and not otherwise provided and not inconsistent with this act and until otherwise provided by the Congress (1) The administration of the Department of Air Power shall be governed by the laws in force with respect to the Department of War and the Department of the Navy at the time of the enactment of this act; (2) the Air Power personnel shall be governed by the laws in force (including laws relating to relative rank, promotion, retirement, enlistment, and appointment of new personnel, reserves, and articles for the government of the Army and the Navy) with respect to the Air Corps of the Army and Navy.

Discrimination Is Subversive of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over station WJZ Sunday, June 1, 1941, entitled "Discrimination is subversive of democracy":

It is most disconcerting to find in these days of our effort to creat a thorough national defense, that agencies of our Government, as well as private employers who have contracts for national defense, discriminate against cur citizens by reason of their race, creed, or color.

Any attempt to do so at this time is playing into the hands of the enemies of democracy. Anything that creates disunion and disruption of our national effort is a link in the chains of slavery, which these enemies are trying to forge around all free people.

Our President, in the speech delivered a few days ago, called attention to the fact that our country is at the present time surrounded by totalitarian forces. We are a minority seeking to carry on the torch of liberty, in a world where liberty seems to have been extinguished. We are trying to carry on the American way of life against a world of enemies, seeking to do everything in their power to disrupt and destroy our American way of life. We are seeking to maintain an American standard of living, in a world where the standard of living is being undermined and put on the basis of slavery, instead of free labor. It is therefore of great importance to us at this junction to insist that democratic principles and ideals be maintained within our own borders, that cooperation among the many sections of our population be promoted, and that there be no attempt made to divide our citizens by virtue of race, creed, or color.

American citizens should have equal rights to employment, equal rights to participate in our national effort to establish a thoroughgoing national defense, and equal rights to contribute their share to the well-being of the Nation, in accordance with their abilities, character, and reputation. Discrimination, because of race or creed does not belong in a democracy, and it is a most unhealthy practice for this Government to allow such a thing, right under our noses when we are spending billions of dollars to defend democracy. What good is it to defend democracy against attacks from without, when we allow the basic principles of democracy to be violated right here in our country?

When Government departments, which should set an example for the rest of the people of the unity of our democracy, take it upon themselves to discriminate against our own citizens, there is something "rotten in the State of Denmark," and something should be done to call a halt to such procedure. Any Government official, who is entrusted with the power to select personnel, and lets his prejudices govern him in determining who should, or should not be selected, is not worthy of his trust, and should be summarily removed from office.

Many instances of discrimination by Government departments, as well as by private employers, who have contracts for national defense, have been brought to my attention. In such cases, it was clearly shown that certain people in power had adopted the policy of judging applicants for positions not by their qualifications and ability to fill the respective positions but by their racial or social backgrounds. I know of cases where thoroughly qualified men were refused employment simply because they were of a racial origin which did not appeal to the particular person who had to make the appointment.

We must not assume that, because the national background of an individual happens to be of a country which saw fit to embrace a totalitarian ideology, that just because of that, this particular individual is not going to act the part of a loyal American citizen. Quite the opposite, some of our best American patriots have come from national backgrounds which are "totalitarian," and some of them have made splendid officers in both the Army and Navy, loyal civil servants, and the like. As a matter of fact, an example of that background is the former presidential candidate of the Republican Party, Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, as to whose patriotism or loyalty there surely can be no question among Americans.

Furthermore, people who come from countries where there has been discrimination are likely to remember their origin and appreciate the blessings of liberty more than others who take their liberty for granted. So that, as a matter of fact, we cannot find any more loyal citizens in this country than among those whose national origin is such that persecution and tyranny have left their indelible imprint in their blood. And now if people who are clothed with power and authority will use that power and authority to undermine the very principles upon which our democracy has been built, how can they expect the rest of the country to believe that they are worthy of the positions of trust in which they were placed?

In normal times there is always some discrimination practiced. After all, all of us who are in a position of responsibility have our likes and dislikes. We may not like certain people because they do not wear the proper clothes, or because they do not speak the way we want them to speak. However, our personal likes or dislikes should not be the basis upon which we should select those who should be called upon to work for the Government, its agencies, or other agencies of the national defense.

There should be only one rule to determine the fitness of an applicant, and that is whether or not he can do the job which is assigned to him. It should not make any difference whether the person in question is white or black, Jew or gentile, Catholic or Protestant, or whatever racial origin he may be charged to. If he is an American citizen, there should be no discrimination, and very person who owes his devotion and loyalty to the United States should be given the opportunity to work for this country and promote its welfare. Everyone who is disloyal should be weeded out, even if his ancestors go back to the days of the American Revolution.

This principle was so thoroughly understood during the last war in which this country participated, that most of our fighting units in the Army were composed of boys of the most diversified racial origins. Even today we do not discriminate as a rule, whenever a person is drafted into the service of the United States, although instances have been shown of people being placed in the undesirable regiments or companies because of their racial origin or color. But, again, a true American will never be guilty of an offense of this type, and one who understands the aims and objectives of the Government of the United States will not deliberately lend himself to a procedure where he would be guilty of discriminating against our own citizens.

I have placed this discrimination on the basis of national defense, because there is an old adage "In unity there is strength and in disunity there is failure." I am sure that Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin would like to see our people divided. I am sure that Hitler chuckles with joy whenever he reads in his newspapers how Americans are guilty of discrimination against their own fellow citizens. Just as Hitler was able to destroy Europe by playing up to the various nations and respective prejudices against others within their borders, so do Hitler and his agents now take advantage of every opportunity where an American is discriminating against another American, or where one brother is arrayed against another brother. If we do not stand together, if we do not fight together as a unit for the defense of our American ideals now, then there will be no American ideals left which will be worth while defending later.

Laws and Regulations Relating to Veterans, Including Trainees Under Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the pamphlet on Veterans' Benefits, which gives information concerning monetary and other benefits available to persons who have served in the armed forces of the United States, and to the dependents of such persons, is being revised for publication, July 1, 1941.

It will be a revision of House Document No. 666, of the Seventy-sixth Congress, third session, published July 1, 1940, and will bring all statements, laws, and regulations contained therein up to date.

Information will also be included concerning those who are serving by reason of the Selective Training and Service Act. Two hundred and forty-eight thousand five hundred and forty-two of the new trainees have applied for and have been furnished life-insurance policies through the Veterans' Administration. Seventy-nine death claims have been filed to date.

Under the Selective Training and Service Act, each man inducted is entitled to the same pay allowances, pensions, disability, and death compensation provided for other enlisted men and officers of like grade and length of service.

In making this revision, I have received the assistance and cooperation of Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans Affairs, and the Veterans' Administration.

The pamphlet will provide helpful information to persons who have served in the armed forces of the United States in time of war or peace and to the dependents of such persons regarding the rights to monetary and other benefits, which may be obtained by applying to the Veterans' Administration or elsewhere as indicated.

The purpose sought to be attained is to state in a general way the different benefits and the most essential requirements which must be met by a claimant with respect to each. No effort has been made to provide detailed technical information on constructions and interpretations of the veterans' acts, such as would be essential in the adjudication of claims. The pamphlet also includes information concerning veterans' preference to civil-service employment; burial in national cemeteries; headstones; benefits given by States; Veterans' Placement Service; Civilian Conservation Corps; preference under homestead laws; and laws for purchase, repair, and refinancing property.

As heretofore, the Joint Committee on Printing will be requested to present a resolution, providing that several thousand copies of this pamphlet be printed and made available to the Members of Congress for distribution. They will also be sold through the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office. The price of the last edition, which was released July 1, 1940, is 10 cents a copy.

SEWALL AS TIMBER FOR HIGHEST JOB—VOICE SAID TO MATCH PRESIDENT'S OVER RADIO

(By Timothy A. McInerny)

This is an era in politics in which the voice and the language of a man are as important as any other one quality in winning public attention.

The radio has done this. It has made and broken budding political careers, for the most statesmanlike-appearing man cannot be seen over the air waves, and the man with a winning voice can best him in almost any contest.

SEARCH STILL ON

Mr. Roosevelt's golden radio voice and his precise Groton accent has been the despair of the Republicans. The search has been on ever since 1932 for a Republican voice to match his.

Willkie's was far short of the ideal. Taft and Landon and Vandenberg all had their pronouncements twisted by the intricacies of the reproducing systems. They sounded bumbly, adenoidal, and commonplace.

But the search is still on as the G. O. P. looks to 1944. This time they are certain that they will have to have someone to oppose Mr. Roosevelt for his fourth term, in what will probably be the latter part of a big war.

The Republican National Committee has found plenty of good voices, but the men carrying them are not Presidential timber. But a select little gathering of Republicans have already found their man, and some day they intend to spring him on the public to see what the reaction is.

As Joe Martin or any of the Republican leaders know, the party cannot rig up a candidate now to suit conditions 4 years from now. But the party can take cognizance of the material at hand and, if it is good, it can steer the candidate into the proper position for notice when the convention meets.

IT'S MAINE'S GOVERNOR

The man who has the voice, the rhythmic emphasis which is believed equal to Roosevelt's power over the air, is Gov. Sumner Sewall of Maine.

The other day in Augusta, in the classic atmosphere of the Blaine Mansion, Mrs. Roosevelt sat across the table from Governor Sewall and his charming wife, little realizing perhaps that Republican bigwigs down in Washington have been looking him over as a Presidential dark horse for 1944.

Governor Sewall, strange as it may seem, has never considered himself an orator and has never made any attempt to be one. He has spent most of his life to date as a businessman, with commercial air lines as his chief interest, and most of his talking has been over the table at directors' meetings.

But he has a priceless political heritage, for his uncle was a candidate for Vice President of the United States and members of his family have been in public affairs since the first Sewall began kicking around Boston Common in 1636.

The Governor slid easily from the business world into the political field when times were dull a few years ago, and after an experiment with the city council in his home city of Bath, went to the State senate and thence to the Governor's chair.

AMAZED BY ADDRESS

Since his election he has made very few addresses and has generally kept away from the microphone. At his inauguration he pulled out a few stops and in an eloquent address practically stampeded the audience, who were expecting something rather matter-of-fact. It was a good place and a good setting for a dull address and the new-fledged Governor crossed up the dope and delivered an exhilarating sermon which lifted the listeners out of their chairs.

His voice has a fine timbre and there is a noticeable rhythm in his sentences. Clear, concise, and unperturbed, he has demonstrated again and again in the Maine Senate that he is a master of words, and on his feet he gives the impression that here is a man who is interested and interesting and utterly sincere.

The Grand Old Party can use that sort of stuff.

The only fly in the ointment as far as the political soothsayers are concerned is that the gentleman comes from Maine. To hear some of them talk, one would believe that Maine isn't a part of the United States.

Sewall, they say, has background—for his is one of the first families of New England and Maine. He has money, a long lineage of shipbuilding forefathers, and some pretty fair politicians, too. He has a fine family—a devoted and intelligent wife and three handsome children

NOT TALKING OF FUTURE

He has a war record which is hard to beat. He is Maine's only flying ace of the World War. He is a former member of the famed Lafayette Escadrille.

But the politicos on the Republican side say that Maine is Maine, and not the Middle West, and a Presidential candidate has to come from the central region of the United States. A Maine or Vermont man, such as Coolidge, is fine for the Vice Presidency, but the top man on the ticket must come from the Middle West.

This appears to be an axiom among the party bosses. If Sewall goes to the United States Senate 2 years from now, he will be nearer the center of political doings. But up to now he has evinced no further ambitions than to be as good a Governor as he can and let the future take care of itself.

But if, in the future, you suddenly see him unveiled as an orator at some big Republican function, you will know that the boys on the inside are trying out the golden voice from Maine, which is a good one.

Increased Cost of Living

REPORT OF COST OF LIVING COMMITTEE, OIL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION, LOCAL NO. 210

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and report:

HAMMOND, IND., May 13, 1941.

Congressman WM. T. SCHULTE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed is a copy of a report made by our cost-of-living committee. This committee has made an extensive study of living costs especially as they apply to the oil workers' membership in the Calumet region. We believe that if you will give a few moments' study to this report you will discover some facts which may not have occurred to you in ordinary conception of the cost of living in our area, inasmuch as the Labor Bureau makes its reports based on the cost of living in Chicago and South Bend. If it is possible for you to do so, we would appreciate having you insert this report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours truly,

OIL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION,
M. B. ROBERTS, Secretary, Local No. 210.

COST-OF-LIVING BULLETIN 2

Living costs in the Calumet region, Hammond, Gary, East Chicago, have increased to the point where even with the recent wage raises the worker has a burden to bear that grows ever heavier.

From December 1937 to January 1941, the costs of the following have increased:

	Percent
Rent	10.0
Hospitalization	11.5
Fuel (coal and coke)	10.0
Food	3.7

This is an increase in the general cost of living of 8.9 percent.

This picture of the cost of living for the workers of this area which is the result of a study made by the cost-of-living committee of the Oil Workers International Union, Local 210, does not include furniture, automobiles, radios, refrigerators, clothing, drugs, or taxes (a large and continually growing item).

The other items and taxes will be the subject of later bulletins. It is enough to mention here that in the clothing field, for example, there has been little price change, but considerable quality change; that is, a sweater or a suit or a pair of shoes made by a company and sold for a particular price still sells for the same price in general but will not give the service, does not have the same quality of materials. As for taxes, excise and special levies, increased income taxes, and property taxes have been taking a regularly increasing slice from the workers' pay check.

Vastly more important than the surface of the picture given above is the meaning of it. The year selected as a basis for comparison is 1937, a year that stands out as the most abnormally high year of the entire decade from 1930 to 1940. The cost of living committee selected that year as a basis of comparison because it was the year that the last general wage increases had been gained in this area.

But 1937 was an extraordinary year. In most regions of the country, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics findings, the general cost of living had not yet reached the highs that it reached during 1937.

The extremely high price levels of 1937 were due to several factors: Government expenditures (P. W. A., W. P. A., A. A. A., etc., emergency relief, and the like) reached their peak; industrial, wholesale, and retail inventories, which had been almost nil, were greatly expanded both because of normal needs and because of the very fear of a boom and of boom prices; construction had considerably increased, partially because of the Federal housing program and partly because of the extensive repairs after depression neglect; foreign trade had picked up; and the approaching war in Europe stimulated speculation.

Immediately after December 1937, there was a drop in cost of living, which continued till it hit a level about 6 percent lower than 1937's high. With slight fluctuations, it remained there through the first quarter of 1940. Since March 1940, the cost of living has constantly risen. There seems to be no stop to the increase.

As the defense program accelerates, as the demand for food, uniforms materials, for aluminum, steel, rubber, building materials, paints, etc., grows ever greater, there is little chance that the skyward drive of living costs will be checked.

Thus when it is realized that in the Calumet area here, the cost of living has actually exceeded 1937 by a substantial amount, it becomes possible to understand better why wage earners have been finding it harder and harder to make their income balance their necessary expenditures.

Already since the wage increases of 10 cents an hour in steel, in Westinghouse, in General Electric, 8 cents per hour in the Aluminum Co. of America plants, 8 cents in the farm-equipment industry, 6 to 10 cents in Du Pont's plants, and the 5 cents in the oil industry, wholesale and retail prices have immediately jumped upward higher than before. The Cost of Living Committee has already had reports of rent increases from $4 to $15 per month.

For those who are interested in the method by which the Cost of Living Committee has obtained its information on the price situation in the Calumet area, we will summarize our work.

Questionnaires on comparative rents for December 1937 and February 1941 were distributed to members of Local 210 and were mailed out to real estate agencies in Hammond, Gary, and East Chicago; similar questionnaires on coal and coke were sent to fuel dealers; questionnaires on oil products, on hospital rates, were sent out. A questionnaire was prepared on the costs of food and meats as of December 1937 and February 1941; the questionnaires listed 31 commodities which comprise the bulk of the average wage earner's essential purchases. Our figures were computed from the returns on our questionnaires; and the number of returns has been so great that we feel our work on that phase is substantially complete. From time to time a belated questionnaire still comes to the office, but such late material of which there is just a very small quantity has not so far changed our findings in any respect, and we find each additional questionnaire returned late, merely a further confirmation of the results already attained.

We realize that rent, hospitalization, fuel, and food do not have equal weight in computing an average of the general living cost, that, for example, rent makes up in nearly every instance more than a quarter of a wage earner's expenses and that food makes up more than a third; hospitalization over-all is a relatively insignificant part of the general cost of living; fuel may run from practically no part of the cost of living to nearly 5 percent of it Clothing, furniture, radios, refrigerators, automobiles, and taxes also bulk large in the worker's budget. But the picture given above is a fairly accurate representation of what has happened to the worker's cost of living in this region.

It might be added here that the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor has compiled exhaustive statistics on cost of living and regularly publishes a bulletin on them. But the Bureau of Labor Statistics must necessarily generalize on the Nation as a whole; it does not—cannot—cover every region. It has selected a series of cities which are supposed to be representative of the whole. The Calumet area is represented in the Bureau's reports by South Bend and Chicago, two cities in which conditions are definitely different from those in Hammond, Gary, and East Chicago. The concentration of population, shortage of housing, highly industrialized nature of the region make any picture that is taken from Chicago or from South Bend decidedly inaccurate.

The cost of living committee's findings on rent, however, are not far from those of the Bureau of Labor Statistics; and the sharp upward trend in all prices which the committee has noted is clearly indicated in the Bureau of Labor Statistics' figures.

Federal Claim to Submerged Lands in California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARD JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

RESOLUTION OF CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include Senate Joint Resolution No. 24, adopted by the California Legislature. The resolution follows:

Senate Joint Resolution No. 24

Relative to memorializing the President, the Congress, and the Solicitor General with respect to the assertion of any pretended Federal claim to the submerged lands of the State of California

Whereas, on the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, the original States, as successors to the English Crown, became the owners of the tide and submerged lands within their respective borders, and such ownership was retained by them on the adoption of the Constitution, and never has been relinquished to the Federal Government since; and

Whereas the State of California was admitted to the Union on a basis of equality with the original States, possessing and enjoying all the attributes of sovereignty residing in the original States, including the ownership of the tide and submerged lands within its borders; and

Whereas such ownership has long been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States of America and by other Federal departments and agencies, and has not been questioned until recently, with the result that the State of California and its grantees, both public and private, relying thereon, have expended vast sums of money in the development of such lands, including harbor facilities, reclamation and filling in, and the erection of costly structures; and

Whereas this legislature is informed that plans are being made to initiate litigation against the State of California, or its grantees, to assert a pretended Federal claim to such lands, whether with or without the authorization of the Congress; and

Whereas any such litigation could only result in a decision in favor of this State or its grantees, would be unjust in view of the concomitant vexation and annoyance, and would seriously impair the further development of such lands and the financing thereof until the final decision: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the State of California hereby solemnly and firmly asserts the title of the State and its grantees in such lands within this State; and be it further

Resolved, That the President, the Congress, and the Solicitor General of the United States be, and they hereby are, respectfully urged not to initiate or authorize the initiation of any litigation that would becloud such title of the State and its grantees, however temporarily; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Solicitor General, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in the Congress.

Poll Reveals Ship Convoys and War Opposed by More Than 90 Percent of People in Kokomo, Ind., Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM KOKOMO (IND.) TRIBUNE

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Kokomo (Ind.) Tribune of May 31, 1941:

[From Kokomo (Ind.) Tribune of May 31, 1941]

POLL REVEALS SHIP CONVOYS AND WAR OPPOSED BY MORE THAN 90 PERCENT OF PEOPLE IN KOKOMO, IND., AREA

If the majority view expressed through a straw vote taken here represents the majority view of the community as a whole, public sentiment in and around Kokomo is overwhelmingly opposed both to use of United States war vessels to convoy ships carrying supplies to Great Britain and to the United States entering the war and sending our troops to foreign shores.

Only a few hundred votes were cast on the two propositions, it is true, but the preponderance of sentiment expressed against both of them doubtless will be regarded as significant by citizens generally.

On the first proposition, "Do you favor convoying by the United States of ships carrying supplies to Great Britain?" the committee that conducted the count found that 89.80 percent of the ballots were against the suggestion and only 10.20 percent in favor of it.

On the second question, "Do you favor the United States entering the war and sending our troops abroad?" adverse opinion was even more emphatic. The committee found that 95.65 percent of the ballots were against the proposal and only 4.35 percent in approval of it.

Comparison of the straw vote taken here with that taken in Indianapolis reveals that the division of sentiment here is substantially the same as was shown there. In Indianapolis 92 percent of the ballots were against convoying and only 8 percent in favor of it. On the question of entering the war, 95 percent of the ballots opposed the suggestion and only 5 percent approved it.

In Indianapolis a blank form of ballot was carried only 1 day in the News of that city. In Kowomo the blank form of ballot was carried only 1 day in the Tribune.

The count of the ballots cast here was conducted by Forrest E. Jump, judge of the Howard circuit court; James L. Duke, a past commander of the Kokomo American Legion post; and Ernest E. Ellis, Spanish-American War veteran.

Thomas Lamont Opposed to Our Entrance Into War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

LETTER FROM THOMAS W. LAMONT

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am reprinting herewith a letter received from Mr. Thomas Lamont, of the House of Morgan. You will find this letter entirely self-explanatory. It is written to correct an impression left in connection with some remarks I made in the House on May 12 when I inserted an editorial from the Wall Street Journal in which that periodical strongly argued against America's active involvement in the fighting at this time.

We have all heard the House of Morgan and Thomas Lamont quoted on the floor of the House, and in speeches elsewhere, as being favorable to policies which would definitely involve the United States in the shooting and sacrifice of another overseas war. I am sure none of us has any desire to attribute to Mr. Lamont any warlike attitudes which are not his. I am happy, therefore, to insert Mr. Lamont's letter, in full, so that the Congress and the country may be advised as to the true position of Mr. Lamont as written on May 28, over his own signature. I am sorry that space limitations are such that I cannot include the speeches which Mr. Lamont enclosed with his letter but I feel certain that anybody interested could secure copies of them by writing to him at the address indicated at the top of his letter to me.

The letter follows:

NEW YORK, May 28, 1941.

The Honorable KARL E. MUNDT,

The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Your speech of May 12 on the floor of the House, based upon an article in the Wall Street Journal, has been called to my attention, especially this phrase: "* * * It offers encouraging evidence that the persistent clamor for war coming from Thomas Lamont, the House of Morgan, and a few other international banking houses on the Street is not the universal pattern of thinking on Wall Street."

I do not for a moment question the sincerity of your opinion, but certainly your accusation against me is not based upon any attitude of mine, either public or private. On the contrary, everything that I have said goes to show that I am just as averse to war as anyone is. No man in his right mind can desire war for his country. And as for this thought that industrialists and bankers profit by war, my experience proves that they are the ones that have most to lose.

Now, just to show you what my record is—and I hope you will have time to glance at these excerpts that I quote—I am going to attach excerpts from a few talks that I have made in the last 18 months on this very topic, as follows:

From American Business in War and Peace, a speech before the Academy of Political Science, November 15, 1939.

From The Far Eastern Threat, a speech before the Academy of Political Science, November 13, 1940.

From The Defense of the Republic, a speech before the Merchants' Association of New York, January 28, 1941.

From China and the Dictators, a speech before the Economic Club of Detroit, April 28, 1941.

I do not ask for correction of your statement, my object being simply to call to your personal attention the fact that as to my views you are completely mistaken. I am giving you the evidence of what they actually are.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS W. LAMONT.

Flags of the Confederacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY MRS. JONES HOYLE, OF DICKERSON, MD.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, the Daughters of the Confederacy at Beallsville, Md., sponsored a beautiful ceremony at Monocacy Cemetery Sunday, June 1, 1941. Hon. Arthur C. Elgin presided over the meeting, and Mrs. G. Robert Gray read a most interesting paper entitled "Flags of the Confederacy," written by Mrs. Jones Hoyle, of Dickerson, Md. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this interesting document entitled "Flags of the Confederacy":

With the outbreak of the War between the States, the question of a national flag for the North and one for the South arose, and a prominent citizen, S. F. B. Morse, proposed that the "national flag, the Stars and Stripes, be cut in twain, the North retaining the upper six and one-half stripes and those stars above a diagonal line extending from the head of the staff to the lower corner of the canton; while the South should be given the lower six and one-half stripes and the stars below the diagonal line on the canton, the remainder of each flag being white"; but neither the North nor the South saw fit to follow this suggestion. So, when the Union dissolved there was a universal and patriotic display of Old Glory in the Northern States, while each of the seceding States of the South made haste to display the emblems of their State sovereignty on banners; and when the Legislature of South Carolina adjourned on November 13, 1860, a few days after Abraham Lincoln was elected President of the United States, the flag of the Union was taken down from the State House and the Palmetto flag of the State raised in its place.

When the Ordinance of Secession was passed at the convention on December 19, 1860, South Carolina became a free and independent nation, and the Governor was authorized to organize a cabinet, to receive representatives from abroad, and to appoint similar representatives to foreign countries. At this time, according to the Boston Journal, a banner of red silk was adopted by the convention; it bore a blue cross on which 15 stars were set representing the 15 Southern States, the central star was larger than the others and represented South Carolina. On the red field was a palmetto tree and crescent; this was changed to a more elaborate design in 1861, the first flag waved over the Confederacy.

As seceding States followed each other secession flags were adopted in place of the original State emblems and this great variety of flags caused much confusion, so it became necessary to adopt a flag that could be used by the entire South. In February 1861 a convention of the six seceding States—South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, and Florida—was held at Montgomery, Ala., and while a committee had the subject of a permanent government under consideration the convention discussed the matter of a national flag for the Confederate States of America. Meanwhile the Bonnie Blue Flag made its appearance without official sanction, and instantly its popularity became assured by virtue of a spirited song with a defiant swing:

"We are a band of brothers, and native to the soil,
Fighting for the property we gained by honest toil;
And when our rights were threatened the cry rose near and far,
Hurrah for the Bonnie Blue Flag that bears a single star."

At the Montgomery convention the committee decided that—

"The flag should be simple, readily made, and, above all, capable of being made up in bunting; it should be different from the flag of any other country, place, or people; it should be significant; it should be readily distinguishable at a distance, the colors should be well contrasted and durable; and lastly, and not least important, it should be effective and handsome."

Many designs of flags were submitted and the most beautiful chosen—The Stars and Bars, presented by Col. Orren Randolph Smith, of North Carolina. * "The three bars were emblems of the Trinity, the white for love and stainless character, while the blue was for the great heaven, spangled with stars to watch over us, and the red for the vesper light that should never die out." The recommendation from the committee was that "the flag of the Confederate States of America shall consist of a red field with a white space extending horizontally through the center, and equal in width to one-third the width of the flag; the red space above and below to be the same width as the white. The union of blue extending down through the white space and stopping at the lower red space; in the center of the union a circle of white stars, corresponding in number with the States of the Confederacy." The recommendation was adopted, thus making the birth of the Stars and Bars the symbol of the Southern Confederacy at the same time Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States at Washington.

This flag with seven stars in the union was first displayed in public on March 4, 1861, and was used until May 1863; but this flag did not meet with general approval, because of its resemblance to the Stars and Stripes, which led to confusion and mistakes on the battlefield. At the Battle of Manassas, July 21, 1861, the opposing regimental colors were so alike that each side accused the other of displaying its colors. For this reason, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston attempted to substitute State colors for those of the Confederacy, but being unable to obtain them, except for the Virginia regiments, designs for a flag were called for once more.

Most of the new designs came from Louisiana and were presented by General Beauregard. The one selected had a red ground with a blue diagonal cross emblazoned with white stars, one for each State of the Confederacy, and was oblong in shape. General Johnston changed the oblong flag to a square flag, the infantry flag being 4, the artillery colors 3, and the cavalry standards 2½ feet. This famous battle flag, or Southern Cross, is the one best known and beloved by all southerners.

"Furl that banner: True 'tis gory,
Yet 'tis wreathed around with glory,
And 'twill live in song and story
Though its folds are in the dust.
For its fame on brightest pages
Penned by poets and by sages
Shall go sounding down the ages—
Furl its folds though now we must.
* * * * *
Furl that banner, softly, slowly;
Treat it gently—it is holy."

No other flag was used in the field by the Confederates after the battle flag was adopted and furnished to the troops in Virginia in October 1861. In a letter from General Beauregard, written from New Orleans January 24, 1872, he said:

"And we finally adopted, in September 1861, the well-known battle flag of the Army of the Potomac to which our soldiers became so devoted."

After describing the flag he continued:

"It had the merit of being small and light, and of being very distinct at great distances, but it was not accepted by the Confederate Government until it had been consecrated by many a hard-fought battle."

The battle flag, however, was not adapted to sea service as it could not be reversed as a signal of distress, so the Stars and Bars continued to be flown from fortresses and hoisted on vessels. Still another change of flag continued to be the subject of attention, and in May 1863 the Confederate Congress, at Richmond, established by law as a national ensign of the Confederacy, a plain white flag having for its union the southern cross or battle flag of the army. The law read:

"The flag of the Confederate States shall be as follows: The flag to be white, the length double the width of the flag, with the union (now used as the battle flag) to be a square of two-thirds the width of the flag, having the ground red; therein a broad saltire of blue bordered with white and emblazoned with white mullets, or five-pointed stars corresponding in number to the Confederate States." This flag is often called the Jackson flag. President Davis sent the first one to be unfurled over the Capitol in Richmond, but it was not destined for that purpose; the accidental and tragic death of Stonewall Jackson brought the flag and General Jackson's body to Richmond almost at the same time and it was used to enshroud the remains of the Confederate hero.

This flag did not prove satisfactory either, for while it was not used in many land fights, it was used at sea and was so much like the English white ensign, also like the flag of truce, so a broad transverse stripe of red was added to the fly of the flag.

This national ensign of the Confederacy was adopted by the Southern senate February 4, 1865, but was never used in the army as the adoption of the flag came so shortly before the surrender at Appomattox.

To all southerners, the flags of the Confederacy hold a dear and sacred memory, for they typify to each of us the courage and pathos of a lost cause, and it is interesting to note the influence of the Confederate flags, especially the Southern Cross, on some of the State flags in use today.

Benefits of the National Youth Administration Program

LETTER FROM COUNTY JUDGE VIRGIL C. KOLB, OF JOHNSON COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, dated May 22, 1941, addressed by County Judge Virgil C. Kolb, of Johnson County, Ark., to Mr. William H. Moore, area director, N. Y. A., Russellville, Ark., on the benefits of the N. Y. A. auto-mechanic shop program at Clarksville, Ark.:

JOHNSON COUNTY,
Clarksville, Ark., May 22, 1941.

Mr. WILLIAM H. MOORE,
Area Director, National Youth Administration, Russellville, Ark.

DEAR SIR: On May 12, 1941, I received at the N. Y. A. Auto Mechanic Shop, Clarksville, Ark., one rebuilt Caterpillar, No. 60, road machine.

I have been delayed in securing the development of a picture which I had taken on the yards before removing the machine, that I wanted to send you.

There are some facts concerning the work and rebuilding of this machine that I want to relate to you. The equipment had been out of service approximately 6 months; unused, account of worn-out condition. Had it not been for an institution like the National Youth Administration, of which I am very proud, the county would have received as salvage price, high bid, $400 for the machine. A new machine would have cost the county $5,500; thereby making it possible, with the credit allowance of $400, to replace the machine with a new one at the cost of $5,100.

With the skilled-mechanic supervision and the development of youth mechanics at the N. Y. A. Auto Mechanic Shop, Clarksville, Ark., I found that this equipment could be rebuilt, and was assured that it would render lots of good service.

In this connection I wish to state that time and again I was in the shop after the machine had been completely torn down and was in the process of repairs. I took pleasure in watching the progress the N. Y. A. youth workers were making and the manifest interest shown in their work on this equipment. It is more for the credit to be given these young men who participated in the rebuilding of this machine that I want to convey to you my sincere appreciation of the opportunities that have been made possible by the N. Y. A. for such a group of boys and their adaptability and progress as auto mechanics. Also much credit should be given Kenneth F. Early for his knowledge and capable supervision.

This machine is now in use on the county road work and has been for a period of 10 days, and I do not hesitate to tell you that it is doing perfect work; that the operator of the machine on the county road work has told me on more than one occasion it is as good as new. This man is also an experienced tractor and machine man, with years of experience and reliable as well as dependable.

For your information, also, the cost of parts purchased for repairs was approximately $650 and the cheapest reconditioned machine I could have purchased, less the salvage value of this old equipment, would have been $3,500. With these figures before you, you can see now that I have a machine worth more than $3,500 and have spent, as above stated, approximately $650.

Again, I want to thank you and your organization in behalf of the citizens of Johnson County for the cooperation and consideration shown in doing such a wonderful job for the benefit of Johnson County.

Yours truly,

VIRGIL C. KOLB,
County Judge.

What the Automobile Means to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

STATEMENT BY NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE DEALERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing the part the automobile industry plays in furnishing work for our people, compiled by the National Automobile Dealers Association, as well as in national defense and our normal needs.

The statement follows:

ONE OUT OF SEVEN WORKERS SUPPORTED BY THE AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

One out of seven workers in the United States today are employed in motor transport, according to statistics in the fifth study of a series developed by the National Automobile Dealers Association to acquaint the public with the place of the motorcar in modern transportation and the necessity of maintaining continued production to supply the needs of the United States in its defense program and national economy.

In round numbers this employment force aggregates 6,500,000 people, spread throughout the manufacturing of motor vehicles, parts and tires, petroleum refining, sales and servicing, Federal and State road departments, truck and bus drivers, and raw-material suppliers.

If they all supported an average family of 4 persons, a total of 26,000,000 individuals would be provided with a living directly from the motor industry. That gives some idea of how important the operation of motor vehicles is in our economic system.

Employed directly in the manufacture of motor vehicles, bodies, and parts, in 1939, were 394,000 workers, whose pay rolls amounted to $639,756,000. Employment rose to 447,000 in 1940, with proportionately greater increase in pay rolls due to wage advances.

Employment in the sales and service end of the business in 1939 amounted to 1,306,752 persons, according to the latest Bureau of Census figures. Of this number, 440,536 had jobs in automotive retail establishments where cars, trucks, or parts are sold. Service establishments accounted for another 176,393 jobs; filling stations, 467,000; and other automotive wholesale and retail functions, 222,821 individuals.

But all this comes far from telling the whole story. Many employees not included in the 6,500,000 total referred to are dependent upon automobiles and automobile traffic for their livelihood. For example, there are thousands of workers in parking lots, in auto camps, resorts, hotels, restaurants, refreshment stands, and automobile clubs. There are advertising men, tax collectors, insurance men, and others whose jobs have come into existence through the automobile.

Then there is the huge building industry. Economists credit the automobile revolution with creating the building boom of the twenties. That was when people found they could live miles from their work and away from mass transportation lines by having automobiles. Homes went up by thousands in the suburbs. Cities began stretching out. The recent census shows that the movement has by no means run its course. Some think it is still in its early stages.

Thus the influence of the automobile is felt in almost every walk of life. It explains the widespread interest in the operations of the industry and the concern over curtailment. Thousands of jobs are at stake throughout the land. Every State supplies materials and every State has its quota of the industry's far-flung retail organization. National-defense priorities may limit the supply of materials and manpower for automobile production, but arbitrary restriction of output would cause unnecessary reduction in employment in industries not vital to defense.

United We Win—Divided We Lose

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE BERGEN EVENING RECORD, HACKENSACK, N. J.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J., May 28, 1941:

[From the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N. J., of May 28, 1941]

UNITED WE WIN—DIVIDED WE LOSE

President Roosevelt's formal proclamation of an unlimited national emergency is a prelude to passage of our long-prepared M-day bill, which is designed to regiment all of the Nation's resources—men, money, and machines—to wipe the menace of foreign totalitarianism from the face of the earth. That means war, whether declared or undeclared. Henceforth, therefore, there can be no more differences of opinion between loyal Americans over the merits or the demerits of this country's foreign policy. The die is cast—we have crossed a rosy Rubicon—we must now unite, fight, and die if necessary to prevent that adventure from becoming this democracy's funereal Styx.

We cannot permit any divided national sympathies here until the fight has been won. All Americans, whether of recent or remote European origin, now have only one national duty to perform; and that is, in the language of our immortal Declaration of Independence, to pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to the complete success of the cause to which their duly elected National Government has committed them. The current development was anticipated in these columns by a first-page anticipated in these columns by a first-page March 17. They were in full as follows:

"A UNITED AMERICA

"Foreign news reports from nations at war are censored at their source. Belligerents may suppress important facts; they may distort them; or they may release wholly untrue propaganda. All foreign news should therefore be analyzed critically by American newspaper readers, lest they and their country be enticed into ruinous foreign involvements.

"Since the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany 18 months ago, this newspaper has published daily in this space the above warning to its readers. It was motivated solely by a desire to prevent this Nation from becoming propagandized into another ruinous foreign military involvement. It has fought the good fight, and it has lost. The congressional representatives of the people have now spoken, and for better or for worse the Nation is committed to its course. Now the adherence of American citizens to that course must be unanimous because this is our country—may she in her relations with other nations always be right; but, right or wrong, our country."

WE'RE IN IT; WE MUST WIN IT

In recent weeks the question has been not whether but when the United States would be at war. This one uncertainty at least has been settled. President Roosevelt in effect announced the fact Saturday. He was empowered to do so by Congress which in the so-called lease-lend bill delegated its constitutional powers by authorizing him to conduct undeclared war.

That legislation was opposed determinedly but ineffectually. It was identified accurately and dispassionately by this newspaper and a few—pitifully few—others, by many sober-minded individuals, and by some Senators and Representatives. Nevertheless it was passed. So be it.

We cannot yet know how grevious our common task may be. The President hinted; we remember and anticipate. He stressed the sacrifices which we all must make. What will they be? He pledged our total effort, which means anything and everything. Britain, Greece, and China are promised what they need of what we have or can produce. If they cannot come and get it, we must take it to them. Convoys seem imminent, and an expeditionary force is a possibility less remote than may have been imagined. But first and above all we must produce. If we do not subordinate ourselves to this effort, regimentation of labor and management alike is indicated. We are committed to fight for four freedoms: of speech and expression, of religion and worship, from want, and from fear. We may be compelled to suspend or abrogate all four in the process, but if it must be done it will be done.

The prospect is forbidding, but we cannot well retrace our steps. Lightly and more prophetically than we knew, we sang in the last war: "We don't know where we're going, but we're on our way." Well, here we go again. But in self-defense we must go together. We should do it soberly, candidly, with no illusions or delusions. We must overcome Germany, Italy, and Japan in this war and Great Britain after it. We may lose the war. We may win the war but lose the peace. Or we may be able to gain for ourselves, our posterity, and humanity at large more than we know we must sacrifice. But that is secondary. The prime consideration is the fact that we are in the war. Being in it, we had better win it.

Rural Electrification—H. R. 4931

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a bill which I have introduced (H. R. 4931) to amend the Rural Electrification Act of 1936 so as to increase the amount of annual allotments from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000, reduce the interest rate to that paid by the Government itself, and to extend the time for amortization of these loans to 50 years.

If this measure is passed, it will enable us to electrify practically every farm home in America at rates the people can afford to pay, and at the same time the Government will be repaid every dollar advanced, with interest.

I need not tell the House that our rural electrification program has been the greatest blessing this Government has ever provided for the farmers of America. Under the present law, we are limited to an expenditure of $40,000,000 a year. I managed to get around that provision and secure an extra $100,000,000 through an amendment to the so-called relief bill in 1938, and we managed to secure $60,000,000 additional last year and $60,000,000 additional this year.

But in order to do a real job we are going to have to increase the amount, reduce the interest, and extend the time of payment.

The Government will not lose anything, for the reason that all the money expended, as I said, will be paid back with interest, and these lines, and other facilities, will stand as security. They will increase in value as time goes on and become such a fixed part of the community, as well as of the home and the business establishment, that by the time they are paid off they will be worth many times the investments.

In the meantime they will have added untold billions to our national wealth, contributed to the up-building of rural life and the comforts and conveniences of the average home, and to the prosperity of rural business establishments, to say nothing of their value in relieving the drudgery which the farm people of America, and especially the farm women, have been compelled to endure since time began.

This program is building a new civilization for rural America—for the farmers of the Nation—and I know of nothing that we could do that would contribute more to that end than the passage of this measure at this time.

It has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I call upon the members of that committee to give it immediate consideration, and to report it to the House as soon as possible. I also call upon every Member who represents any appreciable number of farmers in this House to get behind this measure and help us to put over a program that will enable us to electrify every farm home in America at rates the people can afford to pay.

The matter referred to follows:

[77th Cong., 1st sess. H. R. 4931. In the House of Representatives, June 2, 1941. Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. A bill to amend the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, by providing for loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in aggregate amount not to exceed $100,000,000 in each fiscal year commencing with the fiscal year 1942; by prescribing the rate of interest and maturity of loans made under said act; and by authorizing the extension of the maturities of and the reduction of interest rates on loans heretofore made]

Be it enacted, etc., That the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, is amended as follows:

(1) Subsection (a) of section 3 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed to make loans to the Administrator, upon his request approved by the President, not exceeding in aggregate amount $100,000,000 for each fiscal year commencing with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, with interest at the same rate as shall be chargeable on loans to borrowers made in the same year pursuant to section 4, upon the security of the obligations of borrowers from the Administrator appointed pursuant to the provisions of this act or from the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration established by Executive Order No. 7037: Provided, however, That the maturity of such obligations incurred pursuant to section 5 for the purpose of financing the wiring of premises and the acquisition and installation of electrical and plumbing appliances and equipment shall not exceed two-thirds of the assured life thereof. The Administrator is hereby authorized to make all such endorsements, to execute all such instruments, and to do all such acts and things as shall be necessary to effect the valid transfer and assignment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of all such obligations or otherwise to secure loans made to the Administrator by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

(2) Subsection (e) of section 3 is amended by striking out the words "And provided further, That no loans shall be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Administrator after June 30, 1937.", and by changing the colon following the word "Territories" to a period.

(3) Section 4 is amended by inserting after the words "central station service" and before the colon preceding the first proviso, the following words "and the acquisition and operation of generating plants, electric transmission and distribution lines or systems in rural areas" and by striking out the words "Provided, however, That all such loans shall be self-liquidating within a period of not to exceed 25 years, and shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest payable by the United States of America on its obligations, having a maturity of 10 or more years after the dates thereof, issued during the last preceding fiscal year in which any such obligations were issued." and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Provided, however, That all such loans shall be self-liquidating within a period of not to exceed 50 years, and shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest payable by the United States of America on its obligations issued during the preceding fiscal year:".

(4) Section 5 is amended by striking out the last sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Such loans shall be for such terms, subject to such conditions and so secured as reasonably to assure repayment thereof, and shall bear interest at the rate prescribed for loans under section 4."

(5) Section 12 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. The Administrator is authorized and empowered to extend the time of payment of interest on or principal of the obligations of borrowers from the Administrator, including obligations securing loans made to the Administrator by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Provided, however, That with respect to obligations evidencing loans made under section 4, the time of payment of principal shall not be extended more than 5 years beyond the maximum period provided in section 4 for the self-liquidation of loans, and the time of payment of interest shall not be extended more than 5 years after such payment shall have become due: And provided further, That with respect to obligations evidencing loans made under section 5, the time of payment of principal or interest shall not be extended more than 5 years after such payment shall have become due."

SEC. 2. Commencing with the effective date of this act, loans made prior thereto by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Administrator shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest payable by the United States of America on its obligations issued during the fiscal year preceding the effective date of this act, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed, upon the request of the Administrator, to extend the time of payment of each such loan for a period not to exceed 50 years from the respective dates upon which such loans were made.

SEC. 3. The Administrator is authorized and empowered to reduce the rate of interest on the obligations of borrowers from the Administrator which are outstanding on the effective date of this act, including obligations securing loans made to the Administrator by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Provided, however, That the rate as reduced shall not be less than the average rate of interest payable by the United States of America on its obligations issued during the fiscal year preceding the effective date of this act.

SEC. 4. The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions hereof.

Balancing the Risk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. PHILIP A. BENNETT, OF MISSOURI

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, last evening, over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co., my colleague, Mr. PHILIP A. BENNETT, the Member from the Sixth District of Missouri, made a stirring and logical appeal for the people's support to keep this Nation out of war:

Fellow Americans, we are living in a tragic period. The lurid clouds of war and the smoke of battle hover over a great part of the civilized world. Airplanes, winging their way through the blue, drop death upon helpless men, women, and children, while submarines, stealing their way through the dark depths of ocean, loose deadly torpedoes to send other humans mangled to the bottom of the sea. Wanton destruction, horrible beyond human comprehension, razes city after city, village after village in Europe and the Orient while the finest works that have come from the hands of man over the centuries are destroyed. In view of these awful conditions, we find ourselves divided over the question whether we should disregard the advice of the Father of our Country, and of the great men who have followed him in the Presidential office, to avoid foreign entanglements, or yield to our natural sympathy for the oppressed and enter the war. Before we take such an important step let us balance the risks.

Two major groups are battling for the leadership of American foreign policy—the "interventionists" and the "noninterventionists." Already these labels have become fighting words with a whole string of epithets attached to them. Interventionists are the warmongers and British agents. Noninterventionists are appeasers, isolationists, and defeatists. In the middle of this verbal free-for-all are a few interventionists so un-American and un-Christian as to label those who honestly disagree with them as pro-German or Nazi fellow travelers. Recently we have witnessed an intense barrage of propaganda laid down by the accredited and responsible spokesman of the administration calling for convoys, for patrols for any and all measures necessary to aid Britain. The proponents of war have finally come out into the open and have said bluntly that we must be prepared to risk participation in a shooting war if necessary to save England. Cash and carry has now been changed to "give and deliver."

We are now talking about freedom of the seas. What does freedom of the seas mean? It means that we insist, as a nation, on sending our merchant ships, or our Navy, or both, anywhere in the waters of the seven seas we choose, regardless of what conditions of warfare may exist in any region of the world.

Now let us look at that for a minute. The city streets are free public highways. Every citizen has the right to walk down a city street if he chooses to do so. That is freedom of the streets and highways. But what is to be said of the citizen's intelligence if two groups, one on each side of the street, are shooting at each other, or dropping bombs on each other, or undermining and blowing up each other, and that citizen still insists upon his right to walk down the street between the two battling groups without as much as a pea shooter in his pocket, without any method of enforcing his rights to the freedom of the streets?

Now there isn't any use to try to gloss over, or to ignore, or to explain away our condition today. We have been told by everybody from the President down through every responsible military and naval officer, that we are not yet equipped to defend ourselves. So then, when we begin to insist upon freedom of the seas, we are assuming the position of a citizen who insists upon exercising his right of freedom of streets regardless of how many bullets are flying across them. To do that at this time, in the condition we are in, from a military and naval standpoint, is to prepare to sacrifice millions of American boys who would not have a chance. It is a fact well known here in Washington that we have not enough military equipment on hand today to equip properly an army of 500,000 men, much less 4,000,000. The proponents of war insist on talking about equipment on hand and on order. Before we think about on-order equipment being of any practical value in this situation, we have first to think of a lot of strikes which have been permitted to go on week after week and recur in every section of the country. We have got to think of a lot of bottlenecks, not the least of which is the lack of skilled workmen to build this defense we have on order.

The best estimate Congress can get from military authorities is that we do not yet have adequate defensive, let alone adequate offensive, war weapons. Let me warn you now, my fellow citizens, that wishful thinking, and oversanguine estimates, and airplanes and tanks and guns and uniforms "on order" do not win wars. Those things win wars only when they are on the field in action, not on blueprints. What are the blunt, naked, ugly facts about this situation, as we are being urged into war? We haven't a trained army of men to begin with. It will take considerable time adequately to train our army of draftees. Young men do not leave counting houses, or college or high school or farms or ribbon counters, and the next day go up in airplanes, and step out into space with a parachute and a tommy gun. It takes training—long training—to do that sort of thing.

We haven't an army of trained men fit to send into a shooting war. We have not the equipment—battle equipment—not even training equipment, for an adequate army. We haven't the ships to carry an army across the seas with its impedimentia. Remember the military authorities say that we would have to land an army of 4,000,000 men in Europe to have an expeditionary force of any value. It takes, according to military authority, 7 tons of military impedimentia per man. Four million men would require—think of this—28,000,000 tons of ammunition and supplies. That would be on the first trip. We would then have to keep a line of supplies and communications open across 3,000 miles of stormy sea to supply that army of 4,000,000 men. Now, will some of these people who are eager to get into war tell me where in the world we would find enough ships to send 28,000,000 tons of war material across the sea? If we can't get supplies to Britain now in sufficient quantities, will some of these people who are beating the war drums please tell us how we could get sufficient additional supplies over to take care of 4,000,000 of our own boys?

Now, let's sum up a bit:

If we had an army of trained men, which we haven't; and if we had the equipment for an army of trained men, which we haven't; and if we had a fleet of ships to transport those trained men whom we haven't with their equipment, which we haven't; and if we had a place to land them in Europe, which we haven't; and if we had the ships, plus a two-ocean Navy, plus the airplanes to guard those ships and to keep open lines of communication across 3,000 miles of sea, which we haven't; then, and only then, would we be even justified in talking about going into a shooting war with anybody in Europe. If we attack the dictators, we must defeat them on foreign fields.

Now, my fellow citizens, you fathers and mothers whose sons are going to be sent across the ocean to spill their blood, give up their lives, or come back to you broken in mind and mangled in body, for a perfectly futile mission, these are the bare facts, stripped of all the dishonest pretense and all of the wishful thinking and all of the gloss and varnish of propaganda that has been poured over these ugly but realistic facts.

This question of going into a shooting war is not a problem of what we might like to do, it is not a question of whether we like or dislike the methods of the dictators. It is a question of using enough common sense to be ready to do some fighting before we get into a war with anybody. Nobody is shooting at us. Our greatest dangers are not from without but from within.

We have a lot of unsolved domestic problems that we must think of while we are being literally deafened by the din of those who are beating the war drums. In advance, not afterward, but in advance, we must count the costs of war; we must look forward and see what will be our own economic condition at the end of such a war. We must figure out how in the depression that will follow this orgy of destruction and hate we are going to manage to keep the flame burning in the torch of liberty here in America. We won't do it by going to war before we are prepared for war, and being defeated. We won't keep the torch of liberty burning in America by decimating on the battlefields the youth of this land because we go into war before we are fully prepared even to defend ourselves against an enemy, let alone assail an enemy across 3,000 miles of ocean. Again the balance of risk favors peace.

Fascism was not born with Hitler and will not die with Hitler. Fascism is something which springs from a certain type of economic and social soil. Nowhere does there exist such fine soil for fascism as a land economically exhausted and unbalanced by a costly war—and disillusioned by the inevitable tragic post-war awakening. That is the soil in which fascism flourishes. That is the soil which produced Soviet Russia, Fascist Italy, and Nazi Germany. That is the soil which will produce a Hitlerized America—even though Hitler be dead and buried.

In an effort to frighten the people, the proponents of war claim that if England goes down, we will be invaded. Every handicap that would be ours in an effort to invade Germany would likewise be a handicap to the dictator in an attack upon the United States. Today he has air bases near England, in Norway, Belgium, and France. Where would his air bases be while trying to invade America? In South America? South America is farther from the United States than Germany. Here again the risk is balanced in our favor.

Even if we were well prepared with arms and trained men; even if we had no national debt; even if we ran no risk of losing liberty at home, I plead with you to stop and think of the horrors of war; of human arms and legs stacked like cordwood outside field hospitals; of eyes that cannot see; of reason forever gone; of flesh and lungs burned by gas; of sorrowing mothers, wives, sweethearts, and for what? To satisfy the ambition of some to live in history and to preserve the financial investments of others. It requires neither moral nor physical courage to plan wars for others to fight.

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" I trust that I may not be thought irreverent when I ask you what shall it profit America if by trying to establish the four freedoms for others, we lose them at home?

The most dangerous threat to our Republic is not Hitler. It is the kind of bitter intolerance that is being shown to those of us who do not want to go to war at this time. I dare say that 90 percent of the Members of Congress were elected upon a promise to keep America out of foreign wars. But, we are told, "You should support the President." Well, the President, too, was elected upon a promise to keep us out of war. He has not yet broken that promise. I know that terrific pressure is being put upon him, but my prayer is that he may stand firm, and he will keep his promise if enough of you write or wire him to do so. Anyway, it is not his to declare war. That power under the Constitution is vested in the people through their duly elected Representatives in Congress. If I believed that England was fighting our fight, I would introduce a resolution in Congress declaring war. I deny she is fighting our fight. I deeply sympathize with the unfortunate people of England, but my first obligation is to my native land—the good old U. S. A. We should not be hypocritical in these dark days. Let us face the facts. Let us be realistic. We cannot by force change the character and habits of peoples; we cannot establish peace where teachings of the Prince of Peace have failed after 2,000 years.

This is, indeed, a critical hour. Mothers of America, where are you? They are your boys who would be sent to die on foreign shores. Speak while you may. You have the same right to be heard as the President. Make your chorus for peace so loud he cannot help but hear. Like the besiegers of Jericho of old, you can, if you will, shout down the walls behind which the warmongers hide.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. VITO MARCANTONIO, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a radio address delivered by me over the National Broadcasting Co. hook-up on Memorial Day:

My fellow Americans, as a Member of the United States House of Representatives, I have fought the administration's imperialist program of armaments, conscription, war, and dictatorship from the very beginning. At times I have had to vote alone. I have not opposed it partially. I have opposed it in its entirety. Therefore, I now make answer to the President's fireside speech of last Tuesday night, which proclaimed the shooting and bloodshedding and dictatorship phases of the Wall Street-Downing Street Axis scheme for war, Empire, and dictatorship.

Despite the frantic activity on the part of the press, radio, false leaders of labor, and those who occupy the seats of the mighty to scare you, the American people, into a state of war hysteria, over 90 percent are opposed to involvement in this war. You have been saying, and are saying "No" to convoys, to an expeditionary force, and to everything that makes for war. It is precisely due to your overwhelming opposition to war that the President sought by means of a fireside-speech proclamation to take the issue of war and peace away from the Congress of the United States and away from you, the American people, thereby making it appear that war was inevitable and that the issue was closed. This war is by no means inevitable and the issue is by no means closed. You, the American people, can get our Nation out of war and keep it out of war.

The President in his speech repeated that the only thing to fear was fear. Yet despite this assertion, he used fear, fear of an attack by Hitler as a justification for the usurpation of the right to determine when, where, and at whom the shooting was to begin, for a redefinition of defense so as to have it actually mean aggression, to in effect destroy the Neutrality Act, and thereby create a situation in which a war incident would be unavoidable; for an attempt to set up a dictatorship over the very life of every American. He used fear, fear of an attack by Hitler for this four-way panzer attack on the peace and liberties of the people, notwithstanding the fact that he knew of the existence of the unanimous report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, filed on May 16, 1940, made after years of study, that this country and this hemisphere cannot be successfully invaded by any nation or combination of nations.

When to shoot, whom to shoot, and where to shoot is a power vested only in the representatives of the American people assembled in Congress, whose sworn duty is to do the will of the people. The assumption of this power by the President is not only unconstitutional but it constitutes a dictatorship second to no other existing dictatorship, including even that of Adolf Hitler. The President was never given this power either by the forefathers of this country or by the mandate of the American people in the last election. There is no difference between a Nazi system by which one man orders his people to shoot or be shot at in Poland or in Holland and a system as set up by the President in his speech whereby one man can order his people to shoot or be shot at in Dakar tomorrow and in Singapore the day after tomorrow, or somewhere in South America, Europe, or on the high seas.

Neither the demagogic use of the word "democracy," of the phrase "freedom of the seas," of the four freedoms, nor of the fear of invasion by Hitler will cause you, the American people, to accept this new order.

The President, in his speech, also redefined defense. Defense now means, according to the President, fighting on the high seas in order to carry out aid to Britain, or fighting a thousand miles away from Boston, Mass., at Dakar, or anywhere else that he may choose. This definition of defense is a distortion and you must repudiate it. Imperialist aggression at Dakar, or in Europe, or in South America is not defense of our shores, or of our way of life. It is in pursuance of a course of empire, of the Wall Street-Downing Street axis.

The entire war program has been marked by fraud and deception. Under the guise of defense, America was plunged into a program of armaments, destructive to the economic and social welfare of the entire Nation. On May 16, 1940, the President asked Congress for these armaments, and said we needed them for defense against invasion. Yet, after the elections, in another fireside speech, the President revealed the true character of the armaments, as an arsenal for one belligerent as against another belligerent. Conscription was sold to the American people as a 1-year peacetime training for the youth of our country. Now, conscription is revealed in its true light as training for a war of aggression, and the assurances of the duration of 1 year have been cast into a pale of doubt and confusion.

You, the American people, were even tricked into a phoney Presidential election, deprived of the opportunity to vote up or down the President's war program, by Wall Street imposing on the party of the opposition a candidate who joined his opponent in selling the American people this war, concealed in the wrappings of such peace and defense slogans as "Aid short of war" and repetition of pledges of again and again and again promising that your boys would never be sent to any foreign war. Aid short of war has now been completely forgotten by both the President and his opponent. Even the lend-lease bill was given to the American people in the name of defense and as a peace measure. Now we are told that in order to carry out the provisions of this act, we must do what we were promised would never be done—to shoot when, where, and at whom the President may decide.

They have sought to ease you, the American people, into this undeclared war by fraud and deception against your will, and now by redefinition of defense and by usurpation of power they seek to shed the blood of your sons on land and sea without your consent.

The President, in his speech, demanded unity and backed his demand with the proclaiming of an unlimited national emergency. You are told that the debate must be closed and everybody must unite and acquiesce to the program of war and dictatorship. And all for what? For democracy, we are told. The very fact that you, the people, are being sneaked into this war, the very fact that the President has arrogated unto himself unconstitutional power, the very fact that fraud and deception have been used throughout this whole scheme and conspiracy, the very fact that all this is being done without your consent, and that you are being deprived of your right to decide, demonstrates conclusively that this is not a war for democracy.

China was mentioned in his speech, for the President could not very well talk of democracy or of the four freedoms or of the minimum wages and maximum hours of the people of India, Africa, Egypt, nor of the wage slaves of British-owned West Indies, nor of the exploited masses of British-owned China in Hong Kong and Singapore. No; it would not have been in keeping with these four freedoms nor consistent with his condemnation of the Nazi slave labor as a menace to our trade, if he had talked about the portions of rice that are being doled out to the millions and millions of Britain's exploited toilers all over the world as wages for their labor. The President also failed to tell you that the very gasoline that Japan uses for the destruction of lives in China is furnished in great quantities by the same ladies and gentlemen who are advocating that your sons kill and be killed in a war for their vest-pocket democracy. Yes, my fellow Americans, the President failed to tell you that while we are fueling Japan with oil, we have been fooling China with words. Nor were we told that Ireland is being starved in order to force a surrender of her sovereignty and her neutrality.

And as for South America, the people of South America know that exploitation is exploitation and that imperialism is imperialism, be it by Berlin, London, or Wall Street. They know particularly when the President assumed the right to speak and to set forth and dictate the foreign policy for these South American neighbors that it was an extension of dictatorship over them. Further, they will never forget our tyranny over Puerto Rico.

No, this is not a war for democracy. It is a war for conquest. It is a war to determine whether the Wall Street-Downing Street axis or the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis shall exploit humanity. Examine the record of the people who are asking your sons to die for this so-called democracy of theirs. The same gang that caused the defeat of the Republic of Spain with the assent of the administration, that put over the Hoare-Laval deal on the people of Africa without protest from our administration, that made Munich possible with the consent of our administration, is the ally of those who beat the tom-tom war drums, and whom the President himself characterized as economic royalists and as enemies of democracy in 1936. They ask that you sacrifice for their kind of democracy, for a democracy which means war, empire, 52,000,000 empty stomachs, a higher and higher cost of living, decreased W. P. A., more taxes for you, and more profits for them, a destroyed Bill of Rights, persecuted foreign-born and political minorities, the poll tax, lynchings, discrimination on jobs because of race, color, or creed, a shackled labor, and an impoverished farmer. This is the democracy for which the President arrogated unto himself the right to determine when, where, and at whom to shoot. This is the democracy for which defense has been translated into aggression. This is the democracy for which a false national unity is dictated to you.

It is precisely because you recognize that this war is a war between two sets of the enemies of the American people, that it is a war of Hitlerism versus Hitlerism which will only mean the triumph of a Hitlerism of either brand, it is precisely because you know that it makes no difference to the enslaved people throughout the world whether the whip is in the hands of Adolf Hitler or whether the whip which lashes them into slavery is held in the hands of the masters of the Wall Street-Downing Street axis, that you reject this false national unity and refuse to surrender your peace and your liberties. Hitlerism can and must be defeated. However, Hitlerism cannot be defeated by plunging into this imperialist war to insure the victory of the Wall Street-Downing Street brand of Hitlerism. The only weapon against Hitlerism is real democracy with no ifs and buts in our Bill of Rights, with no exception to the proposition of the Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal, with the guaranty of the rights of labor, of free unions, abolition of the poll tax and all kinds of discrimination, a decent living for the American farmer, and jobs for the unemployed. Before such a democracy, collaborating with all of the democracy and peace-loving people of the world, both brands of Hitlerism inexorably will collapse. Therefore, write to the President, your Congressmen and Senators, and insist that they take this Nation out of war and keep us out of war, because you want no part of it.

In this hour, the most crucial hour of our history, I appeal to my follow countrymen, American men and American women of all races, of all color and of all creeds, to defeat this war and dictatorship conspiracy. The conspirators are powerful and occupy the seats of the mighty, but they are few. You, the people, are millions. This is our county.

Our lives are our own. Our liberties are God-given. I appeal to you to unite, stand up as free men and free women, as brave men and brave women, and let the world know that you refuse to be rushed further into this war, that you refuse to be sneaked into this war, that you refuse to be duped by fraud and deception into this war, that you refuse to accept edicts or proclamations for war and for dictatorship in a free United States. Americans, save your peace, save your sons, save your liberties—unite and fight.

Memorializing the President and Congress To Enact a Federal Retirement System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

RESOLUTION BY CALIFORNIA STATE ASSEMBLY

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include therein, and to call to the attention of the Congress and people generally, the following resolution passed by the Assembly of the State of California, memorializing the President and the Congress to enact legislation to amend the Social Security Act, in order to make possible the payment of a Federal Retirement Pension to senior citizens, as a matter of right. I consider this resolution of great importance and know that many of my colleagues will agree with me. The resolution was introduced in the California Assembly by Assemblymen Dills and King:

House Resolution 170

Whereas under the present Federal Social Security Act no provision is made for retirement income for those who already have reached retirement age, or for those who later will attain that age, who have as farmers or business or professional men or women or in other capacities created jobs for themselves and others, nor for those who have been employed on farms or in homes, churches, public offices, or other employment excluded from title 2 of the Federal Social Security Act, except by submitting to poverty registration of themselves and all members of their families, while retirement income and widows' pensions are made available to all employed in business and industrial establishments without question as to their economic status, thereby discouraging individual initiative and private enterprise: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly of the State of California, That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized to enact legislation so to amend title 1 of the Social Security Act as to make a minimum of $30 per month available, as a matter of right, to every retired citizen 60 years of age or older, who is not drawing annuities in that amount under any other Federal retirement system; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators and Congressmen from California in the Congress of the United States and that they be and they are hereby requested to support legislation which will effectuate the purposes of this resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor and the presiding officer of the senate and the assembly in each of the States now having a legislative session and to the Governors of all the other States and that the said officers be and they are hereby respectfully requested to present the same to their respective legislative bodies with a request that each of them promptly take similar action to the end that there shall be a known definite public demand upon our Federal Government from these States for prompt elimination, in the manner herein indicated, of the injustice herein complained of; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly of this State be and he is hereby instructed to forward a certified copy of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, to the Chief Clerk of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker and to the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to all other persons to whom this resolution is specifically directed.

The National Youth Administration, Its Operation in Michigan Under the Administration of Orin W. Kaye, State Administrator, and John L. Wagner, Wayne County Area Director

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, on July 1, the National Youth Administration will have rounded out a 5-year span. It is an anniversary to which, in my opinion, considerable social significance should attach. It is my wish, therefore, to append at this time a brief appraisal of National Youth Administration to the all-too-thin transcript previously recorded by persons who believe in its enormous potentialities and who favor its continued expansion.

When I assert that this transcript has been too thin, no inference is intended that National Youth Administration has failed to win its share of recognition and approval in Congress. It has, as a matter of fact, won a reassuring measure of backing. What I do mean is, that of articulate praise it has won far less than its richly deserved share, and for two fairly obvious reasons. First, is that the national emergency has pretty well monopolized the public records. Second, National Youth Administration's capable administrators have lacked both the time and the facilities to effectively dramatize for public consumption a record of progress that has been truly remarkable.

I believe that actions speak louder than words, but in a sense this reticence regarding the growing importance of National Youth Administration is to be deeply regretted. I, for one, feel that too much cannot be said in its praise.

For here is an agency as nearly self-sustaining as any to stem from the Roosevelt domestic program, and one which has outsped all others in gearing itself to the urgent demands of national defense. Here, in action, is the solution of a problem that seemed unanswerable a few years back—the problem of what to do about our youth in their relation to technological unemployment.

To paint an adequate picture of N. Y. A.'s growth, to outline its scope in even a general way, would call for a canvass bigger than is at my disposal. And the mere listing of the dozens of mechanical pursuits in which young Americans are now being trained or the listing of the essential items they are fabricating under supervision of their Government, would necessarily fail to do N. Y. A. its full justice.

Any such cataloging of mere fact and figure might let those important and analysis-defying intangibles escape. I have reference to the character-molding aspects of the training, the development of self-confidence, and ambition, and self-respect now being engendered in N. Y. A. youth by the age-old but too long forgotten prescription of hard work and plenty of it.

It is intended, therefore, in this résumé to touch briefly on N. Y. A.'s achievements in my own section, that is, Detroit and Wayne County, and also to cite some instances of progress it has accomplished in the State of Michigan. Such restricted treatment is, after all, natural inasmuch as this is the section about which I am most competent to pass judgment. Furthermore, it is a pleasure I could not very well forego in view of some interesting material just sent along to me from the efficient offices of Orin W. Kaye, State Administrator, and John L. Wagner, Wayne County area director.

But before getting around to this, I would like to point out that no purely provincial viewpoint, no merely local appraisal, can portray the truly vast notion of N. Y. A. If we wish a rounded-out picture of the task it is engaged upon, we must bear in mind that there are in the United States some 20,000,000 young people between 16 and 25 years of age. A percentage of these are in school or in the Army or Navy. But a great proportion are out looking for jobs, which several million are destined not to find in either a peacetime or a wartime economy unless they are trained for the particular job they would like to get.

It was not long ago that a half million of these hopeless and confused youngsters—boys and girls alike—were roaming the highways and the railways of the country, a lost generation headed for nowhere. Children from poverty-stricken homes, the very force that made most of them "road kids," was a fierce American pride that could not abide their sharing the few crusts needed by less able members of their brood. A lot of that pride, a lot of that courageous spirit of adventure could have been harnessed had we known the N. Y. A. formula back in those days. Young and able hands could have been trained in useful pursuits, the pride of craftsmanship could have been awakened, and self-respect retained in thousands of these young wanderers.

In a sense the road kids of the deep depression years did not live in vain, for it was the phenomenon of this lost generation as much as any other single factor that expedited the establishment of N. Y. A. back in 1935. Today the safeguarding of the younger brothers and sisters of these road kids is the solemn and sacred function of N. Y. A. And I doubt if ever our Government made an investment from which it will eventually reap a greater profit.

During the fiscal year now coming to a close N. Y. A. has been training 600,000 young men and women for defense industries through work experience in some 5,000 workshops scattered from coast to coast. It has been helping another 500,000 to get an education by providing part-time work through which to pay their way.

One of the most easily understood indexes proclaiming the success of N. Y. A. is the amazingly high number of youth it is graduating into private employment. And it is around this point that I wish to bring forward a few facts relative to the growing stature of N. Y. A. in my own community and my own State.

Figures from N. Y. A.'s Wayne County office reveal that 39 percent of the 10,918 youth carried on the rolls for the first 10 months of this fiscal year have secured regular jobs, largely in the industrial plants of the Detroit area.

These Wayne County figures include both in-school and out-of-school programs. They include those who have been gaining their experience in the regular work centers, operated and maintained exclusively under N. Y. A. auspices, as well as those employed on cosponsored projects, such as city and county offices, hospitals, and so forth. Wayne County has more than 300 of these cosponsored projects where young people are working side by side with veterans in several specialized fields.

Today, Wayne County has 5 work centers including an outstanding operation, known as Southfield project, which is regarded as one of the largest and most complete N. Y. A. machine shops in the country. Opened last August, the sightseer who might invade Southfield today, without foreknowledge, would have no way of detecting that he had not stepped inside the nerve center of one of Detroit's great industrial plants, so competently and busily engaged are all its 1,000 young employees.

Another highly regarded Detroit project, located on premises owned by the Michigan State Fair, is now preparing to move its outstanding wood shop, drafting department, and sign-painting department into more ample quarters on Detroit's east side. Growth and progress are constantly making such changes necessary inside the N. Y. A. structure.

As elsewhere throughout the country, the work systems and environment obtaining in private employment are simulated as closely as possible in Wayne County work centers. Thus, the young workers are required to punch their time "in" and "out" on standard factory time clocks, and are "docked" if tardy, unless an extremely valid excuse is forthcoming. The pay scale in the work centers ranges from $18 to $20 a month, the latter rate in effect in Wayne County only at Southfield.

Because they penalize the young employee for coming late, one is not to conclude that a too drastic system of discipline is in effect. Quite the contrary, all the centers are staffed with counselors whose duty it is to adjust the youth to their jobs and assist, as well, in the solution of personal problems if such assistance is invited.

Wayne County's "in school" program, that is, its provision of part-time jobs for students in secondary schools and colleges, is currently assisting at a scale that fluctuates between $3 and $20 a month, students in all of the county's high schools as well as those pursuing college courses at the University of Detroit, Wayne University, and the Detroit Institute of Technology. The pay is certainly meager enough, but it is reported that in hundreds of instances these few dollars represent the difference between remaining in school or dropping out into an already glutted labor market.

Since the defense program was launched last year, increasing emphasis has been placed on projects which afford work experience and basic training in mechanical pursuits. Thus, at Southfield which, incidentally, employs boys only, work on production of socially useful goods shows that a high volume of items is manufactured directly for defense needs.

Working in close conjunction with Army and Navy stations in Michigan—Fort Custer, Fort Wayne, Selfridge Field, and Detroit's Coast Guard Station and naval armory—Southfield's boys have been producing a wide range of articles which include equipment for the military police and also such needed items as wheelbarrows, kitchen tables, street signs, and rear steps for trucks.

Besides the service branches, a number of public agencies in Detroit and Michigan are profitably availing themselves of the manufactured items and services rendered by the Southfield project, as well as by all the other work centers in the county and State. While I may appear to be stressing work at Southfield, I do so only to indicate specifically the scope and utility of these work centers as they are functioning in much the same fashion in every State in the Union.

National Youth Administration youth are not engaged at make-believe, academic tasks, undertaken for mere practice. They are practical producers of usable and needed products. For every item on their production schedules there is a definite waiting market. The fact that this market always constitutes some public agency or institution, Federal, State, or municipal, with no cost involvement whatsoever to the beneficiary, is as tangible evidence as any of the economy represented in this great program.

The defense program has also expanded the opportunities for young women in N. Y. A. As a result, machine shops exclusively for women are now beginning to dot the country. Such a one, known as the Lafayette project, is today in operation about a mile from Detroit's city hall.

Since it was transformed this spring into a girls' work center, Lafayette project has proved a happy hunting ground for the photographers from Detroit's three newspapers. Here, to the gentlemen of the press is news in the strictest sense of the word, unique, appealing, and significant. But it may be that the newspapermen, in discovering a group of photogenic young women who are not afraid to get their pretty noses greasy or their manicures spoiled, are missing the real point of the story. To the young girl mechanics, their training is a deadly serious business designed to launch them in a very short time into good-paying jobs in private industry.

Already the girls at the Lafayette project have demonstrated a surprising aptitude as operators of lathes, milling machines, shapers, drill presses, welding machines, and so forth. They are forcefully showing the important role woman is able to play in any possible program of "total defense."

So readily and naturally are these young women taking to their machine tasks, the Wayne County area office informs me, that plans are now seriously being considered to put them to work in the near future at the highly complicated and precision task of manufacturing micrometers. At this time, I am told, it requires a year to get delivery on these essential gages and their scarcity in both the Army and Navy already is said to be noticeable.

Out in Detroit there are many people who appreciate a good thing when they see it and as proof of the favor N. Y. A. is earning out there, it gives me pleasure to read into the record the following editorial, published in the May 12, 1941, issue of Automotive Daily News, generally recognized as one of the industry's most authoritative publications:

S O S FOR N. Y. A.

In the Congressional hopper in Washington there is a bill in which automobile dealers, as well as the industry as a whole, should be particularly interested because it has a particular bearing on one of their main problems. It asks for a financial support for the National Youth Administration, a governmental organization which trains youth in mechanical and production work. Translated into automobile lingo, N. Y. A. is the training school whose graduates become our shop mechanics, replacements for those boys in the back room who are taken over for defense work. At the same time they are getting a rudimentary training which will fit them also for defense work.

Now here is striking proof from an industry governed by as hard-boiled and at the same time as competent a group as are to be found anywhere in American business. And it is, furthermore, a tribute which has been won the hard way without benefit of tom-tom-beating ballyhoo because, knowing Messrs. Kaye and Wagner personally, I am aware that they are not the point-with-pride type of executive. And I suspect this is pretty much true of the N. Y. A. executive personnel throughout the country. At least, to my knowledge, they seem to have gone about their work quietly. Certainly, they have been notably distinguished by their apparent disregard of the usual pressure techniques, the not unfamiliar displays of bluster and the usual overdrawn claims characterizing some of the brethren we know up here on Capitol Hill.

Personally, while I admire this attitude very much, I think the time has come when N. Y. A. should take its light out from behind the bushel, and on the basis of its remarkable 5-year growth, should do a little shouting for the public ear.

I believe the whole set-up should be accurately evaluated, the splendid results computed, and the public be made more fully conversant with the facts regarding a public agency about whose permanency I have not the slightest doubt. Of all the heritages bequeathed the American people by the New Deal, I can think of none more able to build and develop where the need for constructive effort is greatest.

Because my time is limited, I will not be able to mention the project at Cassidy Lake, Mich., where the construction of gliders has been in progress for several months under some of the ablest tutelage in the Middle West. But I think this phase of N. Y. A.'s imaginative program should speak for itself in this very week when the British Army has tragically been forced to evacuate the strategic island of Crete, due to the use by the Nazi army of this very type of aerial navigation for the first time in military history.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MALCOLM C. TARVER

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM J. J. McENTEE, DIRECTOR OF THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps:

CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1941.

Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Labor-Federal Security Appropriations Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TARVER: During the hearings recently held by your subcommittee on the C. C. C. section of the Labor-Federal Security Administration appropriation estimates, several questions were asked regarding the general character and value of the work performed by members of the C. C. C. This office was asked to furnish an estimate of (1) what the work performed by the Civilian Conservation Corps during the last fiscal year would have cost had it been performed by ordinary labor, and (2) what, in our opinion, the dollar and cents return has been, and will be, as a result of the work performed by the corps in the conservation of natural resources.

It is estimated that the value of work performed by the C. C. C. during the fiscal year 1940 amounted to $220,000,000. While no exact figure can be given in connection with question (2), the best estimate available at this time is that the future value of work accomplished by the corps over the last 8 years will greatly exceed $1,500,000,000. This figure has been reached by estimating the future value of the more than 2,500,000,000 trees planted; the 118,500 miles of truck trails and minor roads constructed through forests; the 85,000 miles of telephone lines laid; the more than 4,000 fire towers constructed; the close to 100,000 bridges and buildings built; the forest areas developed into forest and park recreational areas; the 3,900,000 acres of forests improved to effect faster and sounder growth; the range lands revegetated; the reclamation and wildlife work done; the drainage ditches rehabilitated; and the many other kinds of work completed. No attempt has been made to place an exact estimate on the future savings effected through trees saved by enrollee fire fighters who have expended more than 6,000,000,000 man-days fighting forest fires.

As one example, it is estimated by competent lumber authorities that the more than two and a half billion trees planted by enrollees since the spring of 1933 will have a future value of $240,000,000.

Before answering questions (1) and (2) in more detail, let me state that the Civilian Conservation Corps, in carrying out its dual functions of advancing conservation programs of Nation-wide proportions and training young men for future employment and future participation in American democracy, has devoted its full work energies to the prosecution of natural resources work projects of definite physical value to the Nation. The work done by the Corps has had for its purpose the protection, the development, and the expansion of our great physical resources of forests, topsoil, and water. None of the work undertaken could be described in any sense as made work or work performed merely for the purpose of keeping young men employed.

With reference to the usefulness of the work performed, I want to state that it is of the same general character and type as the work which the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, and State conservation organizations have carried on for years on a limited scale in their efforts to preserve and develop our great physical resources of timber and topsoil. All work has been carried forward in accordance with long-range conservation programs planned out well in advance by the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture.

From the very beginning of the C. C. C., all work projects, excepting those done on military reservations and the Winooski River flood-control project in Vermont where the War Department supervised the work, have been recommended to this office by the National Park Service, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Grazing Service, the Fish and Wildlife Service, the General Land Office, and the Office of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior and the Forest Service, the Soil Conservation Service, and other services of the Department of Agriculture. No project has been approved until this office had been assured that the work to be performed was of definite constructive and permanent value which would benefit not only the present generation but future generations to come. Civilian Conservation Corps regulations provide also that all work performed must be done in conformance with the highest work standards of the two departments mentioned above. This has been assured by having all work supervised and inspected by technical experts selected by the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture.

A specific example of the worth-while character of C. C. C. work projects may be found in Lake States forests where hundreds of millions of commercially useful type seedlings have been planted on cut-over and burned-over areas. These plantings, while growing into commercially valuable lumber, are gradually increasing in value as agents for halting erosion, for conserving water, and for bettering conditions for wildlife. For other examples, let me call attention to the Winooski River project in Vermont, the Lake of the Pines Dam in South Dakota, and the Skogie Lagoons flood control and recreational project in Illinois. Enrollees build roads, fire towers, extend lines of telephone communication in forests to provide better protection and administration of these areas. They carry on erosion-control projects on farms. Of this type of work, Dr. Hugh H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Conservation Service said, on the occasion of the Corps' eighth birthday on April 5, 1941, "It would be impossible to overestimate the contribution of the C. C. C. to the progress of soil conservation in the United States."

In 1933, when Congress approved the first C. C. C. legislation, Federal and State conservation authorities were engaged in a losing battle against the devastating forces of fire, tree-attacking insects and diseases, neglect and wasteful practices in their campaign to conserve and develop the Nation's once enormous physical resources. These departments had long-range conservation programs but national interest in conservation was lacking. Manpower needed to carry out these planned projects was unavailable.

It was not until the coming of the C. C. C. that funds and manpower were available in sufficient quantities to break the log jam that for years had, in effect, made our national conservation policy one of allowing our natural resources to decline in value yearly due to failure to prosecute a Nation-wide conservation program. The Civilian Conservation Corps, under the competent direction of trained technicians, revolutionized this conservation policy. Hundreds of thousands of young men were set to work protecting, conserving, and developing our natural resources. Over the last 8 years, these youths have made a direct physical contribution to every State and virtually every county in the country. A real start has been made to save American resources for present and future generations. Our national natural resources assets have been greatly enhanced. If this work is continued on a broad scale, the day will come when the natural-resources budget can be balanced.

Let me now take up the committee's questions in more detail. In replying to the first question, if we infer that your committee has in mind the use of ordinary labor under the supervision of the various technical agencies, then the total cost of the work performed during the fiscal year 1940, including labor, supervision, construction supplies, materials, and equipment would have been approximately $172,000,000. Of this amount, $132,000,000 represents common labor, $13,000,000 for field supervision and administrative costs, and $28,000,000 for construction supplies, materials, and equipment.

If on the other hand, we should assume that what is wanted is the cost of such work if performed by private industry on contract, then the cost would greatly exceed the above estimate. The type of work performed by the Civilian Conservation Corps is so varied that it is extremely difficult to make a comparison of costs between C. C. C. enrollee labor and private labor. Much of this work is of a technical nature and requires more or less skilled labor. The average enrollee must be trained for the work, whether it is on soil-eroded areas, grazing lands, reclamation projects, forest preservation, or on recreational areas.

Based on 47,000,000 man-days spent during the fiscal year 1940 on work projects, a conservative estimate would be at least $220,000,000, which would include all costs. Using as a base the average wage for common labor (Bureau of Labor Statistics), the cost of such work, if performed by private industry, would amount to over $173,000,000 for labor costs alone. Add to this the cost of field supervision, which, in private industry performing work of a similar nature, varies from 5 to 15 percent. Allowing an average cost of 8 percent for field supervision, the total cost to this point amounts to $203,000,000, representing the total for all labor, common and supervisory.

To the above total must be added the cost of structures, parts, and equipment. During the fiscal year 1940 approximately $20,000,000 was spent on construction, supplies, and materials, and $8,000,000 for construction equipment, bringing the total to over $220,000,000.

The total expenditures by the C. C. C. for the fiscal year 1940 were $278,000,000. Deducting the cost computed for private industry leaves a balance of $58,000,000 which can be charged to the training, physical conditioning, medical and welfare programs of the C. C. C., or an average cost of $165 per enrollee.

Even though the cost of training as computed above is very small, consideration must be given to other important benefits which the C. C. C. offers to the enrollee and his family. During the fiscal year 1940 over 1,500,000 persons benefited from the monthly allotments enrollees made to their families—persons who were in need of relief.

Referring again to question two regarding the future return to be expected on the C. C. C. investment in conservation work, it would be impossible to furnish an exact and complete figure on the future values of the big total of corps accomplishments. No one can estimate accurately how many hundreds of thousands of acres of timberlands have been saved by the corps' protective activities in connection with forest fires and the attacks of the gypsy moth, the bark beetle, or the white pine blister rust which has endangered the Nation's entire white pine timber industry. Neither can one compute in dollars the future value to the Nation of the work the corps has done in watershed protection or in the development of a comprehensive State park system or to improve our national parks and monuments. In order to furnish an estimate, a study has been made of a number of the major items of work completed. For instance, competent authorities in the lumber and manufacturing industries were asked to compute to the best of their ability the future value on maturity of the more than 2,000,000 acres of forest lands planted to commercial-type trees. This office was advised that, assuming an average mortality rate for the trees and assuming that the C. C. C. timber stands reached maturity and that lumber values had not deteriorated, the C. C. C. trees should have a value in some 40 years of $240,000,000. Let me again repeat that it is my estimate that the total future value of C. C. C. work completed will greatly exceed $1,500,000,000.

If more detailed information is required I can furnish you with a complete list of all projects completed by the Civilian Conservation Corps since 1933.

Sincerely yours,

J. J. McENTEE, Director.

Memorial Day at Antietam National Cemetery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, among the many Memorial Day observances throughout the United States, the annual program at Antietam National Cemetery, Sharpsburg, Md., has long proved a mecca for thousands of American citizens who visit this historic shrine—the scene of the bloodiest battle of the Civil War.

According to records compiled by the National Park Service and released by Mr. Ralston B. Lattimore, associate historical technician, 26,000 soldiers were killed in 24 hours on the Antietam Battlefield.

It was my privilege to accept an invitation to participate in the Memorial Day program at Antietam National Cemetery, and under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein my address on that occasion:

Mr. Chairman, comrades, ladies, and gentlemen, it is with bated breath and whispering humbleness that I accept the kind invitation to come here today and assist in carrying out the annual program for the observance of Memorial Day inaugurated by the Grand Army of the Republic.

For many years the Antietam Memorial Association sponsored a program that was a mecca for thousands of American citizens who made their annual pilgrimage to this historic shrine. When our comrades of the Civil War reached the twilight of life, the torch was handed to us veterans of the World War to carry on in honor and respect the tribute of love and devotion to those defenders of our great Republic who now enjoy the sleep of the just.

Antietam National Cemetery is a living symbol of the spirit of sacrifice that was necessary to guarantee the existence of the ideals on which our Nation was founded. On this historic site Americans imbued with a love of country met in deadly combat and made the supreme sacrifice in order that one Nation indivisible with justice and liberty for all might prevail.

As we join in spirit the similar observances in many other communities where love and reverence is being paid to the dead of all wars, we are conscious of our great blessing that America is at peace with all nations—yet today is a sad day; sad because many of us have felt the loss of dear ones who made the supreme sacrifice for our beloved land; sad because of the possibility that we may again be plunged into a futile Old World conflict.

On the other hand, Memorial Day is also a day of inspiration, of exaltation, and of hope; for as Abraham Lincoln said in those immortal words at nearby Gettysburg, "It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave their last full measure of devotion."

When Lincoln spoke, that cause was to save our Nation from disunity; to preserve the Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, from being torn apart and by being torn apart from final death as a nation. It was a heroic struggle to hold together this great Republic which our founding fathers at Valley Forge, Lexington, and Concord had fought so gallantly to create.

When the Civil War ended and the victory of Antietam had played a conspicuous part in restoring peace to our troubled Nation once more, our Republic was united. Again the people of America stood shoulder to shoulder—as they had in 1776—in a determined effort to build a greater and more united Nation. The custom of observing Memorial Day was the outgrowth of that stirring period known as the Civil War, and the desire of the American people for a day of tribute to their hero dead. All over the land our grandmothers and grandfathers on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line united in paying homage to their honored dead. In so doing, they removed their hats, dropped a spray of flowers on some soldier's grave, lifted their heads to the stirring notes of the Star-Spangled Banner, and, at the same time, in their hearts they resolved that this Nation shall never again be torn asunder, that we shall never again allow internal discord or partisan dissension to break the solid front of all Americans.

This action on the part of our forefathers took place here at Antietam, as well as in the most remote country churchyard in America.

Spurred on by such a determined resolve, America embarked upon a course backed by this unconquerable spirit of national unity that transformed this Republic into a mighty and respected Nation among the people of the world. Yes; a nation that in a short span of years became the leader of the world.

The Spanish-American War in 1898 temporarily halted our progress as a nation, but with a united and unconquerable spirit we soon emerged victorious and returned to our task of development as a nation.

When the war clouds gathered over Europe in 1914 America was a peaceful and united nation. As a result, in 1917, when we were told our Republic was in danger, we arose to the occasion and defended our national honor with the effectiveness to be expected of a united nation.

But our victory in 1917–18 was a hollow mockery. When the armistice ended hostilities and the battle lines were discarded, we found that the price we paid for our part in the World War was written in the blood of American youth and the tears and heartaches of American fathers and mothers. Then came the devastating aftermath of war; that rushing tide of depression, unemployment, starvation, and want. We saw the base political philosophies of the Old World seek to gain a foothold in our great Nation as many citizens were forced to the breadlines to keep body and soul together.

It was at this point that communism and other foreign fanatical ideologies sought to take root in the hearts of Americans. For the first time since the Civil War the unity of our Nation was challenged as these so-called isms sought to replace the spirit of Americanism so firmly implanted in our hearts by the brave sacrifices of such heroes as rest beneath the green sod of this historic battleground. In truth, for the past several years we as a nation have been fighting another Civil War aimed at eradicating the alien influences in our midst. We have been aided in our fight largely by patriotic organizations, of whom organized veterandom play an important part. This task of freeing ourselves from subversive elements was greatly impeded, as the same fanatical ideologies caused the war clouds of Europe to again form over many peaceful nations of the Old World.

Unfortunately, we as a nation do not occupy at this critical period in world history the same position we enjoyed as a united nation in 1917–18. Today with the war clouds forming again and threatening our peace and security, we are in truth a house divided against itself. While our youth is again responding to their country's call, and our industries humming with activity as they strive to produce the needs of an adequate national defense, we find ourselves woefully lacking in national unity.

We lack the spirit of our heroic dead who knew no "ism" but true Americanism; who saluted no flag but the Stars and Stripes; and to whom preservation and advancement of American ideals was a birthright and a solemn duty to one's country. These honored dead whose memory we revere this day, believed in true Americanism, and were willing to fight and die for it; an Americanism that keeps strict faith with every word in the Bill of Rights and in every line of the Constitution. Yes, a kind of Americanism that gives you and me the right to express our opinions, to approve or disapprove, to commend or criticize, as we see fit.

That same Americanism that gives us the legal right to meet under the same roof as coworkers in the ranks of labor, as farmers in our local granges, as businessmen in our local chamber of commerce, as fraternal brothers in the Masonic Order, Knights of Columbus, Eagles, Odd Fellows, Elks, or Moose.

That same Americanism which leaves our newspapers free to print anything not in conflict with the laws of libel or decency, and which recognizes that a free press must be available to all and that if we deny it to those with whom we disagree today, it may be likewise denied us tomorrow. That same Americanism that in 1620 caused Pilgrim Fathers to migrate from England in search of individual liberty with the objective to establish homes in a new land where they could cling to the religious faith in which they believed.

And that same Americanism teaches us that the blessing of religious freedom must be ours forever if America is destined to survive. These are the concepts of liberty and freedom that motivated our hero dead, and you and I realize that there can be no compromise with such fundamental truths. We would be repudiating the principles of true Americanism were we to deny our neighbor the right to walk with his Lord and his God in his own way.

Our honored dead felt that no sacrifice was too great to guarantee that tolerance for the rights of others is the essence of Americanism applied to religious freedom, free speech, or other individual liberties. They took the position there must be freedom for all or freedom for none, and that those who would have America half slave and half free are traitors to the spirit of Americanism. They proved by their sacrifice that Americanism is not something you can sell for a price nor is it something you can put on or take off when you own a certain kind of uniform. To them Americanism was a way of life, a way of living. In short, it was the Nation's gospel handed down to them from the heroes of the American Revolution.

On this Memorial Day in a war-torn world we, the American people, to the number of over 130,000,000, are the custodians of the gospel of true Americanism. As trustees of this blessed heritage, Memorial Day 1941 should be a day of mediation, causing us to pause and reflect on the manner in which we are protecting the American way of life.

Who is there to deny that our mode of living is unequalled in the world today? It is not shared by the people of any other nation but belongs exclusively to the people of the United States.

Our precious heritage as free Americans sets us apart from all other people in the world. It has given us advantages so great that most minds fail to comprehend them. By virtue of this greatest of all gifts—American citizenship—the American people have more than twice as many automobiles as are owned by the other 2,000,000,000 human beings that inhabit the earth. By virtue of our many blessings, with 1 hour of labor an American workman can buy twice as much bread as an English or French workman and four times as much as can a German workman. By virtue of the American way of life, a child born into the home of an average American family will live years longer than will a child born into a similar home of any other great nation in the world.

In the short span of 150 years the American people through the American way of life own nine-twentieths or 45 percent of all the tangible wealth of the entire world despite the fact we have only 6 percent of the population of the entire world.

This gospel of true Americanism has made possible the great discovery of Bessemer and utilized it to gird this continent with tens of thousands of miles of railways. It made possible every suspension bridge, every ocean liner, and every great battleship. It has made possible the many uses of electricity, the invention of the mower, the reaper, and the steel plow and the farm tractor.

Yes, in the short span of 150 years this new Nation developed these worth-while achievements that for centuries were unknown to the Old World. These accomplishments constitute the world we know, as well as the American way of life. I repeat again, credit for these achievements belongs to that gospel of true Americanism made possible and perpetuated by those hero dead whose memory we commemorate this day.

As we solemnly rededicate ourselves to carry on the task for which they gave their last full measure of devotion we view with alarm as the war clouds again gather over this last peaceful Nation. True to our traditions, the American people are rallying to meet the challenge to the American way of life. The tramp of marching feet resounds throughout the Nation as the youth of America respond to the call of their country. Industries hum with activity as they strive to break all production records in their determined efforts to supply all the needs of an adequate national defense.

If America ever needed unity it is at this critical period in world history. It is distressing to witness labor and capital at swords points when we should be united in producing the necessary military equipment incident to our national defense. It is equally disturbing to see fellow Americans engage in name-calling contests that tend to weaken and divide us as a nation.

These seeds of discontent, sown by our own American citizens, prepare the soil for the planting of alien influences so easily accepted by a nation divided against itself.

Today America is being challenged as never before by enemies within and without. There are insidious forces at work within our own country who are seeking to undermine the basic ideals of our Republic. These political termites are tirelessly gnawing at the pillars of our form of government. And as I have said before they are encouraged by indifference on the part of many lukewarm Americans and by the active work of foreign agents.

Mark you, I hold no brief for the Communist, Nazi, Fascist, or any other un-American group. Yet regardless of how dangerous are these political philosophies they exhibit a unity of purpose that cannot fail to attract our attention. We are forced to admit reluctantly that the advocates of these new-fangled political concepts diametrically opposed to our gospel of true Americanism are fired with a fanatical zeal and enthusiasm that staggers the imagination of every one of us.

Such a nationalistic frame of mind as displayed by Nazi Germany has transformed into a mighty military machine a nation that in 1918 was conquered and subdued. We must recognize that for 7 years prior to the war now raging in Europe you and I read in the newspapers or witnessed in the news reel at our family theater the almost unbelievable systematic effort employed to arouse the national consciousness of the vanquished German people. From a prostrate nation they arose to take their place as the second greatest industrial nation in the world. Yes, we saw legions of German youth depicted in brown shirts and raising their hands in salute to an insignificant Austrian paperhanger, now held in abject contempt by the nations of the world as a ruthless invader of peace-loving nations.

Today those same youth of Nazi Germany are the spark plugs in the blitzkrieg that has reduced 14 countries in succession to a state of servitude.

Let us dwell for a moment on the activities of other nations since the close of the first World War. When we look back we now recall with vivid recollection that while Hitler pursued his program the remainder of the world, including our own America, was content to take everything for granted and be lulled into a false sense of security.

When the rude awakening came on September 5, 1939, the United States with other nations of the world found themselves wholly unprepared for this new challenge to the peace and security of the civilized world. Through the grace of God we as a Nation have been spared actual combat with the ruthless forces now overrunning the plains of Europe. And while we are engaged in a feverish effort to build an adequate national defense at the earliest possible moment, such a gigantic task provides a real testing ground and an opportunity to view the principles of true Americanism at work.

Surely we as a nation are not unmindful of the lessons taught by the sacrifice of those honored dead who placed unity of purpose and loyalty and devotion to one's country above any selfish aims or ambitions.

The need for a united Nation devoid of any partisan motives was never more apparent as we face the future with our problem of providing an adequate national defense.

What we need is more enthusiasm and zeal for Americanism. If the dictator nations can muster loyalty and enthusiasm for their lustful regimes, what is there to prevent America from casting off her lukewarm attitude and experiencing a revitalization of American principles and ideals?

The crying need of the hour is for every American, regardless of race, creed, or social position, to be inspired by the courage and fortitude of these brave patriots whose names are indelibly inscribed on our hearts and whose memory is a benediction. They met the acid test of patriotism at Valley Forge, Gettysburg, Antietam; San Juan, and in Flanders Field. They were unafraid and glorious in their victories.

We fellow-Americans may have honest differences of opinion in regard to many questions, but there can be no compromise on the fundamental principles of unity, loyalty, and love of country. The tolerance of the American people as a Nation has been seized upon by un-American groups to promote their own programs of hate and oppression.

In the name of our martyred dead, let us as Americans address ourselves to these alien parasites in our midst and in unmistakable terms serve notice that their presence here among a free people will not be countenanced. Let the Communist return to Russia and face the secret trial and consignment to an unmarked grave by the light of the moon. Let the Nazi, Fascist, and their kind return to the fatherland where the principles of human liberty have been discarded and where no man dare call his soul his own.

We should unite in supporting a mass movement to provide the means of transportation to these base ingrates who while enjoying the blessings and privileges of America are in the same breath laboring incessantly to uproot and destroy every vestige of liberty and freedom.

Let them demonstrate their sincerity for Godless Russia and Nazi Germany by departing from our shores, and every loyal American will utter a prayer of thanksgiving.

In similar fashion, we should hold in contempt the "lukewarm" American. To him the day of reckoning has arrived and he must remove his cloak and stand revealed in his true light as a spineless ingrate and one who accepts the blessings of American citizenship with no thought of assuming its duties and obligations.

Ladies and gentlemen, we as a nation have been indicted as being patriotically lazy and accused of being our own worst enemy. Today we are divided as a nation, in thought and in action, which, as I have already pointed out, presents a fertile field for the sowing of the seeds of false political philosophies.

If we are to meet such a challenge, we must wholeheartedly adopt the slogan—America for Americans—and let such a slogan be on the lips of every school child, preached from the pulpits of the Nation, and inscribed on every heart.

We can pay no greater tribute to the martyrs of our Nation on this Memorial Day, nor can we make a greater contribution to the welfare of our country, than to resolve as we stand within the portals of this historic battleground that we will truly evaluate the manifold blessings bestowed upon us by citizenship in this great republic.

Let us carry aloft the torch of freedom and, in so doing, let us march as a united people, asking God to place us in His infinite care and continue to shower us with His choice blessings of peace and happiness.

From grateful hearts let us pour forth our prayers of thanksgiving for the American way of life and beseech God to preserve our great republic for the countless unborn millions to follow us.

In the same breath let us in prayerful attitude ask Divine Providence to restore peace and tranquillity to the nations of the world that in so doing we may again look upon civilization as being rescued from the onslaughts of those who would destroy it.

With such an objective and with faith in the future let us say from the depth of our hearts—

Thank God! I am an American.

June 14, Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM T. KERR, NATIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FLAG DAY ASSOCIATION

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, while I was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, I was the author of the bill making Flag Day, June 14, a legal holiday in the State of Pennsylvania—Pennsylvania being the first State in the Union to honor Old Glory legally. Among our most loyal Americans interested in this legislation in the State of Pennsylvania was William T. Kerr, founder and national president of the American Flag Day Association. He is also interested in H. R. 2321 and House Resolution 95, bills I introduced in the Seventy-seventh Congress to make Flag Day, June 14, a national legal holiday. I am herewith including in my remarks the address prepared by Mr. Kerr on the birthday of Old Glory.

THE BIRTHDAY OF OLD GLORY—THAT DAY, JUNE 14, SHOULD BE A NATIONAL HOLIDAY—LOYAL AMERICANS URGED TO HELP MOVEMENT TO SET THAT DAY ASIDE FOR NATION-WIDE CELEBRATION IN HONOR OF OUR FLAG

(By William T. Kerr, founder and since 1898 national president of American Flag Day Association)

Birthdays are milestones in our lives. We celebrate joyously if we truly love our parents, the annual return of their birthdays as they—never forgetting us—remember ours. As it is with individuals, so it should be, and usually is, with nations. That is why we especially remember June 14.

WHY JUNE 14 IS FLAG DAY

We call June 14 Flag Day because it is the birthday of Old Glory, the anniversary of the adoption by the Continental Congress, June 14, 1777, of the Stars and Stripes as the emblem of the United States. With that date began the history of our flag as a symbol of our nationality. It has been a legal holiday in Pennsylvania since 1937, but several States now provide for the issuance of a proclamation by Governors asking patriotic observance of Flag Week, June 8 to 14, and especially Flag Day, June 14. Each succeeding year it is becoming the greatest unofficial holiday on our calendar.

FLAG DAY HONORS LIVING AND DEAD

We have, as we should, holidays commemorating certain outstanding American events and birthdays, but when we celebrate Flag Day we not only recall June 14, 1777, when Congress "resolved that the flag of the United States be 13 stripes alternate red and white; that the Union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation," but we honor every known and unknown American, whether high or low, rich or poor, of every race, color, and creed, who, in our country's battles, helped keep our flag unashamed, and we also honor those whose battles for civic righteousness have won unheralded victories in peace. It is honorable for one to be willing to die, if need be, for one's country, but we need today, more than ever, Americans who will truly live for our Nation that our free institutions may not perish through treachery within or from assault without.

EVERYONE FAVORS FLAG DAY

There may be differences of opinion among some classes of our people regarding the observance of certain holidays or special days, in honor of noted statesmen, soldiers, or others, or of special events, for the human mind is critical; probably we could not get a unanimous voice on the merits of anyone or anything; but there is scarcely a doubt that every true American will unite in the view that our own emblem—the Stars and Stripes—is deserving of every tribute, because our flag represents all of us without regard to age, rank, sex, race, color, or creed, for all the institutions of our Republic. As the emblem of our Nation, "your flag and my flag" should be given every honor, be flown from every flag pole, at schools, homes, stores, in automobiles, and from every point of vantage, and be worn so that all may see we have not forgotten the birthday of our national banner. But the display of our flag means nothing unless our hearts are in and behind it, for in the World War, spies wore and displayed our emblem as a means to accomplish the destruction of American lives and American property.

TO DISPLAY OUR FLAG A SERMON TO THE EYE

If during Flag Week, June 8 to 14, and especially on June 14—Flag Day—we could have a great general display of Old Glory, no matter what the flag's size or cost, it would make such an impression in every community, the moral effect could not be estimated. It would be an unanswerable argument against every foreign "ism." It would preach a sermon to the eye, calling all to reconsecrate themselves to the great principles of our Government.

WHEREVER OLD GLORY FLOATS THERE IS A SHRINE

Flag Day emphasizes that our flag is more than a mere banner which claims power or a great history, though it has both. To every real American our flag is the symbol of all that we are and hope to be; what we are, our flag is. It is an emblem of freedom in its truest sense. No stain has ever marred it; no clouds have dimmed its stars. Its mission is and always has been to champion the cause of the oppressed. Wherever Old Glory floats there is a shrine, and it is the only flag in all the world's history which has never bowed in defeat.

TRUE AMERICANS

Flag Day calls to all who enjoy the inheritances bequeathed to us by illustrious forefathers that they love our flag, honor and respect our laws and institutions, and help preserve these inheritances unimpaired so that they may be passed on to the generations to follow. Whoever does that, not alone on Flag Day, when bands play and orators inspire, but every day, these are true Americans.

We often speak and talk of Americanization as if it applies only to those who happened to be born outside of the United States. It is not alone the alien who needs Americanization; that is not only for those born across the seas; some of us may need it ourselves, we who were born on American soil.

FORGETTING UNTIL IT IS TOO LATE

One may live so close to the beautiful that it becomes commonplace and unappreciative. Philadelphia has so many patriotic shrines that their importance is sometimes forgotten—perhaps the fact that there Old Glory was born. Some pass Independence Hall and have never stood within its walls and caught the patriotic spirit of the illustrious forefathers who made it possible for all of us to enjoy real liberty, for our Declaration of Independence as they made it was the first solemn declaration of the only legitimate foundation of civil government. It was the cornerstone of a new fabric destined, in God's providence, to cover the surface of the globe. It announced the inalienable sovereignty of the people, and from July 4, 1776, the people of this country were no longer the fragment of an empire—a nation had been born in a day; and until after the close of the recent World War our United States was the only country with a known birthday. All others began they knew not when, and grew into power they knew not how.

Possibly there are some in Pittsburgh and vicinity even living within the shadow of Forts Duquesne and Pitt, where the civilization of America was changed, who have never been within its walls or given thought to those who laid the foundation of Pittsburgh. Some of us take for granted the loving care and affection of our parents to such an extent that we fail to show proper appreciation to them and only discover—when it is too late—when they have passed on to their reward—the great debt we owe them but never could repay.

COMMERCIALIZING THE FLAG

Why is it that many who rarely fly our flag on Flag Day, Memorial Day, Independence, or other days, require the sight of their own sons or husbands, fathers or brothers drafted perhaps in war preparation, marching away to the strains of martial music to become possible cannon fodder, before they raise Old Glory? Why do they not remember to fly their national banner over their homes in peacetime in honor of special American events as an appeal for patriotic national unity? If some thoughtless business concerns make a great display of our flag to draw attention to special sales of socks, shirts, dresses, or suits at bargain prices—commercializing our flag—why do not our citizens generally use it in display to emphasize Americanism as opposed to all isms foreign to the spirit of our American institutions?

BENJAMIN HARRISON AND HENRY WARD BEECHER

Someone charged Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, with being "too sentimental about the flag." In reply, he said, "I will not enter any defense; God pity the American citizen who does not love it, who does not see in it the story of our great free institutions and the hope of the home as well as the Nation." One of my special memories is of having lunched and talked with this great, God-fearing, patriotic American. In 1861 Henry Ward Beecher said, "Accept our flag in all its fullness of meaning. It is not a painted rag. It is a whole national history. It is the Constitution. It is the Government. It is the Nation."

LET'S FLY OUR FLAG EVERYWHERE ON FLAG DAY

Last year I urged a great national display of our flag during Flag Week, June 8 to 14, but especially on Flag Day, as a protest against every form of intolerance, hate, and bigotry, and as an appeal for true Americanism—it was done in many communities—and the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, in a leaded editorial, said, "It seems to us that a great display of countless American flags throughout the Nation on Flag Day would, as Mr. Kerr suggests, do more to combat 'isms' than a thousand sermons." I repeat that request now and urge all teachers and directing heads of schools everywhere to emphasize it in their own practical way. No one can estimate what results may be secured through patriotic influence of teachers upon their pupils and through the pupils reaching their families.

NO DIVIDED LOYALTY

As we celebrate Flag Day we say to everyone that there must be no divided loyalty of citizenship; that nothing will be accepted but an unqualified, unreserved wholehearted allegiance to our Republic, that no citizen can or should have or hold any mental reservations of allegiance to any other earthly power, for there is a present demand for a strong crusade for true, sturdy Americanism. No nation can exist part loyal and part disloyal. We cannot afford to permit any class to cherish fealty to an alien land, to put foreign ties above American citizenship, to be supported in prosperity from our veins while they repay us with venomous poison. There are isms in our midst which would destroy our Republic if they could, whose leaders and teachers have no place here. Our national reins should be drawn tighter, and they and all others like them should be deported.

NO ROOM HERE FOR FOREIGN COLONIES

The birthday of Old Glory means that its sheltering folds are only for freedom-loving people who come here to be one with and of us, that others must not attempt to build foreign colonies or establish foreign groups on our soil and maintain their foreign customs. We are trying now to Americanize those who are in our midst, and their sincerity will be proven by the progress they make in dispensing with their foreign languages and their foreign-language newspapers, which more frequently than otherwise keep alive foreign languages, customs, and habits of the land from whence they came. Go into some self-made foreign districts and you will find growing up in our midst even native-born Americans of foreign-born parents who were born and are being reared in as distinctly a foreign atmosphere as if they were in Europe or Asia. This ought not to be and would not be if they would use the language of our Nation and the story of Old Glory.

OUR FLAG AND CONSTITUTION

As one strong feature of a flag day, Americanization programs, let me suggest here that where it is not now carried out in a practical, thorough manner it would be well if all our public, private, parochial schools, colleges, and universities added to their "must" list of studies the study of our Constitution under sincere, patriotic men and women. Thus they will reach millions in taking our Constitution to the people through the youth of our land. Teach them what the bulwark of our liberties, the Constitution, and our flag, the emblem of our Nation, really means, and we need not fear the results, for, grounded in a living faith in our Republic, these boys and girls will become the stalwart, four-square American citizens of tomorrow, the pride and defense of our great Nation. Educators, here is your opportunity.

WHAT WE ARE "OLD GLORY" IS

On Flag Day and every day let us not forget that our flag is the symbol of American ideals and principles, and represents all our people. Let us tell its history and redouble our efforts, especially among the rising generations, to teach reverence for our flag, our laws, and our institutions. We are the makers of our flag, what we are "Old Glory" is. We should fly it on Flag Day, and other days also, as evidence that we truly value our citizenship and to arouse in others a sense of gratitude and thankfulness for the blessings we have and enjoy because we live in free America. We should do this without selfish boasting as we see the rise of totalitarian states, dictatorships, and diminishing power of democracies abroad under the heel of pagan intolerance. Here, because the great mass of our people are God-fearing, we have liberty, freedom, and constitutional democracy, making us the greatest republic of all times. But what of the future? What about your children and mine, our grandchildren, the Americans of tomorrow? Let us resolve to preserve it as our forefathers willed it and enshrine the love for our flag, our Nation, and American institutions in all our hearts in consecrated, loyal, unselfish service to God and country.

MAKE FLAG DAY JUNE 14 FLAG DAY EVERY DAY

All of us in our school days were stirred with pride when we recited Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty or give me death" but reviewing the history of our Nation and knowing that the only hope for the permanence of our Republic is a devotion to our institutions, and undivided loyalty and a unity of spirit, I am convinced that Patrick Henry's greatest patriotic legacy to us was in the speech when he said in the Continental Congress, "I am not a Virginian, I am an American"—and when the day comes that all of our people of whatever race, color, or creed no matter where they were born, abroad or in this country, declare sincerely and by deed and action say, "I am an American" all these "isms" which trouble us today will vanish. Make Flag Day June 14 flag day every day in the hearts and affections of all our people. Let these words be the prayer of every American:

OUR PRAYER

"God of our Fathers whose almighty hand
Leads forth in beauty all the starry band
Of shining worlds in splendor through the skies
Our grateful songs before Thy throne arise.

"Thy love divine has lead us in the past
In this free land by Thee our lot is cast;
Be Thou our ruler, guardian, guide, and stay,
Thy word our law, Thy paths our chosen way.

"From war's alarms, from deadly pestilence,
Be Thy strong arm our ever sure defense;
Thy true religion in our hearts increase,
Thy bounteous goodness nourish us in peace.

"Refresh Thy people on their toilsome way,
Lead us from night to never-ending day,
Fill all our lives with love and grace divine,
And glory, laud, and praise be ever Thine."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, the Territory of Colorado was admitted into the Union as a State on the 1st day of August 1876. The State elected a legislature that fall, and on November 14, 1876, that legislature elected our first two United States Senators—Henry M. Teller, for whom Teller County was named; and Jerome B. Chaffee, for whom Chaffee County was named. The legislature elected Teller for both a short and a long term, and Chaffee for the short term which ended March 3, 1879. Congress that year met on December 4, 1876. Both of those men were sworn in and officially took their seats at that time.

After the death of President Garfield on September 19, 1881, Vice President Arthur became President, and on April 17, 1882, he appointed Senator Teller as Secretary of the Interior. Senator Teller then resigned from the Senate, took that appointment, and served as Secretary of the Interior until the end of that Presidential term, March 4, 1885. He had then been reelected again to the United States Senate and resumed his seat in that body on March 4, 1885, and served until March 4, 1909, when he voluntarily retired to private life.

At the Presidential election of 1908, EDWARD T. TAYLOR was elected Congressman at large for Colorado and took his seat in the House on March 4, 1909, the day Senator Teller retired from the Senate. He served 6 years as Congressman at large and, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of politics in Colorado, he has served ever since as the Representative from the Fourth District of Colorado.

Senator Teller's total official service in Washington from our State was 32 years and 3 months. On the 4th day of June this year, Mr. TAYLOR has served in the House 32 years and 3 months. That makes a record of two equal immediately successive services totaling 64 years and 6 months, extending from the year in which our Centennial State was born to this hour.

Teller was "Colorado's grand old man." TAYLOR is "Colorado's grand old man."

United States Air Force

OF
HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

EDITORIALS FROM THE NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM AND THE NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix an editorial from the New York World-Telegram of June 2, 1941, and one from the New York Daily News of June 3, 1941, supporting my contention that a separate air force is necessary for the United States.

The editorials follow:

[From the New York Daily News of June 3, 1941]

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

Air power in the last couple of weeks has been primarily responsible for two first-string victories in this war, one by sea and one by land.

The Germans have taken Crete from the British and the Greeks. They did it almost exclusively with air-borne troops, the British Navy apparently having been able to prevent any important landings of German sea-borne soldiers on Crete.

And the British have sunk the German battleship Bismarck, brand-new, "unsinkable" sea fighter, officially rated at 35,000 tons, but perhaps actually a 50,000-tonner. A British scouting plane spotted the Bismarck after she had sunk H. M. S. Hood; British torpedo planes wounded her, slowed her down, and poured more torpedoes into her before ships of the Royal Navy finished her off.

So it looks as if such prophets as the late Gen. Billy Mitchell and the still active Al Williams weren't so cockeyed as most of us supposed when they first sounded off with predictions that air power was going to be the controlling factor in future wars.

Air power hasn't decided this war as yet. It would be foolish for any nation to abandon battleships, infantry, and artillery and put its entire defense wad on airplanes. But air power has been and is so big a factor in this war that we think the time has come for the United States to adopt the separate-air-force principle.

TOUGH JOB, BUT IT'S NECESSARY

The term "separate air force" doesn't accurately describe what we're talking about.

Actually, our air forces are separate now, in four different ways. They are split around among the Army, Navy, Marines, and Coast Guard. Their flying men are under the thumbs of land soldiers and sea soldiers.

This, according to Mitchell, Williams, and kindred air-power prophets, is dangerous. It is charged that it cuts down both the efficiency and the morale of the air fighters.

Both Germany and Great Britain learned the need of an air force operating under its own command from the last war. Today the Royal Air Force and the Luftwaffe (literal translation "air force," according to the German consulate in New York; pronounced "Looft-woffa," loof to rhyme with hoof) are the two most powerful and efficient air forces in the world.

GIVE THE WINGS A FAIR CHANCE

So we think it is time to pull the air forces out from under the land and sea commands and unify them under a cabinet Secretary of Aviation, Secretary for Air, or some such title.

The term "United States Air Force" would seem to be the simplest and best name for the new outfit, but such details could be decided later.

The main thing is to get this service coordinated under its own air-minded chiefs, it being understood, of course, that the air arm will cooperate whenever and however necessary with the land and sea arms. The argument that such cooperation would be impossible was knocked galley west by the 100-percent cooperation of German planes, tanks, and infantry in Flanders and France, and by the 100-percent cooperation of the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy at Dunkerque.

We should think a new set of ratings and grades, replacing the old sergeants, majors, etc., with titles suggesting air war, would be advisable. The Army-Navy retirement age of 64 would obviously not do for the air force. It would be true economy to retire these men on pension at, say, age 45.

The time to accomplish this reform is now, when we have a lot of pilots training for a rapidly expanding air force.

And the way to accomplish it is for the Government to override the humanly natural protests of the admirals and generals and put this reform into being, with the full backing of the President.

The admirals and generals were powerful enough to block this reform after the previous war. They can be expected to fight it tooth and nail now.

But if we're to have the best air force in the world instead of only the second or third best, it looks as if we've got to follow German and British practice and take the land and sea halters off our flying fighters.

[From the New York World-Telegram of June 2, 1941]

STEPCHILD

It was German air power that made Britain eat dirt at Munich. Later it was the same instrument that pulverized the defenses of Poland, rid the Skagerrak of British sea power while Norway was invaded, broke the backs of Holland, Belgium, and France, and turned British cities into stoneyards.

It was air power again that bullied and bombed the Balkans into submission. It is air power—this time air power alone and unassisted—which has cleared the British out of Crete and which threatens to clear them out of the Mediterranean and the middle east.

It is the threat of German air power to the Western Hemisphere that runs like a refrain through President Roosevelt's speeches. Time and time again he has tolled off the shortening count of bomber hours from Africa and the far Atlantic islands to South America, from South America to the Canal, from the Canal to the heart of the United States.

And it is air power on which this country is concentrating as never before its defense effort.

But here is a thing that is not easy to understand:

In spite of the proven dominance of air power in modern war, in spite of the fact that we are shoveling billions into aircraft production and the training of airmen, military aviation in the United States is still a stepchild.

It is still just a branch of the Army and a branch of the Navy.

It is still under the thumbs of nonflying admirals and generals who, no matter how scrupulously they may seek to keep abreast of strategic innovations, are hogtied by the thongs of tradition, sentiment, and inertia.

It still suffers from the luxurious duplication of Army and Navy air facilities and air missions.

Much has been written about an independent air force for this country. Much has been spoken about it, in whispers, by Army and Navy airmen. But what has been done about it? Nothing. Not a solitary thing.

It seems to us that it is time for somebody—for the President or Congress or the Secretaries of War and the Navy—to seize the initiative and take steps now, at once, toward scrapping our antiquated system and creating a fully independent department for air.

Oh, let the Navy keep its ship-borne aircraft, of course. No advocate of an independent air force has ever proposed depriving the Navy of its floating air arm. Let the Army retain airplanes for reconnaissance work, etc. But put a flying man, with a flying staff, in full command of the great striking air force that is now just a skeleton, but will presently be the first line of our defense.

Canadian Friendship

OF
HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising at this time is to give a background for a letter which I intend to insert in the RECORD. It is a remarkable letter, written by a Canadian to a citizen of the United States. The writer is an executive of the company of J. J. Gibbons, Ltd , an advertising firm. This firm has offices in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton, and Vancouver, and is the largest advertising firm in Canada. It is the business of this company to know the sentiment of the people of Canada. Therefore the writer is particularly well qualified to make observations as to the opinion of the Canadian people. I am sure that all of us will be interested in reading this letter and that we will be happy to learn of the fine feeling of friendship and cordiality that exists on the part of the Canadian people toward our people and our President.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this letter in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

J. J. GIBBONS, LTD.,
Toronto 2, Ontario, May 28, 1941.

H. A. DUDLEY, ESQ.,
Bureau of Public Relations,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DUDLEY: I have happy recollections of the courtesy and kindness you extended to me when I called on you in Chicago at the request of Messrs. Townsend & Townsend some 3 or 4 years ago. Because of those happy memories and the fact that Canada is most seriously engaged in the present war, I was very much interested to note that you have received leave of absence from the William Wrigley, Jr., Co. to assist

Maj. Gen. Robert C. Richardson, Jr., Director of the Bureau of Public Relations for the War Department.

From what I know of you and from what I gleaned when I had the pleasure of meeting you personally, the Bureau is to be congratulated. I wish you a large measure of success in your new position.

I wonder if you know how grateful Canadians are to your President and you wonderfu' people of the United States for the encouragement and the support you are giving to our Empire at this time. We have a long, grim job on our hands, and we realize to the full how much we are dependent upon the United States if final victory is to be ours.

I think, perhaps, more Canadians listened to your great President's epoch-making address last night than have ever listened to a radio address before.

We know that there are differences of opinion in the United States regarding Mr. Roosevelt, but I think, perhaps, that that may be because of political differences; but so far as Canadians are concerned, we are unanimous in the view that he is not only one of the greatest statesmen the United States has ever produced but one of the greatest statesmen the world has ever produced.

And so we say, thank God for Roosevelt and the American people, for their grand cooperation and their priceless assistance.

With most cordial regards and all good wishes, believe me to be, my dear Mr. Dudley,

Sincerely yours,

R. A. STAPELLS.

W. P. A. Achievements

REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. ELIOT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. ELIOT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when we are urged to cut nondefense expenditures people usually mention the W. P. A. They suggest that we reduce relief costs by drastically reducing the W. P. A.

They do not seem to realize two important facts. First, W. P. A. has done, is doing, and can do in the future very important defense work. Second, there are still hundreds of thousands of people, perhaps millions, who cannot find work in private industry.

On defense projects, take a glance at W. P. A. achievements. In one State, Massachusetts, over 1,500 acres have been developed or improved for airports, and work now in progress covers 500 more. Twenty mess halls have been constructed; 15 storage buildings have been erected, and 258 repaired.

That is just in Massachusetts. In the Nation, the W. P. A. has responded to the requests of the Army and Navy and has made an excellent record in building necessary roads to military and naval establishments, in completing hundreds of new landing fields, and in erecting buildings of all kinds. Seven hundred and twenty new hangars for airplanes, for instance, have been put up.

Donald M. Nelson, the head of the Purchasing Division of the O. P. M., recently said:

Private employers, although they are eager to cooperate in the great task of national defense, often find it difficult to shift quickly from their regular tasks, to meet the requirements of the Army and Navy. It is in this situation that we have discovered the value of the W. P. A. organization. W. P. A. workers can be quickly turned to defense work.

As for those who are not working on defense projects, can they be allowed to shift for themselves? Many of them are doing highly useful work, even though it is not defense work. Remember that the average age of the W. P. A. worker in the Nation is about 43; in my own county, two-thirds of the W. P. A. workers are over 40 years of age. Private industry is taking on some men over 40, but usually only if they are highly skilled. The other manual workers are not easily absorbed.

As for the white-collar workers and the women—about 20 percent of W. P. A. personnel are women—no great new demand for their services has been made by private industry.

There are, then, hundreds of thousands of needy people doing valuable defense work; other hundreds of thousands of needy people gainfully employed who, but for W. P. A., would be idle "welfare cases" in their local communities. And there are still others who are on local relief because the W. P. A. appropriation now is not big enough to employ them all.

To cut the W. P. A. would be to throw a new and heavy financial burden on already burdened localities. Worse, it would be throwing hundreds of thousands of American families back into black despair. To economize this way in the name of defense would be the falsest kind of economy and the worst kind of defense.

Dangers Within Rather Than Dangers Without

REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, as a nation we have become so engrossed in watching the black war clouds which have gathered beyond the seas that we have failed to take due note of the cyclone which threatens our own fronts. As a result, I believe, of deliberate intent on the part of some of our leaders to "plan it that way," we have become a nation that looks upon and magnifies out of all proportion far-distant dangers, while we fail to perceive real and immediate dangers which threaten our political institutions, our economic and social stability, and our American way of life.

I desire at this time to try to focus the attention of America upon American problems, upon dangers within our own borders, rather than dangers far beyond our borders; to try to point out that the path we are following can lead only to national bankruptcy, a socialized state, to a dictatorship—the very thing we detest and are preparing to fight against 3,000 miles away.

Mr. Speaker, there are two developments of the past 9 years which should alarm every liberty-loving American in this broad land of ours. First, political platforms have completely lost all semblance of honesty and integrity. Political promises by leading candidates of both parties have lost all vestige of sincerity. "Weasel words," a term coined by Theodore Roosevelt, are the words of the day. The people are deceived not by silence, but by too many words—by an avalanche of language.

Mr. Speaker, words were evolved—language grew out of the need of men to communicate with each other honestly. Language came out of a necessity for men to exchange their ideas frankly. The world has witnessed in the last decade a complete change in the use and purpose of language. Words are used today not to reveal but to conceal the motives and purposes of rulers and administrators. This has been true in Europe. It has been all too sadly true in the United States of America. No one can deny that the most solemn promises made by candidates of both parties for the highest offices in the land were cast aside the moment the election was over. No wonder the people are beginning to lose their faith in the integrity of their political leaders and administrators. Second, there has been created in these United States of America a political-propaganda machine which is the most cleverly devised, the most competently managed, the most completely financed by public funds, and the most thoroughly buttressed by political power of any propaganda machine the world ever knew. That political-propaganda machine, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, represents one of the great dangers that confronts this Nation. It has been carrying on its work under the name of Office of Government Reports. By legislative action it has now been made a permanent part of our Federal set-up.

Mr. Speaker, another great danger that confronts this Nation today is the concentration of power in Washington. More power has been concentrated in the executive department of the Government in Washington since the New Deal took the reins than during the 150 years previous to that time. We have seen one power after another demanded and gained by the President through his powers of patronage, persuasion, and punishment. We have seen every new power granted to the President, along with all of the other powers which had previously been granted, used to bring still new and greater powers to the executive department of the Government from the Congress.

Lest I be accused of partisanship, let me quote to you some of the warnings issued by Thomas Jefferson. Said he:

To preserve the faith of the Nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts, expending the public money with the same care and economy we would practice with our own, and impose on our citizens no unnecessary burden; to keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers and cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of our safety—these are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.

When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated. It will be, as in Europe, where every man must be either pike or gudgeon, hammer or anvil, our functionaries and their wares are from the same workshop, made of the same materials and by the same hand. If the States look with apathy on this silent descent of their Government into the gulf which is to swallow all, we have only to weep over the human character formed uncontrollable, but by a rod of iron, and the blasphemers of man, as incapable of self-government, become his true historians.

* * * You have seen the practices by which the public servants have been able to cover their conduct, or, where that could not be done, delusions by which they have varnished it for the eye of their constituents. What augmentation of the field for jobbing, speculating, plundering, office building, and office hunting would be produced by an assumption of all the State powers into the hands of the General Government.

* * * Our Government is now taking so steady a course as to show by what road it will pass to destruction, to wit by consolidation first, and then corruption, its necessary consequence. The engine of consolidation will be the Federal judiciary, the two other branches the corrupting and corrupted instruments.

Think of Jefferson's words concerning the necessity of administering the public moneys as we would administer our own funds, and then look at the expenditures of the last 8 years, which have exceeded all human comprehension. Just consider for a moment our economic and financial danger. On top of a $50,000,000,000 debt, a $40,000,000,000 defense program is already under way, and another $40,000,000,000 defense program has been planned. We are told by the Secretary of Commerce, the head of the R. F. C., Jesse Jones, that we can expect a Federal debt of at least $90,000,000,000 before this war business is through. I say to you that no man can this day forecast, if we continue the squanderlust road we are now traveling, what the Federal debt may be. It may just as easily be $150,000,000,000. This can mean only inflation or repudiation. It can and will mean economic confusion, chaos and collapse, unless we awaken to the dangers which confront us here at home.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that our Executive Department is infested with Communists and other proponents of alien doctrines who, if they could, would overthrow our American way of life. Who is there here today who can regard with equanimity the sympathy existing between radical labor leaders, communistic labor leaders, labor racketeers, and the New Deal administration? Consider the solicitude of the Secretary of Labor, Madam Perkins, for the alien Harry Bridges, agitator of the shipping strikes on the west coast. Think of the great motor industry being confronted by demands from unions headed by the Communist Walter Reuther, whose record in the files of the Congressional Committee Investigating Un-American Activities clearly shows him to be a Communist, sympathetic with the Third International and intent upon destroying the American system of free enterprise and free industry. Think of men like John Brophy serving on the Mediation Board, before which Walter Reuther's automobile workers' union was making demands upon the General Motors Corporation. Who is John Brophy? John L. Lewis, in describing this same John Brophy and two others in Senate Document No. 24, says they are—

Fakirs, repudiated leaders, traitors to the unions, opportunists, and purveyors of every falsehood, slander, and deception.

In the United Mine Workers' Journal, the leadership of Brophy and others was characterized as—

Doing its dirtiest to capture the United Mine Workers and to transform this splendid union into a Communist organization.

This is the John Brophy who sat on the Mediation Board that decided the dispute between the communistic Walter Reuther and his C. I. O. Automobile Workers' Union and the General Motors Corporation. In the name of our forefathers, can there not be found among 130,000,000 Americans enough men to fill the panels on the Mediation Board in this hour of the Nation's dire peril without calling upon these Communists to assume places of power and control in the defense movement?

Mr. Speaker, what this Nation needs today—and sadly needs—are fewer of these labor racketeers and power-lustful self-seekers, and more labor leaders of the type of the late Samuel Gompers and the late John Mitchell, and also more Victor Olanders and John P. Freys. These are the men who played such a constructive part in the last World War. Those are the labor leaders who led the patriotic rank and file of American working men and women to their workbenches to meet the Nation's need. The rank and file of workers today are not being led to their work benches but away from them. When they cannot be enticed or persuaded by these racketeers, these extortionists, these Communists and Fascists to leave their workbenches, they are terrorized into leaving them while picket lines are established and strikes threaten the success of our national-defense efforts.

There is a very strange—and to me as yet unexplained—discrepancy between the statements of the administration as to the dire necessity for our national defense and the failure of the administration to curb strikes which admittedly are endangering that national defense. It is admitted, even by labor leaders themselves, that there is no excuse for permitting jurisdictional strikes to endanger the security of this Nation, the very lives of the men, women, and children of this country, simply because some officers of some unions cannot agree as to who shall have jurisdiction over what work. These jurisdictional fights have nothing whatever to do with wages or hours or working conditions. They are simply disputes between two private organizations.

Mr. Speaker, if the perils of this Nation are one-half what the administration insists they are, if the danger that confronts us is one-half as serious as the administration insists that it is, if the urgency to complete our national defense is one-half as great as the administration says it is, then there is not time enough for 1 hour to be lost through strikes.

Labor disputes can be mediated. They can be settled by arbitration. The workingmen can lose nothing, and neither can the employers, by continuing the work while disputes are being settled by mediation and arbitration, because the decisions can be made retroactive to any agreed date. In spite of that, labor leaders have refused time and again to submit to any delay before calling the men out and before establishing picket lines in defense industries.

Unless this Nation wants to go down the same road which France went to her ruin, then it behooves us to put a stop to these strikes and to make the people realize that their security is paramount to the individual interests of any employer or any labor leaders.

Understand me, Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with honest wage earners who are members of unions. My quarrel is with labor leaders who, for personal profit or power, are willing to mislead the wage earners into striking against the Government in the national defense. Any strike against any contractor engaged on national-defense work is a strike against the national defense and against the security of every man, woman, and child in this Nation. These Communists and Fascists and professional labor agitators should be weeded out and thrown out of every industry that is engaged in national defense. They have no place at this hour in our industrial scheme of things. There is a place in the national defense only for good Americans who desire first and foremost to help to build for this Nation a national defense which will make it invincible against any nation, or any group of nations, who may choose to attempt aggression against us at any time in the future.

I do not hold with those who believe there is a difference between the devotion to duty to be expected of the boy who is drafted into the Army at $21 per month and the devotion to duty to be expected of the mechanic who is deferred from the draft in order to do essential defense work at twelve to fourteen dollars per day. I find it very difficult indeed, Mr. Speaker, to reconcile two statements made by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, one found in the New York Herald Tribune of February 25, 1941, issued in a press conference. Mrs. Roosevelt, at that time, said that certain draftees in Army camps were refusing to accept the seriousness of America's position today and urged that they be made to think of their training as something they may have to use. Keeping that statement in mind, just try to reconcile it with her later statement of April 1, 1941, that strikes in defense industries should not be looked upon as indicating a lack of patriotism on the part of labor. In that statement she advised the public not to become "overexcited" about delay in defense orders due to disputes between employers and labor, stating that "labor disputes should still be regarded as disagreements between two groups trying to get just returns for what they are doing." She said, "We should not behave as though this were a case of patriotism." This is typical of the administration's attitude toward the boys who have been impressed into the Army at $21 per month, while other men have been leading honest American labor away from its patriotic and necessary task of building the national defense. I want to say, in reply to Mrs. Roosevelt, if it is true that the soldiers in the Army should be made to think of their training as something they may have to use, then it should be equally true that these men who have been deferred from military service to work in the jobs to help build the national defense, these labor racketeers who are taking advantage of this hour to line their pockets and to clothe themselves with power at the expense of the national defense had better be made to think of the national defense as something we may have to use, too.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a third aspect to our national situation that seriously disturbs me. I know it is regarded as some sort of treachery, or Benedict Arnold stuff, to mention it now, but we have not forgotten the attempt of the administration not so long ago to pack the Supreme Court and the rest of the Federal judiciary by an act of Congress. The mutations of time and human frailties have operated to enable the President to place on both the Supreme Bench and on most of the inferior benches men of his choosing, and men who apparently are disposed to interpret the Constitution in much the same manner as Mr. Roosevelt himself interprets it.

Mr. David Lawrence, the columnist, has written several articles along this line, and, among other things, he points out that "One of the principal obstacles to national unity is the widespread distrust of the new dealers who are conducting the defense program." This would include Harry Hopkins, who managed the notorious Chicago convention. It would also include the more radical new dealers, such as Leon Henderson; Sidney Hillman; Ben Cohen; "Tommy the Cork," otherwise known as Thomas Corcoran; Samuel Rosenman; and the "hot dog" boys.

Says Mr. Lawrence further:

The New Deal behavior from day to day constitutes an impetus to the membership efforts of the America First Committee, because there are tens of thousands of Americans who are more fearful of totalitarianism at home than they are of a Hitler invasion, and the New Deal is doing very little to remove these fears. In fact, the decisions of Messrs. Frankfurter, Black, Douglas, Reed, and Murphy, who control the Supreme Court, are increasing the suspicions and apprehensions of liberals who do not favor government by totalitarian-minded commissions and boards.

What can Congress do about it? For one thing, it can amend and clarify any legislation which the New Deal Court attempts to define as it pleases. Thus, instead of allowing Justice Frankfurter to say what he thinks Congress meant, or permitting him to supply words that are not in a statute, the Congress can do its own legislating—that is, if Congress is still an independent body. And if the Democratic majority refuses, the Republicans can carry the issue to the polls, which is what a minority party is supposed to do.

Mr. Speaker, we have seen the trend toward war step by step for many, many months. I do not intend to take time here today to detail those steps. They have been set out in newspapers from time to time, and any one of my colleagues may, if he or she desires, have the Congressional Library Legislative Reference Service or some other research bureau of the Government furnish a list of these steps as they were taken chronologically.

Today we are hearing demands for the President to invoke the industrial mobilization plan. The industrial mobilization plan, as originally conceived and written, was not only to perform an educational function by being so publicized as to warn the people of the tremendous restrictions on their liberties which another war would entail, but that plan was also designed to place the control and direction of the national defense in the hands of the responsible, experienced, and trained officers of the Army and Navy, whose duty it is to defend the Nation. This plan has been revised from time to time, and the result is that today the industrial mobilization plan is not the same as was originally proposed.

As I see it, the various powers to be conferred upon the Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the Nation—the President—under the industrial mobilization plan were to be conferred only when there came an emergency due to the imminence of war. The President has now proclaimed a full emergency. Well, Mr. Speaker, heaven knows the Nation has been full of emergencies ever since the New Deal came into power.

Now, let me read to you something that appears in the 1936 and 1939 revisions of the mobilization plan that did not appear in any of the plans as revised previous to the advent of the New Deal administration:

TITLE II. INDUSTRIAL MANAGEMENT PROVISIONS

This title may be cited as the "Industrial Management Act."

The President is hereby authorized, when, in his opinion, the successful prosecution of war so requires or renders advisable, to require, under such rules and regulations as he may establish, the registration of all or any class of persons engaged in the management or control of any technical, industrial, or manufacturing plant, or establishment of any kind whatsoever, whatever the form of ownership thereof, corporate or otherwise, or who have been engaged in such capacity within 6 months prior to any declaration of war.

STATUS OF REGISTRANTS

Whenever the President shall, in his discretion, deem any technical, industrial, or manufacturing plant or establishment or any group thereof comprising an industry to be essential to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of the national interest, during the emergency, he may proclaim such plant, establishment, or industry so to be. Thereupon any person registered pursuant to the provisions of this title shall, if within a classification promulgated by the President in his said proclamation, be brought into service of the Government for the duration of the war and shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the War Department. The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the government of such persons so brought into the service of the Government. Such rules and regulations by the Secretary of War shall not affect nor interfere with the internal management of the industries in which such persons are engaged, but the Secretary may at any time, if he deem the public interest in successful prosecution of war so to require, remove such person from such industrial position and assign him to any service within the jurisdiction of the said War Department. Upon such removal the vacancy so created shall be filled in the normal manner by the officers or managers of the plant or establishment affected, but the person chosen as such replacement shall immediately be subject to the provisions of this title.

LIMITATION OF INCOME—PENALTIES

No person brought into the service of the Government pursuant to the provisions of this title shall at any time receive any salary, gift, compensation, or other emolument whatsoever, either directly or indirectly, for services rendered during wartime from any plant or establishment for or in which such person shall render services during time of war. Such person shall receive for services rendered during time of war only such compensation and allowances as shall be fixed and paid by the President. If any such person does receive any salary or compensation from any other source for services rendered during wartime he shall be dishonorably discharged from the service of the War Department and shall in addition thereto be guilty of a felony and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, do my colleagues realize what this means? It means that the President, under the powers of the mobilization plan, could remove Henry Ford, or Edsel Ford, or the president of the General Motors Corporation, or the head of any other industry, from the management of his industry, and put him to peeling potatoes in some kitchen at whatever compensation the President should prescribe. Under those proposed powers, Mr. Speaker, the President could take anybody, from the foreman of a plant to the owner of it, or the manager, big or little, industrial or agricultural, draft him into the services of the War Department without any reference to his age or his physical condition, and then put him back to work managing his own business at $30 per month. That is one of the powers which we must guard against if we want to perpetuate Constitutional Government in this fair land of ours.

Let me read something else that appeared in the 1939 revision of the mobilization plan, and this was the reason, in my opinion, the President transformed the industrial mobilization plan from a public document into a "secret" document. Section "F—Post War Readjustment," reads:

This plan contemplates that the proposed coordinating agencies will be temporary in nature, and that they will be demobilized upon the termination of the emergency.

This plan takes cognizance of the fact, however, that although winning the war is of primary importance, postwar rehabilitation is a very important secondary wartime consideration. During the course of a national emergency therefore, the War Resources Administration will undoubtedly give proper weight to rehabilitation factors in formulation of its wartime policies. In fact, the War Resources Administrator, as the termination of the emergency is approached, might well study the desirability of proposing the creation of a new and entirely separate agency to deal with the rehabilitation problem. In event of the creation of such an agency during the national emergency, contact with the War Resources Administration might be provided through the Liaison Division of the latter agency.

On the other hand, it may be considered advisable, upon the termination of the emergency, to continue the War Resources Administration as a postwar readjustment agency. Decision as to the organization and composition of such an agency will depend upon personalities, the degree of rehabilitation required, and political and economic factors which would then obtain. Decision must therefore be deferred until controlling conditions are known or can fairly accurately be forecast. The important consideration for the purposes of this plan is that due consideration must be given the problem of postwar readjustment.

Mr. Speaker, consider this last provision in the light of the industrial management provision I read just before it. We cannot close our eyes to the plain implications of these paragraphs. Here are laid the foundations for an absolute military despotism in this Nation. Here are laid the foundations for the continuation of that military despotism for an indefinite period after the emergency has ended.

Who is to decide the period necessary for the readjustment to a peacetime basis? The Chief Executive. Who is to decide what is necessary for the rehabilitation of the Nation after the war is ended? The Chief Executive. Who will continue to wield these despotic powers provided for in the industrial mobilization plan after the war? The Chief Executive. Who will continue to wield those powers until such time as he shall voluntarily return them to the Congress? The Chief Executive. Who, Mr. Speaker, can point out one single major power that Mr. Roosevelt has ever gotten at the hands of this Congress, that he has ever returned to the Congress and the people?

Another phase of this whole situation gravely disturbs me. I believe it ought to be brought point blank to the attention of the American people, regardless of whether the administration should try to visit punishment upon those of its critics who dare to say these things. The point is the administration's inclination to use all of these powers against businessmen but not against labor racketeers. We cannot win wars that way. We must be unbiased and impartial in the use of the vast powers of the Government during this emergency.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no man or woman can look at this situation honestly and clearly, and not realize the implication in the course of action followed by the administration ever since the election last November. We must all be disturbed by the brazen and scornful abandonment of the "short of war" slogan, which we heard so much about before the election and which we now have seen cast aside since the election.

Truly, indeed, as David Lawrence has said:

> One of the principal obstacles to the national unity is the widespread distrust of the new dealers who are conducting the defense program.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced by information that has come to me, and by my study and observation of the developments as they have come along, that our gravest danger, the gravest threat to our American Government and way of life, and the greatest menace to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights exist here at home, within our own borders. Some danger may lie across the seas for us, but our most immediate danger lies closer home. Some economic threat may exist in Europe, or the Orient, but our most serious economic threat exists within our own Nation. I want to urge every American man and woman to be alert to the dangers which menace us; to see to it that we do not slip down into the abyss which Thomas Jefferson said would engulf the States if they were not watchful against the dangers of centralized government.

I cannot get away from the warning voiced by Abraham Lincoln when he said:

> At what point shall we expect the approach of danger? By what means shall we fortify against it? Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth—our own excepted—in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years. * * *
> At what point, then, is the danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen, we must live through all time or die by suicide.

Mr. Speaker, we should take Abraham Lincoln's warnings to heart now. We should maintain that vigilance which is ever the price of liberty among free men.

Memorial Day has come and gone. We have paid a tribute of tears and flowers to our honored and beloved dead, who have offered upon the altar of their country their all, who have made the supreme sacrifice that our American way of life should be maintained and perpetuated. The cemeteries of this great, free country of ours are filled with flags and blossoms, but recently placed upon the graves of our noble dead, who died that we and those who come after us might know the sweetness of life under the liberties and privileges of this free Nation. During these days we should especially remember these sacrifices. Let us look for inspiration as well as for warning to the words which Lincoln spoke on November 19, 1863, when he said:

> Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.
> Now we are engaged in a great civil war; testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.
> But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the New York State Federation of Labor. I consider a letter from the New York State Federation of Labor of such importance that I am placing it in the RECORD so that the entire membership of the Congress may be informed on the question discussed:

NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Albany, N. Y., May 29, 1941.

To the Chairman and Members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

HONORABLE SIRS: The New York State Federation of Labor through its executive council has given careful consideration to and has endorsed the proposal for additional taxation to be levied on the proceeds of radio broadcasting entertainment submitted to your committee by the International Allied Printing Trades Association. This proposal provides for an excise tax on the gross incomes of licensed radio broadcasters and for a transfer tax on profits realized from the sale of Government broadcasting licenses.

We are convinced that this proposal is sound and that it will effectively serve to promote the public interest as indicated by the reasons set forth in the factual data submitted for your consideration by Mr. John B. Haggerty, president of the International Allied Printing Trades Association The facts thereby disclosed show:

That radio broadcasting is the only commercially operated entertainment business in the United States upon which no amusement tax has been levied and, therefore, under a monopolistic protectorate of Government licensing, contributes nothing in the form of amusement taxes levied on every other form of competing, commercially operated entertainment business.

That this form of commercialized entertainment derives the bulk of its revenue from radio-advertising sponsors; that it yields excessive profits inconsistently high compared with invested capital and valuation of physical properties; that these excessive profits are also enjoyed by radio-advertising agencies by reason of a system of rebates which are detrimental to recognized fair trade practices.

That the excessive profits of the radio-advertising business has had a serious adverse effect upon the newspaper and magazine business of America, narrowing its field and causing many suspensions and consolidations of printed publications, thereby greatly reducing the number of employment opportunities and the earnings of printing-trades artisans and mechanics, contrasted by failure to offset these economic losses by providing a comparable number of other job opportunities or an equivalent compensating distribution of purchasing power.

Such a situation, if permitted to continue without requisite Government intervention, will, in the opinion of the New York State Federation of Labor, place the Federal Government in the position of having failed in the proper exercise of its police power to prevent unfair competition and trade practices which are detrimental to the freedom of the press and the opportunities essential to the survival of that cherished free American institution. Inadequately regulated, this present situation has resulted in the enrichment of concentrated commercial interests, whose contribution to the expense of government is disproportionately small in comparison with its profits and which, on the other hand, has militated detrimentally against the most crying need of our country—increased opportunities for economic independence in the field of free public enterprise, that basic essential to the success of our democratic economy.

We believe that situations such as this should, by appropriate Government action and regulation, be turned into an economic asset for the public benefit. Our salvation and the survival of our economy does not depend upon unchecked inordinate prosperity of a few at the expense of the many. More unemployment and continued reduction of earnings of large numbers of individuals militates against the Government by reducing its income and increasing its expenses by reason of Government's obligation to care for the unemployed. The problems and responsibilities of our Government require that there be larger numbers able to pay taxes.

Therefore, we are in favor of the proposals submitted by the International Allied Printing Trades Association to which we respectfully urge you to give your careful and serious consideration.

Sincerely yours,

NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
THOMAS J. LYONS, President.
E. W. EDWARDS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

National Youth Administration in Virginia

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I had prepared by the National Youth Administration a statement which gives, year by year, the amount of funds spent by the N. Y. A. in the State of Virginia, and a complete summary of its activities. We are all proud of the record the N. Y. A. has made in my State. Its out-of-school work and student-work programs have created hope and planted security in the breasts of thousands of our youth. In bringing the Government home to our boys and girls we are not only helping them but strengthening our Government. The programs are making it possible for thousands of our boys and girls to better their conditions, thus enabling them to develop into better citizens. Then, too, in bringing these boys and girls to a realization that they are really a part of this Government, that the Government is actually being administered in their behalf, you create loyalty and love of country and a reverence for our democratic institutions.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include the statement above referred to, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, permit me to give a few concrete examples of just what this program is doing:

SECOND-CLASS MECHANIC

John J. Verser, an orphan from Crewe, Va., had to leave high school at the end of 1 year due to financial difficulties. He was enrolled at the N. Y. A. project at Manassas in October 1938 and worked in electricity.

Upon leaving the project he went to work in the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Corporation as a sheet metal worker's helper. Within 6 weeks he was giving rating of second-class mechanic and has progressed steadily since that time.

This young man did not have the opportunity common to most young men, as he was an orphan with five of his brothers and sisters to support. Much of his life was spent in the Presbyterian Orphanage in Lynchburg. The opportunity given him at the project was the first real chance he had ever had offered him and he proved his ability admirably.

PLUMBING

Albert Groves, from Bealton, Va., was a high-school graduate. He entered the project March 31, 1938, and remained until June 1, 1939, and was above average in both work and attitude. He was a willing worker and always trying to improve his knowledge of his trade.

Upon completing his training he secured employment with the Langslow Plumbing & Heating Co., Newport News, Va., at a weekly wage of $25. He is now employed as a machinist-plumber at the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Corporation.

PAINTING

Alvinza B. Jeffers is of an excellent but poor family. His mother died when he was 5 and his father was partially, but permanently, disabled. Alvinza managed to get through high school by the odd-job route.

For 2 years after high school he worked at various jobs. His highest pay was $12 per week and the lowest $3. Jeffers enrolled at the N. Y. A. project on October 11, 1938, and took the painting course. He was an average student and completed his training on November 7, 1939. He was then employed as a painter, second class, at the Newport News shipyard. Through diligent application he is now a timekeeper in the paint shop. His salary is $35 per week, and he is now able to contribute to the support of his disabled father.

CARPENTRY

Kent Loving, of Salem, Va., entered the project in September 1938 and enrolled in the carpentry shop.

His father was dead and his mother a W. P. A. worker. Kent was forced to leave school in the eighth grade in order to make his own living.

During his time at the project he was outstanding in studies and manipulative skill, and an excellent draftsman. He was also a leader among the other boys.

At the end of his year's training he went to work for the Hampton Lumber Co., Hampton, Va., where he is now employed as millwork foreman.

SHEET-METAL WORKER

Homer R. Rose, Hansonville, Va., went to Fort Eustis in April 1940 to take a course in sheet-metal work. This boy's father is a farmer, and the total yearly income for the family was only $250 at the time his application was taken.

In February 1941 Homer left Manassas, where he had been transferred, to accept a job at the Norfolk Navy Yard as a sheet-metal worker.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I want to pay my respects to Mr. Aubrey Williams, N. Y. A. Administrator. Because his heart is in the work, he is putting the program over in a fine way. I am sure the people down in my State appreciate the splendid public service he is rendering. And I also want to pay my respects to the administrative officers and their assistants in the State of Virginia. Without exception, they have been carefully and wisely selected and are rendering outstanding service.

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, those who advocate the closed shop should be extremely proud of the success of their plan. In this article it is stated that on a $30,000,000 project for the Government in Ohio the unions are now collecting from 6,000 laboring men $19 each.

Laborers seeking work, desiring to serve their Nation by way of national defense, on this $30,000,000 arsenal, will pay more than $100,000 for the privilege of serving their country.

This Congress should be anything but proud of its participation by way of inaction in this graft racket, which is only made possible by our failure to act, by our failure to insist upon that equality of opportunity which the President said must be established throughout the world, but which he, in America, although charged with the enforcement of the law, fails to maintain.

This story from the Cleveland News of Monday, June 2, should be read by every Member of the House, who, after reading it, should take counsel with his conscience and consider once again the question of whether this Congress is performing its full duty toward the American laboring man:

[From the Cleveland News of June 2, 1941]

UNION ASKS $19, TAKES NO BACK TALK, FOR ARSENAL JOBS

(By Randall Brown)

RAVENNA, OHIO.—It's business-agents-as-usual here at the Army's $30,000,000 arsenal, in spite of the unlimited national emergency proclaimed by President Roosevelt.

Lt. Col. R. S. Chavin is official commander of this mammoth shell-loading plant under construction. But a handful of A. F. of L. business agents have a lot to say about the work under progress here.

I got a job on the 30,000-acre Army reservation as the lowest of all laborers—smashing stone with a 12-pound sledge hammer.

Before I could lift my hammer once to do my bit toward speeding American defense, I had to sign an agreement to say $19 initiation and dues to the A. F. of L. International Hod Carriers', Building and Common Laborers' Union.

"GOOD TIME TO GET OUT"

"Now, if this isn't agreeable to you all," Kenneth Statler, the union's business agent, told a group of 50 newly hired laborers, "now is a damned good time to get out."

White and colored, young and old, we stood in line inside the Hunkin-Conkey Construction Co. employment offices at the main entrance of the arsenal, listening to Statler.

"And another thing," he added. "If there is any one of you that doesn't believe in American ideals, now is also a damned good time to get out—before you go to work."

At this a young man, second in line in front of me, muttered:

"What does he mean—American ideals? Paying $19 into his blankety-blank union?"

"POOR SUCKER" LOSES CHANCE

This touched off an argument and a brief scuffle which ended with the young man, a fellow with wavy black hair who said he was a member of the A. F. of L. Bartenders' Union, being escorted off the reservation by an armed guard.

"The poor sucker," somebody said. "He would have had a job if he hadn't squawked."

The argument was between the unlucky work applicant and a Hunkin-Conkey official, each protesting he was "a better union man" than the other. The scuffle occurred when the guard, summoned by the official, grabbed the applicant by the arm and started to lead him off. The talkative applicant finally left without resistance.

After standing in line for 2 days, I happened to get my job and arsenal employee's badge No. 7383 because of the unwillingness or inability of 500 previously employed laborers to pay dues to Statler's union.

Under the closed-shop agreement between the union and company, workers hired before May 1 who were not in good standing last week were summarily fired, leaving room for new employees.

Rules for payments to the union provide for $5 out of the first pay check and subsequent payments at the rate of 75 cents a day until all initiation fees and dues are paid up.

I saw a gray-whiskered man of 55 step up to one of Statler's assistants and ask if he could stay on the job. The answer was a curt "No." The man walked away.

An Akron laborer had paid $17 of the $19 he owed the union. But he, too, was turned away.

I saw dozens of men emptying their wallets "to get square with the union," many of them paying $19, which meant they previously had paid the union nothing.

Statler and another assistant named Tom stood inside the union booth at the main gate stuffing the shower of bills into their wallets and making out receipts.

ANNUAL TAKE IS $180,000

I estimated that Statler's union, thanks to Uncle Sam's defense program, is collecting at the rate of $180,000 a year from laborers at the arsenal.

If 6,000 laborers—at times more than 7,000 are employed—paid their full dues for a year, the collection would total $186,000. This is at the rate of $31 a year—$15 initiation and $4 per quarterly year dues.

Counting truck drivers, painters, electricians, carpenters, bricklayers, and operating engineers—crafts which pay heavier dues than laborers—union dues paid by arsenal employees total in excess of $500,000 a year.

The best union story I heard while working at the arsenal was told by a bus driver who drove us from our time office to our work location—Smalley Road, where our labor gang smashed stone for a roadbed.

"Yes, sir; when Uncle Sam dishes out the dough, man, he really dishes it."

UNCLE SAM CAUGHT IN JAM

He told about a truckload of electricians coming in from work at the end of the day. Their union contract, he said, provided for a full hour of overtime pay for every fractional part of an hour over 5 minutes, even though this extra time was spent en route to the time office, after completion of the workday.

"Well, do you know what happened?" the bus driver said. "That danged load of electricians got caught in one of the traffic jams we have every now and then when shifts change.

"Their truck was held up for just over 5 minutes," he added. "Know what that traffic jam cost Uncle Sam in overtime? Just $200. There was hell to pay from the Army, but the electricians got their extra money all right."

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE, OF INDIANA

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered on Memorial Day, over radio station WOWO, Fort Wayne, Ind.:

Friends of the radio audience, 23 years ago today this Nation was engaged in a great war—a war to "make the world safe for democracy"—a war to end all wars.

Today we pause to pay tribute to those brave men who died for that noble ideal, while Europe's battlefields bear testimony to the futility of that resolve.

No nation ever entered a conflict with higher ideals, with more unselfish purpose, or more noble motives than did the United States in 1917. We had no desire for world domination, no lust of ambition, no pride of power and might. Our sole desire was to give to the world the same right to live in freedom, in peace, and happiness which we held as a heritage from our forefathers.

Our heritage had been won in the snows of Valley Forge, guaranteed at the "Bloody Angle" of Gettysburg. It was our heritage—our unchangeable right—because thousands of brave men to whom we pay tribute today had died that we might live as free citizens of a liberty-loving republic.

It is fitting that America today should pay tribute to her sons and daughters who have died in defense of her freedom. But today as we honor those sacrifices, we should at the same time make an accounting of our stewardship. We should search out our own duties and ask of ourselves what we are doing to carry on those ideals for which they died.

Our tears and our flowers are tributes of love and devotion, but they are not sufficient. It is only by doing our part to live up to and carry on the ideals for which they died that America today can pay tribute to her honored dead.

The world today is again torn by wars—wars more terrible and more destructive of human life and property than anything that has ever been known to man. The powers of aggression and tyranny again are on the march. Freedom and peace are being trampled under the heel of dictatorship and power.

What, then, is America's part in this new world crisis?

Should we again send forth our sons to fight to make the world safe for democracy?

Should we again cast our ideals with Europe's ambitions?

On this Memorial Day of 1941, I say to you that America's place is in America. America's duty is not to make the world safe for democracy. America's duty is to save democracy for the world. America's task is not the destruction of nazi-ism, fascism, nor communism in other parts of the world. America's destiny is the preservation of Americanism in America.

Close as Europe's wars have touched many of our lives; hate, as we must, the aggression of the dictators—I can see no reason for another A. E. F.

If tyranny, dictatorships, and the rule of might are to perish, it will not be because America or any other nation has overthrown them at the point of a bayonet or a machine gun. It will be because the people themselves, guided and inspired by the example of freedom-loving America—living in peace and happiness—will throw off the shackles of dictation and assume for themselves the rights of self-government, of liberty, and right.

But it is not sufficient that we should only hold aloft the burning torch of liberty. We must be prepared to defend our American way of life against any conceivable enemy.

No nation can possess the wealth, the natural resources, and the glories of America without being coveted by forces of greed and ambition.

We in America therefore must be prepared to defend not only our ideals but our possessions—not only the rights but the fruits of freedom and individual liberty.

Congress—since the fall of France a year ago—has been engaged in appropriating billions of dollars for the rebuilding of our national defenses. The largest peacetime appropriations in history have been voted for the development of our Army, our Navy, and our Air Corps.

To be sure, our present armed forces are the strongest—and the best equipped and best trained—in all our peacetime history. But this is not particularly reassuring. Our peacetime Army has never been anything but a skeleton organization. Assurance that it is the best it has ever been is not sufficient. It still is not strong enough, sufficiently well equipped, nor trained for the defensive tactics this war in Europe and Africa has shown us is vital to any defense.

Congress and the country are united on the necessity of immediate adequate national defense. We are working as a unit toward the end that America must be prepared to successfully resist any conceivable attempt to invade our shores

Determined as America is, however, to see our defenses in order, we should go about this business with calmness and deliberation—with both feet planted squarely on the ground—and with a united demand that for every dollar of American money spent for defenses, we get a dollar's worth of defenses.

America is not totally unprepared. We have in our Navy 323 warships, including 15 battleships, 6 aircraft carriers, 37 cruisers, 160 destroyers, and 105 submarines. They are manned by 210,000 officers and men plus 40,000 officers and men of the Marine Corps. Another 47,000 officers and men comprise the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve.

Our Army today consists of some 1,240,000 enlisted men, including draftees, and 82,000 officers. This is being steadily strengthened and will reach a peak of more than 1,400,000 men by early summer.

The present strength of the Air Corps is 6,600 officers and 121,000 enlisted men. Of these, approximately 6,000 are rated as pilots.

The Air Corps has on hand as of today 6,000 planes, consisting of about 3,500 training planes and 2,500 combat ships. Additional planes are coming off the assembly line by the hundreds, and only this week a new appropriation of over $3,000,000,000 was requested for the Army and Navy airplane program.

But let us not follow any false illusions. Adequate national defense is not going to be accomplished by the passage of some bills by Congress and the ordering of more airplanes, more guns, and more explosives.

Adequate national defense can only be achieved if we stamp out and forget those class hatreds and intolerances which have been too much in evidence during recent months.

Adequate national defense can be had only by the sacrifice of each of us—of every man and woman in every walk of life—by industry and by labor—by farmer and mechanic—by teacher and pupil.

America cannot be defended by pitting industry against labor, rich against poor, isolationist against interventionist. America can only be defended when we all realize that we are Americans—working, living, and sacrificing for the same high ideal.

Armaments cost money. One giant long-distance bomber alone costs in the neighborhood of $350,000. A great battleship costs millions. Unless America is willing to sacrifice or to go without other things to pay for it, we will have no adequate national defense.

Today our national debt is at the highest figure in history. The debt limit in the last year has been raised from $45,000,000,000 to $65,000,000,000. We can provide a great defense force in two ways. We can tax ourselves to pay for it or we can continue to raise our debt limit and pass on the cost to our children and our children's children.

But the delusion that we can continue to borrow huge sums of money with no thought of repayment is as dangerous to this country's safety as a lack of guns or warships or planes. Financial bankruptcy is no less a danger to our democracy than an invasion.

Congress very wisely is now engaged in drawing up a new tax measure to pay for a large share of our defense program. Along with this, however, should come strict economy in regular Government expenditures. Americans will gladly share the burden of defense expenditures if they are assured that the money they pay in taxes is not wasted and squandered on nonessential, nondefense frills.

We need billions for national defense. Let some of these billions come through a reduction in the luxuries and unnecessary expenses of government itself.

And now, may I mention another phase of our defense which in my opinion is just as important as a strong force on land or sea or air? I refer to a defense against those "fifth column" and Trojan-horse tactics which already are among us, preaching and teaching the substitution of alien "isms" for the American way of life.

These alien agitators and propagandists are a more real and immediate danger to our democracy than any foreign invader.

America today has no place for any "ism" but Americanism. Let those among us who do not like our way of life—whose hearts do not thrill at the sight of the Stars and Stripes—who are not ready and willing to make any sacrifice for our ideals—I say, let's send them back to the dictators they love. We need and want none of them.

America today needs a great spiritual revival. We need to rekindle our belief in the fundamentals upon which our Government was founded. We need to again rededicate ourselves to our ideals, to reaffirm our faith in God and His teachings. We need pride in the things for which we stand.

As this Memorial Day draws to a close, America could make no better resolve than to carry on the ideals for which these loved ones gave their lives—to willingly and eagerly make any sacrifice necessary for the preservation of our noble heritage—to keep America as a bright light of freedom and happiness—shining as a beacon to all the world that in America, peace and democracy and freedom shall live forevermore.

Thank you and good night.

Candles of Culture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McMILLAN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ADDRESS BY FRED TAYLOR WILSON, LL. D.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, June 2, at Lewisburg, W. Va., an address of rare beauty of diction and lofty thought was delivered to the graduating class of Greenbrier College for Young Women. The speaker was Fred Taylor Wilson, LL. D., of Washington, D. C., noted author and lecturer, and personal friend of many Members of the Congress. Dr. Wilson's subject was Candles of Culture. He spoke, in part, as follows:

Today, I ask, in the lovely lines of Lowell: "What is so rare as a day in June?"

It is delightful to be here and enjoy once more the quiet stillness of this peaceful mountain region. When I last saw your beautiful mountains they were robed in the white weeds of winter. Today, they are even more beautiful in the green and gay garments of summer. May I express the hope as you go away today, like Milton's Lycidas, to "seek fresh woods and pastures new," that you may take away with you in your bodies a bit of the mountains' strength, in your minds something of the wide view from their sun-painted summits, and in your soul of souls a purity like unto the purity of the gentle winds that blow above them.

My subject is Candles of Culture. There is an old Chinese proverb which reads: "It is better to light a candle in the darkness than to complain of the darkness." So, instead of complaining of the dark and gloomy wood in which civilization, like Dante of old, now wanders, I am going to try to light for you seven candles which I hope will drive away some of the darkness and gloom from your future lives.

The number "7" is a mystic one. It is often found in both sacred and secular literature. Genesis tells us all creation was completed in 7 days, and that after the flood God made a pledge to man in the seven colors of the rainbow. John, in his revelation to the seven churches of Asia, wrote of seeing seven golden candlesticks. Dante, in the Middle Ages, described the seven heavens and the seven major sins to a church with seven sacred sacraments. Shakespeare, in As You Like It, spoke of the seven ages of man, and Ruskin wrote of the Seven Lamps of Architecture.

I. CALMNESS

The first of our seven candles we will call the candle of calmness. What a task you will have to keep it burning in times like these. Wicked winds from every direction seek to snuff out its flickering flame. From the north come the furious winds of fear; from the south the softer winds of anxiety; from the west the whistling winds of worry; and from the east the ever-rising gale of guilt within.

Now is a great hour to learn the lessons of poise and dignity, self-mastery, and self-control. Let us keep calm and cool, whatever may happen. Though others lose their heads, and, as Kipling cautioned us, blame us with their loss, let us remain cool and calm and steadfast. To do this we must learn early the art of self-discipline and drop the desire for mere self-expression. Compare the silent river with the slimy swamp. The one follows a channeled or disciplined way, while the other realizes self-expression. Which is the more useful and admirable?

The disciplined way of life is also the way of wisdom. Milton named solitude as the place to plume our feathers and grow the wings of wisdom. Dr. Alexis Carrel, in his great book, Man, the Unknown, reminds us that only two groups in human society know the value of solitude, the very bad and the very good, the condemned criminal and the monk in the monastery. He also warns us that out of such monastic silences will come the great discoveries of the future.

Study the secret lessons of Nature. Learn to speak her varied language. Catch the message of both mountain and sea. And, as you look up into the silent evening sky, repeat with Emerson, "Teach me thy mood, oh, patient stars."

II. COURAGE

Our second candle is the candle of courage. What an hour to learn of the metal of which we are made.

The whole world seems to be in the grip of some mad monster who would take it and shake it as an angry cat would take and shake a frightened little mouse.

What is real courage? There is nothing courageous in flying at night with the speed of the wind above a sleeping city and dropping deadly bombs upon helpless people below. Such are the deeds of daredevils and not of daring men. No crosses of honor will ever be given those who perform them. Few real heroes have appeared in the present cruel war, where man has been matched, not against man, but against the machines which man has made.

It was Milton who reminded us that "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war."

"Dream not that sword and helmet
Are signs of valor true;
For peace hath greater victories
Than battle ever knew."

We read much of the world's great battlefields. Marathon in Greece and the Marne in France were scenes of immortal valor. But there is a greater battlefield than these. It is found not upon the maps of the world but in the hearts of men and women where they, like Jacob of old, wrestle with the angels of their better natures. It is there that truth challenges falsehood as a dragon of danger and 1 legion of honor puts to flight 10,000 legions of dishonor; it is there the angel of purity with the sword of self-respect drives away a whole division of unclean devils. But when the fight is over, and truth and honor and purity have won the day, ladders from heaven rise before the victors, upon which angels descend to bestow the golden crown of the truly courageous.

England is a recent example of a courageous nation. Its people have shown themselves valiant and brave in the midst of great hardships. Though bombs have broken their beautiful buildings, they have not touched their unconquerable souls.

All literature pays tribute to courage. The Bible is one clear call to be strong and of a good courage. At its close, the morning star is the reward offered to him that overcometh. Shakespeare also bids us be brave. One of his noted female characters scornfully cried to her faltering husband, "Screw your courage up to the sticking point and you will not fail." It was Hotspur who declared, "Out of the nettle danger, I pluck the flower safety." On a tomb in the old Thomas Jefferson Cemetery at Monticello are these words from Browning: "One who never turned his back but marched breast forward." That is the spirit of the truly courageous. The stars in their very courses fight on the side of all brave souls. For—

"If courage feeble were Heaven itself would stoop to her."

III. TOLERANCE

The candle of tolerance has long since ceased to shine in many places. But you must keep it burning. For tolerance is a fundamental part in any real religious faith. We daily ask in our prayer of prayers, that the Father of us all be tolerant and forgive us in proportion as we are tolerant and forgive those who trespass against us.

I am aware of the difficulty in always being tolerant and kind. But, as Wordsworth warned us, we are most remembered by the little, nameless acts of kindness and of love. For love never faileth.

We pay in physical as well as in spiritual pain when we harbor hate and unforgiveness in our hearts. So, learn now to be kind and tolerant.

Time makes changes in the lives of all of us. The Dives of one day often becomes the Lazarus of the next; the learned of one hour is sometimes the lunatic of the next hour, and the greenhorn of now may be the great man of tomorrow.

There are two groups in human society which should command our greatest tolerance. They belong to the first and seventh ages of man. When infants torment you into tears, remember that you, too, were once an infant.

And, when the very aged seem unreasonable in their demands, remember that your highest hope is to some day join their restless ranks.

Be tolerant, too, toward the people of other flags and faiths. Keep in mind that Socrates was a Greek, Cicero an Italian, Tolstoi a Russian, and Goethe a German.

May you, as Beatrice directed Dante, drink deeply of Lethe's waters and forget the ugliness of life, and then drink from Eunoe's stream, that only its beauty may be remembered. When that is done, like Beatrice, you are ready to continue your journey toward the eternal forests.

IV. TRUTH

Truth, our fourth candle, is the first casualty of war, both without and within.

To know, or not to know, that is the eternal question. Saint and scientist alike are ever asking with Pilate, "What is truth?"

I am thinking now of five great torch bearers of truth who led the world into new realms of knowledge. First, there was Copernicus, the Polish monk, who, when dying, declared that the earth was not the center of all creation as Aristotle had taught and the world had believed for centuries. Then came Galileo, who aroused the anger of the world, the church, and maybe the devil by announcing that the earth and not the sun was the great traveler. Newton's discovery of the law of gravitation which we now take for granted, also opened a new gateway into the fields of knowledge. Darwin, too, shocked mankind into a new understanding with his calm conclusion that man was a rising and not a fallen angel. And finally came Einstein, who now lives among us, with his far-flung theory of relativity, about which we talk so much and know so little.

Greater truths than these will be unfolded as man advances in wisdom and understanding. So follow truth's candle wherever it may lead you. It alone will guide you into the largest freedom of mind and heart.

V. SERVICE

Our fifth candle is a key one. It is the candle of service. I am wondering now what dream most possesses you. Some of you may be thinking primarily of personal pleasure and future social triumphs. If so, God pity you. These alone will not provide for you a permanent happiness. Life is something more than moonlight and roses. Lives devoted largely to selfish satisfactions are like orchids—expensive but emit no sweet odors; like peacocks which parade in pride and splendor but sing no songs; or like the Japanese cherry trees which delight us with their beauty of bud and blossom but furnish no food for the hungry or shade for the shelterless.

Most of you, I am sure, now dream of a happy home and family life of your own. You could have no finer dream. To provide a restful retreat for some gallant Romeo is a work worthy of the loveliest Juliet. For a happy home is a replica of heaven and to be the mother of a Washington is greater than to be Washington himself. Some of you, no doubt, have already hitched to shining stars the wagons of your ambition in art, music, and literature. And that, too, is well, for "too low they build who build beneath the stars." So, dream on my beautiful young dreamers and may God help you make your dreams come true.

Let me here impress two of my favorite thoughts upon you. First, true greatness does not depend upon place or power. An artist is an artist whether she holds in her delicate hands the unshapen clay of the commonplace, the costly gifts of gold and purple, or gently leads some little child into paths of honor and usefulness. For "all service ranks the same with God." Second, there is no real progress in life without privation and pain. Life is made up of both tears and cheers. Into every fertile life some rain must fall. Eternal sunshine everywhere means a dreary desert. When you feel keenly the chisel of fate and circumstance remember that so are fashioned all the finest things of life.

No one loses by unselfish service. As one candle lends its light to another, nor loses any of its luster, so those who serve never lose in so doing. "Give to the world the best you have and the best will come back to you." The names in history which will live until the last syllable of recorded time are the names not of mankind's greatest masters but of its greatest servants. Let me now turn prophet: You in this class who in the years to come will receive the accolade of highest acclaim will be those of you who serve most graciously and generously your day and generation. You will reveal most the redolence of roses and the loveliness of lilies.

VI. FAITH

Our sixth candle, the candle of faith, often fades, then glows again. It must glow again, or life could not go on. For faith is the alpha and omega of all human progress.

Our first faith should be in faith itself. One philosopher declared doubt to be the beginning of wisdom. If that be so, the world should now be full of countless Solomons.

Let the beams of light from faith's candle, like those from a lighthouse, revolve in four different directions. First, let such rays turn on yourselves. You will largely be the architects of your own future. The fault will not be with others. The secret rests with you. So believe in your own star.

But you must always be worthy of your own confidence.

"First to thine ownself be true
And then as the night follows the day
Thou canst not be false to any man."

These beams of light must also turn to an ever-renewed faith in humanity. That is very difficult to do, even now, but it must be done. You, of West Virginia, are familiar with tunnels. The civilized world is now passing through one of the tunnel periods of history. There is darkness everywhere. But, just as travelers through tunnels again behold the light, so will the world of today be dazzled by the brighter light of tomorrow when we have successfully passed through the darkness of the present hour.

"Now at last, tho' oft mistaken, oft despairing,
At last! At last! methinks I see the dawn,
Soon shall the awakened nations proclaim
The passing of the night forlorn.

"Soon shall the long conceived child of time
Be born of progress. Soon the morn sublime
Shall burst effulgent through the clouds of earth
And light—time's greatest page, O Right! thy glorious birth."

Keep your faith in America. Every true patriot loves his country. Remember Scott's lines:

"Breathes there the man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land."

As the Wise Men of the East followed the wondrous star, so do lovers of freedom and the democratic way of life throughout the world now follow the guiding hand of our Nation. We must not fail them.

We have made much today of the number "7." I want to commend to you seven great American documents. Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, of Boston University, called them Our American Canon. The Mayflower Compact, he called our Genesis; the Declaration of Independence, our Exodus; the Federal Constitution, our Books of the Law; Washington's Farewell Address, our Major Prophesy; the Star-Spangled Banner, our Psalm of America; Lincoln's second inaugural address, our Gospel of Americanism; and Woodrow Wilson's last written message, the Road Away From Revolution, an Epistle to the Americans. I commend them all to you.

We point with pride to our wide territory and our ever-growing population. But neither plains nor population alone make a nation great.

"Only men can make
A nation great and strong;
Men who for truth and honor's sake
Stand fast and suffer long.

"Brave men who work while others sleep,
Who dare while others fly;
They build a nation's pillars deep
And lift them to the sky."

Finally, keep your faith in God. The pure in heart see Him everywhere. They behold His glory in the rising of the sun and His beauty and sublimity in sunset and evening star. I dare not suggest your way of worship. Many rival roadways lead to the city of God. The terminus of all of them is the same. Some people prefer to worship in stately, ritualistic ways. Others, Quaker-like, kneel in solemn silence. The lofty message of Emerson's Oversoul and that of the most primitive preacher alike assure us that frail man does not walk alone but has a divine companion.

So keep your faith in yourselves, in humanity, in your country, and in God.

VII. CHARACTER

You now have burning before you six candles; the candles of calmness, courage, tolerance, truth, service, and faith. We will now light our seventh, and last candle. It is the candle of character. It should be more than a candle. It should be an everlasting flame.

Learn now, my dear young graduates, that spiritual values are as real as material ones; that faith is as real as the fragrance of flowers; that hope is as eternal as the everlasting hills; and that love is as luminous as the light from sun and stars.

Nature and man work together to fortify a living faith. A little while ago, I visited the nearby Natural Bridge of Virginia. I was thrilled as you no doubt have been by its massive masonry, chiseled through the ages by the hand of Nature into a thing of beauty and grandeur. But more vivid to me than my recollection of rock and river is the memory of the marvelous music wafted to my waiting ears on the evening breeze from a golden-voiced singer somewhere in that cathedral of stone. "It dissolved me into ecstacies and brought all heaven before mine eyes." I shall ever remember his last lingering lines: "Earth hath no sorrows heaven cannot heal."

You, rightly, should aspire to be as Helen-like as possible in charm and beauty. But remember character—sweet, modest, gentle, Christian character—is the choicest of all cosmetics. Its divine influence is indelible. It will remain long after mere physical beauty of form and feature has faded. Neither time nor tears can erase it. Character alone will enable you to sleep well when life's fitful fever is over. Its mark will shine brightest upon you in the light of the eternal morning.

Each one of you, I am sure, aspires to the finest possible type of young womanhood. Let me suggest that you study well the secret of the hidden strength of strong men and women. A friend tells of a recent visit to a famed California florist, and the dwarfed redwoods he saw there. Though they belonged to the family of earth's oldest and largest living things, they were forever doomed to dwarfdom, because their taproot had been cut, and they no longer fed from Nature's inexhaustible springs. In like manner, we frail human beings live "pigmy" lives in moral and spiritual stature when we might become "giants," because we keep ourselves cut off from the hidden springs of God. To keep open such divine connection is the supreme end of life. We drink from the shallow pools of doubt and uncertainty and failure when we might quench our thirsts at everlasting fountains which alone can provide us with peace, power, and plenty.

You will remember Emerson's reminder that the gods we worship write their names upon our faces. May I, in closing, breathe the hope and prayer that henceforth each one of you will so worship the Christ of Calvary, the Candle of the Centuries, and so walk in His way of love that He will write His name upon your fair faces in living letters so lustrous that—

"All your future years will be as a tract of light, Like an angel's footsteps passing through the night."

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of May 31, 1941:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 31, 1941]

COMPENSATION TAX RATES

Wisconsin, with its individual employer account system, in its unemployment compensation law, will, if it passes certain present legislation, be in an excellent position so far as the critics in Washington are concerned.

The reason that it will be in an excellent position is that, while it permits reduced tax rates to employers with specified reserves, it also demands a higher-than-normal tax from the few employers whose reserves fall below specified minimums.

The normal unemployment tax rate is 2.7 percent. The minimum tax is complete exemption for the period of high reserves. The maximum tax is 4 percent. Under this system, each employer's account is kept sound—or the employer pays 50 percent additional until his account is restored. At the same time, because reserves are ample and because they are invested in interest-bearing Federal securities, a more than adequate "general fund" is built up. The interest received on the total reserve, it may be recalled, goes into this general fund.

Only two others of the 13 States which have individual employer experience rating follow the Wisconsin practice of a higher-than-normal tax for employers with excess labor turn-over. The other 10 allow reduced rates (two of them down to no tax at all), but they do not complete the circle by assessing excess taxes in case of depleted reserves.

These 10 States, in the interest of perpetuating the individual employer reserve system, should adopt the minimum-normal-maximum tax policy. One sure point of attack by the pooled fund advocates is the one-sidedness of a plan which permits a discount but exacts no penalty.

RESOLUTION OF MISSOURI HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the masses are beginning to think in terms of this Nation of ours after the war. Missouri is one of the eight States lying wholly or partially within the area of the proposed Arkansas Valley Authority.

The House of Representatives of Missouri has just passed a resolution by the Honorable A. T. Parrish, of Springfield, petitioning and memorializing Congress to pass the bill now pending in both the House and Senate to create the Arkansas Valley Authority. I take pleasure in inserting the resolution in the RECORD:

Whereas there is now pending in the National Congress of the United States a bill known as the Arkansas Valley Authority bill; and

Whereas there is a necessity for the developing of the State of Missouri in the mining industry and also for the curtailment of the damaging floodwaters that have brought about the rapid erosion of soils in the last 50 years; and

Whereas the passage of this bill is necessary at this time for the carrying out and boosting of a national-defense program: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, That the National Congress be asked, petitioned, and memorialized to pass said bill at its earliest convenience.

I, Joseph A. Bauer, chief clerk of the House of Representatives of Missouri, do hereby certify that this resolution was adopted by the Sixty-first General Assembly of Missouri now in session.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT NATIONAL PHILATELIC AUCTIONS FOR REFUGEE RELIEF

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include therein an address given by former Postmaster General James A. Farley at a dinner tendered to him at the Astor Hotel, New York City, on June 3, sponsored by philatelists and civil and social leaders of the United States:

I consider it a privilege to have been invited to this delightful dinner tonight and to participate in the national philatelic auctions for refugee relief.

One of the most beautiful things of our American way of life is that we have both the heart and the disposition to gather together in meetings of this kind for the purpose of helping those who are helpless, and sometimes almost hopeless, by reason of forces over which they have no control. It is, indeed, an attest for democracy and typifies those soul-consoling influences which make us so proud of our citizenship today.

It is an honor to appear before such a distinguished audience, and I need not tell you that we face a grave emergency when a large part of Europe is under the ruthless control of totalitarian states aspiring to greater conquests. The danger is real and calls for every possible effort for defense. And, may I repeat, it is commendable that we assemble here to do something for those whose defense was not quite enough to meet the adversary.

During my administration as Postmaster General I had opportunity of participating in many ceremonies sponsored by philatelic groups, and I have always found such meetings both interesting and informative. I have found stamp collectors to be patriotic American citizens, and their interest in and devotion to their hobby have always been intriguing to me. The philatelic auctions here tonight and the contributions thereto by those prominent in philately unmistakably evince also an interest in and devotion to good citizenship.

When I became Postmaster General I knew very little about a postage stamp except that it was an indispensable item in everyday business. In fact, were it not for the postage stamp I probably would not have been Postmaster General, for I am credited with having written more letters to the voters of this country than any other one man. I still believe in letter writing as I think it is one of the strongest ways, outside of personal contact, in which people may be brought together.

As many of you know, the Post Office Department has a series of what is known as ordinary stamps for everyday business. These stamps are of such size as will lend themselves easily to business usage. It also issues from time to time what are known as commemorative stamps. These stamps memorialize figures or events prominent in American history. I believe that the first real interest that I had in these stamps began with the issue of the Mother's Day stamp in 1934. Any stamp commemorating mother is of interest to all of us, of course, and I could not have directed the issuance of this stamp without thinking of my own mother whose love and care meant so much in my life. This stamp further served to impress upon me the significance of a small postal label in carrying a beautiful thought and message to everyone in the land. While I was criticized for putting what was termed a "10-cent-store vase of flowers on the portrait of Whistler's mother," this stamp was very popular and had one of the greatest sales in postal history. I had the happy privilege at the first press run of this issue to have with me at an appropriate ceremony the First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Approximately 100 commemorative stamps were issued while I was Postmaster General, and I believe that I may say, with becoming modesty, that we confined the issues only to those people and affairs that justified national recognition. I dare say that many will agree with me that the 35 stamps issued for prominent Americans was one of the greatest groups of stamps to be issued by this or any other country. These stamps represented a cross section of leaders in the arts and sciences, and the person is erudite, indeed, who can refer to his stamp album and discuss with ease each person memorialized.

I found that the Department for many years had issued a book carrying descriptions of United States postage stamps from the first issue in 1847. This book was intended for the adult or mature stamp enthusiast, and the subject matter therein was restricted to descriptive matter and statistical facts with regard to the various issues. I was convinced that the value of this book to collectors would be greatly enhanced if the text was supplemented by actual reproductions of the stamps. This had not been possible in the past because of the restrictions of the law prohibiting the reproduction of United States postage stamps in their entirety. However, it was possible to obtain a favorable ruling with respect to the illustrating of stamps in this Government publication, as a result of which the edition of 1936 contained a full complement of stamp illustrations which has made this publication of universal interest to students and stamp collectors. It was also my happy privilege to authorize a junior edition of this book to sell at the very nominal price of 10 cents in order that every boy and girl might have a handy booklet depicting through stamps our country's history and tradition.

While the Post Office Department has always been generous in furnishing display frames of postage stamps to conventions and other meeting of philatelic groups, many people were deprived of observing and learning the interesting things surrounding stamp issues. It was my further privilege to authorize the building of an automobile truck which was completely equipped with stamp models and other exhibits picturizing the full history of stamp issues. This truck has passed through many cities, towns, and hamlets—more than 400,000 people have visited it. And I believe that the appreciation of these governmental issues betokened an interest in better citizenship.

The Department for many years has maintained a Philatelic Agency which is for the particular use and convenience of stamp collectors. The sales in 1933 were only a little more than $300,000 per year. In 1940 the sales of the Agency were nearly one and one-half million dollars. Not more than 15 people were employed in 1933, whereas today there are 42 people assigned to the Agency, and nearly 20 people do nothing else than handle orders by mail. Not only did the sales at the Philatelic Agency increase, but interest in stamp collecting has grown to such an extent that postmasters in many of the largest cities report considerable revenue from the sales of stamps through their philatelic window. In fact, the postmaster here at New York, Albert Goldman, reported more than $750,000 last year from the sales of stamps to philatelists.

It, of course, would be folly on my part to claim all the credit for this splendid growth and accomplishment in the field of philately. The No. 1 philatelist, whose encouragement and friendly counsel has meant so much, is the President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. I am sure that all philatelists, because of their more intimate knowledge of the world due to their interest in stamps of all nations, recognize the great problems that beset the President today. Like all the people of America, they stand shoulder to shoulder in support of whatever course he and Secretary of State Hull may deem best in this grave crisis. In the time of a national emergency there can be but one Commander in Chief.

The people of the philatelic world have done their part, too, and I want to acknowledge a debt of gratitude to the stamp columnists and stamp magazines, many of whose representatives and editors are here tonight. In furthering interest in your chosen hobby, you have done your part well.

Last, but not least, I may refer to the philatelic exhibition room, started in 1935 in the Post Office Building in Washington. At the present time the collection of stamps in this exhibit numbers approximately 50,000 original specimens. There are, in addition, some 1,500 die proofs of United States postage stamps. One hundred and eighty foreign countries are shown, with a total of approximately 10,000 foreign stamps on display. A better understanding of the scope and importance of the exhibition room will be gained from the fact that in the 6 years of its operation a collection of postage stamps has been assembled worth well over half a million dollars. It will be worth your while to visit this room when in Washington.

Through cooperation with the Treasury Department, legislation was sponsored and finally enacted on January 27, 1938, removing the restrictions heretofore in effect with regard to the illustrating of United States postage stamps for philatelic purposes. This has proved a boon to philatelic publishers and has enabled the news service of the country to promote an advertising campaign of immense possibilities to the Department in connection with the sale of new issues of postage stamps. It is now possible for the stamp columnists to illustrate their articles with black and white reproductions of postage stamps.

I have endeavored in the foregoing to render an account of my stewardship to the stamp collectors of America, to whom I am deeply indebted for many valuable suggestions with regard to new issues of postage stamps, and concerning the adoption of measures that would react to the benefit of philately in general. By reason of this departmental recognition and support, the stature and importance of philately has been raised to new heights heretofore assumed to be unattainable. Stamp collecting is the peer of all hobbies that appeals to persons of all ages and conditions in life.

I see around me so many people prominent in all walks of life, and doubtless many of you have hobbies other than that of stamp collecting, but I trust that my little talk tonight has served to present to you the attractiveness of even just a casual study of postage stamps.

I thank you.

LETTERS FROM PHILIP B. FLEMING, ADMINISTRATOR, WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

JUNE 3, 1941.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing to you with respect to two phases of H. R. 4926, a bill "making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, and for other purposes."

The bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations on June 2, 1941, reduces by $349,110 the Budget estimates for the Wage and Hour Division. The bill also transfers from the Wage and Hour Division to the Office of the Solicitor $360,000, representing salaries of the legal personnel and their clerical assistants in the field offices of the Wage and Hour Division.

I should like first to discuss the effects of the reduction of the appropriation for the Wage and Hour Division. At page 13 of the report of the committee it is stated that "whether the additional funds sought by the Division and approved by the Budget should be allowed is purely one of policy." The report then goes on to state that as a matter of policy the committee is unable to find any justification for placing the inspection under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 on a basis of inspecting each and every plant that might be covered by the act. The committee points to examples of administration of the Food and Drug Administration and the Walsh-Healy Act, where only partial inspections are made as a justification for not requiring routine inspections of all covered establishments. The committee concludes that the sum recommended by it for the Wage and Hour Division will be sufficient to investigate all complaints of violation that might be registered with the Division, and will permit, in addition thereto, inspector service to be available for spot checking of industries throughout the United States.

I wish to take sharp issue with the committee on the question of policy of the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act referred to in the committee report. I am convinced that nothing short of an inspection of every one of the more than 300,000 establishments in which employees subject to the act are employed will give assurance of fair and uniform compliance with the act in every one of the States and Territories. In my annual report to the Congress for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1940, I announced in chapter IV the need for routine inspection of all covered establishments under the act. I stated that, in my opinion, the vast majority of employers are complying with the act. I also stated that many who have been in violation would be entirely willing to comply could they be assured that their business competitors also would be required to comply. Continuing, I stated that since the complying employer may experience difficulty in meeting the requirements of the act if the violations of competitors are allowed to go unchallenged, I acknowledged a moral, as well as a legal, responsibility to employers to put an end as quickly as possible to the payment of subminimum wages. The report concluded that to carry out this responsibility requires the systematic inspection of all establishments covered by the act.

During the fiscal year 1941, I instituted systematic routine inspection drives in several industries. The results of such routine inspections amply demonstrate the wisdom of following this approach. Thus, for the first 9 months of the fiscal year 1941, violations involving restitution were found in one-third of all establishments found to be covered on routine inspection. Furthermore, restitution was found owing to one-fifth of all the employees in the establishments in which routine inspection showed restitution to be due. In other words, the violations did not affect merely isolated employees, but, rather, a substantial proportion of all the employees in the establishments, none of whom filed complaints. Half of all legal actions instituted by the Division involved establishments against which no complaint had been received. For this 9-month period, violations of the overtime provisions of the act were found in 15 percent of all establishments found to be covered on routine inspection, as compared with 24 percent for establishments investigated following the filing of complaints. The percentage of violations revealed in routine inspections increased during this 9-month period, whereas the percentage of establishments in violation in complaint cases remained at a constant level.

A few statistics will demonstrate forcibly the necessity of administering the Fair Labor Standards Act on a routine inspection basis. Out of 12,621 complaint cases reviewed in Washington during the first 9 months of the fiscal year 1941, 6,324, or roughly one-half, involved violations serious enough to warrant the payment of restitution to employees. Out of 19,635 cases reviewed in Washington during this same period as a result of routine inspection, 5,359 constituted violations serious enough to warrant the payment of restitution to employees. During this same 9-month period, out of 1,297 cases requiring litigation by the Division, 607 involved the payment of restitution to employees. Six hundred and forty-six of the 1,297 cases requiring litigation resulted from complaints received by the Division. Slightly more than one-half, or 651, of the 1,297 litigation cases grew out of routine inspections.

The experience of the various State labor departments clearly shows that routine inspections are essential in the administration of State labor laws, comparable to the Fair Labor Standards Act. The experiences of the States of New York, Rhode Island, Minnesota, California, Georgia, Nebraska, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania clearly demonstrate this conclusion. For example, the Department of Labor of Rhode Island, in its annual report for 1939, Division of Women and Children, page 43, states: "To enforce a wage order fairly, each firm subject to the order should be inspected at least once a year as a matter of routine, so that one violator will receive the same attention as another." The twenty-sixth biennial report of the Department of Labor and Industry of Minnesota for 1937-38, Division of Women and Children, page 201, states: "Enforcement of labor laws rests in part upon periodic inspection of women-employing industries."

I do not believe the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act, referred to by the committee in its report, presents a comparable problem to that of the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act. In the case of the Walsh-Healey Act, all firms subject to its provisions are known in advance, and a more intelligent sampling of the types of firms to be inspected may be made. It should also be pointed out, however, that the fact that the Administrator of the Public Contracts Division inspects only 25 percent of the firms subject to that act is not because of a conviction that such a partial inspection results in a proper administration of the law. Rather, the testimony of the Administrator of the Public Contracts Division before your committee on the appropriation bill in question indicates that a much larger percentage of the firms subject to the Walsh-Healey Act should be inspected to assure fair administration of that law.

As the action of the committee in announcing, as a matter of policy, that inspections of the Fair Labor Standards Act should not be made on a routine, systematic basis is contrary to the whole experience of departments, whether Federal or State, engaged in administering labor laws, I wish to take this opportunity to question the wisdom of the proposed policy.

I shall now discuss briefly the provision in H. R. 4926 which transfers from the Wage and Hour Division to the Office of the Solicitor the funds representing salaries of the legal personnel and their clerical assistants in the field offices of the Wage and Hour Division. The result of this transfer of funds is, of course, to transfer the administrative supervision of the field attorneys from the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division to the Solicitor of the Labor Department. The Solicitor of Labor and I addressed communications to Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Labor, on April 24 and May 31, 1941, setting forth the reasons why we believed the transfer in question should not be made. I am taking this opportunity of enclosing copies of these letters for your consideration.

Respectfully,

PHILIP B. FLEMING.

Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Labor, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TARVER: In view of the questions which the committee has raised with respect to the action of the Bureau of the Budget in placing estimates for all legal services in Washington in the item, "Office of the Solicitor," but leaving field attorneys within the general coverage of the item, "Wage and Hour Division," we should like to make a further statement to be inserted in the record of the hearings before your subcommittee.

We believe that the matter of allocating items of expenditure in the appropriation bill is primarily a fiscal and accounting device rather than a means of resolving relative questions of jurisdiction among statutory officers of the same department. The responsibility for preparing Budget estimates and seeing that appropriations made by Congress are expended in accordance with the law is placed upon the heads of various executive departments by reason of the Budget and Accounting Act. Moreover, authority with respect to appointment, promotion, and dismissal of personnel is also vested in the heads of executive departments by reason of Reorganization Plan II. Consequently, except to the extent that advisory functions are delegated to them by the Secretary, bureau heads in the Department of Labor have no duties in connection with the appointment of personnel or the expenditure of public funds. In other words, under existing law, internal questions of administrative management of this character are placed entirely in the hands of the Secretary of Labor.

Both the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division and the Solicitor for the Department of Labor hold offices created by statute which are filled by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Fair Labor Standards Act provides certain duties for the Administrator which are not subject to review by any officer in the executive branch of the Government. The act did not purport to amend or curtail the earlier statute creating the office of the Solicitor.

Insofar as the duties of these two officers impinge upon one another (and it is not apparent that they do), the execution of the duties connected therewith can be confined in their appropriate orbits under existing law through exercise by the Secretary of Labor of the power vested in heads of departments by Revised Statutes 161, "To prescribe regulations not inconsistent with law for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, * * *."

Prior to Reorganization Plan II, the Wage and Hour Division had a separate bureau legal staff. It was found during this period, however, that considerable overlapping legal work was being performed by the Bureau attorneys and the Solicitor and his assistants in that both groups had occasion to construe and apply the provisions of different statutory provisions which were identical in phraseology. For example, original research was performed separately on questions relating to overtime and compensation and the computation of hours worked, both under the Walsh-Healey Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act. Questions of coverage in interstate commerce, arising under the child-labor provisions (the enforcement of which the Children's Bureau is responsible) and the wage provisions, were being separately considered with varying results sometimes reached. Moreover, different advice would occasionally be given by the Solicitor's office, which is the channel of communication with the Department of Justice, to the Attorney General on matters involving litigation, from that which would be given orally to private litigants by attorneys on the staffs of the bureaus.

The Secretary therefore deemed it desirable to integrate the various legal staffs by consolidating the work of all the attorneys in the Department under the supervision of the chief law officer. This was done by regulation issued on June 9, 1940. It was not necessary to seek an amendment to existing law to do this for no limitation had ever been placed by any statute on the legal duties performed in the Solicitor's office. In view of the fact that it has been the administrative practice here, however, to delegate accounting functions to each of the bureaus or divisions from whom separate appropriations were made, some inconvenience has resulted from the fact that the salaries, travel expenses, etc., of attorneys in the Solicitor's office are accounted for in four different administrative units. In order to simplify this practice during the coming fiscal year, the Bureau of the Budget, upon the recommendation of the Secretary, has based its estimate upon a single consolidated appropriation for the attorneys in Washington.

The reasons for making this change do not apply to the field attorneys, however, since all of these men perform duties solely in connection with the wage-and-hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and are physically located in the regional offices of the Wage and Hour Division. In view of the fact that the administration of management functions in each regional office has been delegated to the regional director, it is felt that it would only complicate matters to have another regional official who would be concerned with such duties as providing appropriate office space, keeping records of leave of absence, travel authorizations, and other routine matters. Moreover, it was also felt that since the portion of lawyers in the different regional offices may vary according to the amount of violation cases reported by the inspectors more flexibility in the matter of transferring field attorneys from one regional office to another could be achieved if the expenditures relating to field attorneys were kept in the books of the Wage and Hour Division.

We should also like to add that under this system the relations between the Wage and Hour Division and the Solicitor's office have been entirely harmonious, and it is felt that the plan will reduce to a minimum any frictions which might occur among subordinate personnel.

Respectfully,

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Administrator, Wage and Hour Division.
GERARD D. REILLY,
Solicitor of Labor.

RADIO INTERVIEW OF MAYOR VINCENT J. MURPHY BY HAROLD JOHN ADONIS

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following interview of Mayor Vincent J. Murphy, of Newark, N. J., by Harold John Adonis, director, New Jersey State Governmental Bureau of Research, in one of the forum broadcasts over station WINS on May 31, 1941:

Mr. ADONIS. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Today we are privileged to present, as a guest speaker on our Know Your Government Forum, Mayor Vincent J. Murphy, of Newark, N. J., who will be interviewed on the subject Newark's State of Progress.

One of New Jersey's distinguished citizens and public officials, Mayor Murphy occupies several other positions of trust and importance. Three Governors have honored him with appointments to State-wide public posts. The first chief executive to thus honor him was former Governor Hoffman, who named him as a member of the unemployment compensation commission; the succeeding Governor, A. Harry Moore, reappointed him to the commission. This year newly elected Gov. Charles Edison appointed him as a member of the New Jersey Industrial Peace Commission.

Mayor Murphy has also distinguished himself in the field of labor, where he has attracted widespread attention for his indefatigable efforts in its behalf. The present secretary of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, Mayor Murphy is probably the only labor mayor in the Nation holding such high municipal office in a city of Newark's size, population, and industrial importance.

Mayor Murphy, I am happy, indeed, to welcome you to our forum.

Mayor MURPHY. Thank you, Mr. Adonis. I am glad to be here. I know our listeners will find much of interest in today's talk relating to Newark's state of progress.

Mr. ADONIS. I am sure they shall, Mayor Murphy. Meanwhile, will you tell us something about the background of Newark? What type of a city is it and what are the key sources of its activities?

Mayor MURPHY. Well, the city of Newark, Mr. Adonis, is noted primarily as an industrial center. Its activities in this direction are many and varied. Today it occupies a very vital role in the national-defense program.

Mr. ADONIS. In what way, Mayor Murphy?

Mayor MURPHY. I mean that Newark, Mr. Adonis, is now, in company with the State of New Jersey, receiving and filling a major share of defense orders. It is my hope, as mayor of Newark, to do everything in my power to attract additional industries to settle within our community. It is common knowledge that Newark offers these industries now or soon to be engaged in national-defense production many advantages not found in other centers.

Mr. ADONIS. Could you tell us, Mayor Murphy, what some of these advantages are?

Mayor MURPHY. Briefly these are, first, our inland waterways; second, our main-stem railways; third, our highway system; fourth, our airport facilities; and fifth, our geographical, commercial, and industrial advantages.

Mr. ADONIS. What are some of the major industries located in Newark?

Mayor MURPHY. Time, of course, does not permit a detailed listing. However, any partial grouping would include machinery, electrical appliances and necessaries, thread, lumber, chemicals, jewelry, insurance—life, fire, and indemnity—and novelties.

Mr. ADONIS. Well, Mayor Murphy, that is quite a list, even though it is a partial one. And now, what can you tell us of Newark's financial status?

Mayor MURPHY. I am glad you asked that question, Mr. Adonis. As a matter of fact, we in Newark now find ourselves selling our bonds at a lower rate of interest than at any other time in our history.

Mr. ADONIS. What is the present rate?

Mayor MURPHY. It averages 3 percent. In many cases, too, our city has sold its bonds at a premium.

Mr. ADONIS. That is another "feather in the cap" for Newark, Mr. Mayor.

Mayor MURPHY. Yes, it is, and I know that our citizens and taxpayers may look forward to more accomplishments in this, our new administration.

Mr. ADONIS. What do you imply by "new administration"?

Mayor MURPHY. As you know, the city of Newark has just completed its city-commission election, and a new administration has come into existence. Of the previous body, only two commissioners—Joseph M. Byrne, Jr., and myself—have been returned to office. The new members are Commissioners Brady, Keenan, and Viliani.

Mr. ADONIS. Do you believe, then, Mr. Mayor, that your new administration is now in a more advantageous position to carry out a program of achievements?

Mayor MURPHY. Yes; I do. Under our new administration we, the entire membership, are firmly determined to work on a cooperative basis for the general welfare of the entire city and its inhabitants.

I might point out, at this time, that experience has always shown that united effort in the discharge of public duties by the duly constituted officials is vital to continued progress.

If we bear in mind that our city should be, first, a better Newark, and then, a greater Newark, I am sure we can expect the measure and degree of municipal fulfillment essential to our daily needs.

Mr. ADONIS. I agree with you, Mr. Mayor. In the meantime, I have heard it said on frequent occasions that Newark has a very unique system of budgetary control.

Mayor MURPHY. Indeed, it has. I should like to emphasize that our methods of budgetary control, bookkeeping, tax billing, and accounting are estimated by many leading authorities to be the most modern and efficient now in operation.

Mr. ADONIS. Mayor Murphy, those who attended your recent induction as Newark's new chief executive were loud in their praise for the vigorous, forceful, and commendatory manner in which you outlined the policies to be followed in your administration. Would you at this time care to add anything to your former statement?

Mayor MURPHY. I would, indeed, Mr. Adonis. The present tempo of international and domestic affairs, the rapidly changing sense of values and of beliefs, the need for constant adjustment of individual and collective opinions—all these are factors in our current daily life that force us to adapt ourselves to present needs and requirements.

In the city of Newark, for example, I feel there is a positive necessity for maintaining a progressive system of real- and personalty-tax inventory in order to more equitably levy assessments on those doing business and residing within our midst. In addition to that, to promote the desire on the part of those outside of Newark, to locate in our city.

This deals with the definite consideration that must be given to the life of property, its obsolescence, income factors, and depreciation. Meanwhile, thought must be devoted to new technological mechanization and trends in neighborhood changes, so that industrial, mercantile, and residential possibilities may be explored to their utmost extent; thereby giving some measure of assurance that the overhead costs for municipal taxes will make it possible for those in Newark to remain as contented taxpayers, and also to attract other desirable enterprises.

By establishing and conducting such a comprehensive program of procedure, we will thus be afforded the opportunity to broaden our tax base and to spread the load so that the responsibility for maintaining local government functions and obligations will not bear too heavily on any individual taxpayer or group of taxpayers.

It is my avowed intention to initiate within the immediate future a regular periodic and systematic campaign to acquaint the entire Nation with Newark's attractive and lucrative possibilities.

I hold myself in readiness at all times to assist any and all efforts designed to foster and enhance Newark's stature, both as a leading industrial center and as a progressive residential community, completely modern, efficient, and wholesome in thought and endeavor.

Mr. ADONIS. Mayor Murphy, I know our listeners are very much impressed with the expression of your sentiments with respect to Newark's outlook. I know, too, that under your administration efficiency of governmental operation will continue to thrive and prosper.

At this juncture, may I ask you a rather intimate question?

Mayor MURPHY. I wish you would, Mr. Adonis. You know that we public officials have little of the privacy enjoyed by the average citizens. However, this is as it should be, and you may depend upon me to answer to the best of my ability whatever questions you think will be of interest to our listeners, both in and out of Newark.

Mr. ADONIS. Thank you, Mr. Mayor. You have the laudable attitude that is so much a part of your meritorious record as a public official, local and State.

My question is, What is your personal view on the current domestic emergency, and what do you, as one of the Nation's leading chief municipal executives, believe can be done to effect national solidarity?

Mayor MURPHY. To my mind, the present domestic emergency is one that calls for united action on the part of every loyal American citizen. This is the time for unity of mind and achievement, and a period in our existence when differences of opinion must be submerged for the continued success of the national-defense effort.

America has undertaken a positive stand in the face of international upheaval. Our entire resources of manpower, machinery, and moral support are marshaled to the colors. We must and shall devote our total energies to the task which lies ahead. In that direction of united endeavor lies the safety and security of our Nation.

Mr. ADONIS. Thank you, Mayor Murphy.

Your presence here today was a most welcomed one, and truly indicative of your distinguished qualities of public leadership.

Progress Made by Farm Security Administration Borrowers of the Third District of Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

LETTER FROM THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a letter received by me from Hon. C. R. Baldwin, Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, evidencing the splendid record of the farmers whom I have the honor to represent in discharging their obligations and the substantial gains which they have made as a result of the aid extended to them by the Federal Government.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MAY 31, 1941.

Hon. MARTIN F. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SMITH: Since the beginning of the present emergency, it has been generally recognized that the health, welfare, and morale of our people are vitally important to national defense. Providing for these needs among low-income farm families has been one of the essential contributions of the Farm Security Administration to the Nation's defense efforts during the past year.

We have just completed a special survey undertaken last winter to measure the progress being made by borrowers from the Farm Security Administration. It indicates the gains in terms of money, living standards, and capacity for self-support which have been made during 1940 by handicapped and low-income farm people all over the country. It occurred to me that you might be interested in seeing the figures for your district.

In the Third District of Washington there were 681 active standard rehabilitation borrowers at the end of 1940. The survey showed that the average borrower earned a net income of $878 during the year, as compared with $671 in the year before he borrowed from Farm Security. In other words, the typical family increased its annual net income by 31 percent.

This means that Farm Security borrowers in the Third District have increased their total annual incomes by $140,919. Naturally this growth in prosperity and purchasing power has been reflected on the books of merchants and other businessmen of the district.

We were pleased to find that borrowers in your district are rapidly repaying their rehabilitation loans. Already $314,102 has been repaid on loans totaling $1,284,584, although much of the money does not fall due for 4 or 5 years. Throughout the entire country, rehabilitation loans totaling $420,865,050 had been made as of December 31, 1940, and $149,626,442 of this sum had been repaid. As you know, loan funds currently are advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, instead of coming from direct appropriations.

In view of the fact that none of the borrowers from Farm Security was able to get adequate credit anywhere else, and that many of them formerly were on relief, we feel that this repayment record is a tribute to the honesty and industry of these needy farm people. There is ample evidence that the great majority of them are getting back on their feet and becoming permanently self-supporting. In large measure, this progress is due to the advice and technical guidance in sound farm and home management which accompanies each Farm Security loan.

For example, we encourage our borrowers to get away from one-crop farming—particularly of surplus crops, such as cotton, tobacco, and wheat—and to raise as much as possible of their own food and feed for their livestock. During 1940, the average farm security family in your district produced $279 worth of goods for home consumption, as compared with $184 before they came into the F. S. A. program. This produce for home use included 406 gallons of milk per family; 359 pounds of meat; and 357 quarts of vegetables and fruit canned for the winter. This increased production of food did not, of course, add to the supply in the commercial markets, since virtually none of it was offered for sale. It simply meant a better diet, better health, and a rising standard of living for these families.

Often it has been necessary to work out an adjustment of the family's old debts before rehabilitation could be successful. Local farm-debt-adjustment committees have been set up for this purpose. They have no legal authority to compel adjustments, but by bringing the farmer and his creditors together for a friendly discussion, they usually are able to arrange a scale-down of the obligations, reduced interest rates, or extension of the payment period. Such adjustments frequently save the farmer from foreclosure, and at the same time enable the creditors to get substantial payments on what might otherwise have been bad debts.

This service is available to all farmers, whether or not they are rehabilitation borrowers. Altogether, debt reductions totaling $79,408 have been negotiated for individual farmers in your district. This represents a scale-down of 11.6 percent. As a direct result of these adjustments, $5,049 in back taxes has been paid to local governmental agencies.

In addition, reductions totaling $132,346, or 47.3 percent, have been negotiated in the debts owed by irrigation districts and similar farm groups.

In making this special survey, our field employees reported that there are 551 families in your district who are eligible and in need of rehabilitation loans but have been unable to get them because of the limited funds available.

In addition to the rehabilitation program, Farm Security is carrying out the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, which provides a limited number of loans to competent tenants to enable them to buy family type farms.

During the first 3 years of this program we made 12 such loans in your district, totaling $88,851. This year we expect to make about 8 Bankhead-Jones loans in the Third District, amounting to approximately $56,000. Throughout the country delinquencies of these loans have amounted so far to only 2.6 percent, or $23,658; and this has been more than offset by the fact that other borrowers have been able to make advance payments totaling $196,765, as the result of good crops and management.

I am hopeful that this rather detailed report may be useful to you; and if you would like to have any further facts about our program, I shall, of course, be glad to supply them. Sometime during the year I hope that you may find an opportunity to visit some of the borrowers from F. S. A. in your district, and see for yourself the efforts they are making to get a new start as independent, taxpaying citizens.

Sincerely,

C. B. BALDWIN,
Administrator.

EDITORIAL FROM THE DELAWARE COUNTY (N. Y.) DAIRYMAN

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Delaware County (N. Y.) Dairyman of May 30, 1941:

[From the Delaware County (N. Y.) Dairyman of May 30, 1941]

PHRASE MAKING

After the President's fireside chat Tuesday evening his hearers were but little forwarder as to the administration's foreign policy, and more so in their conviction that he is a phrase maker par excellence.

His affirmation of the solidarity of the Western Hemisphere and the preservation of its status quo was but a restatement of the Monroe Doctrine in other terms. Whether or not supply lanes to Britain were to be kept open by policing by the Navy, whether or not supplies were to be protected by United States convoys the President was careful not to say.

His most significant statement was the declaration of an all-out national emergency. Its significance is seen, as it recalls the wide powers delegated by Congress to the President if and when he believes such a declaration necessary. He has made it, but we are not further in our knowledge of what he proposes to do.

He also said that the administration and the public had a right to expect harmony between "capital and capital, capital and labor, and labor and labor," a fine epigrammatic phrase, but he failed to say what, with his well-nigh unlimited power and opportunity, he proposed to do to effect it. When one recalls that only a few days ago a powerful labor leader said that "one man" could stop labor strikes in short order and indicated that "one man" was the Chief Executive, his hearers naturally wonder what the President proposes to do.

Generally commenting on the entire chat, a good many of his hearers felt that they had listened for a half hour to a series of well-turned sentences, but, so far as real information or profit, they might better have turned to a neighboring station and listened to the report of a minor ball game, and it wasn't much of a game at that.

Marine Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

LETTER FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, on May 14, 1941, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY] inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an extension of remarks in which there was included a syndicated article relating to marine insurance. I submit for the RECORD a letter with reference to the same subject written to me by Admiral Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, May 19, 1941.

Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND,
Chairman, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE BLAND: In pursuance of your request referring to a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 14 at page 4043 regarding insurance of American vessels and the quotation of a writer in a Washington newspaper, I submit herewith some pertinent observations.

As illustrative of the information which can be obtained by most anyone, including belligerents, any person with the slightest knowledge of transportation can enumerate many ways by which anyone could with but very little effort ascertain when and where hundreds of vessels are to sail and data relative to their cargoes, itineraries, and ports of calls, days, and weeks in advance—all without any reference whatsoever to marine insurance.

Many daily newspapers publish advertisements of vessels, sailing dates, ports of destination, names of operators, and in many instances the dates upon which vessels are expected to be at various ports. Vessel operators publish these advertisements to solicit business, both freight and passengers. Trade journals and shipping pamphlets which are distributed to the trade by the operators disclose full information concerning itineraries and schedules, which traffic people need in preparing shipments for export. All traffic men necessarily know the usual ports of call of American vessels of all the companies in the various trade routes, and must have this information in arranging for the transportation of shipments. Railroad and truck employees handle the shipments and documents relating thereto showing the vessels, their destinations, and the names of consignees. When shipments are assembled on the piers awaiting loading the stevedores and other employees all have access to this information. Customs brokers and their employees who handle the manifests and customs documents have complete information for preparation of the vessels' sailings. Even employees of tugs and lighters that bring cargo alongside a vessel for loading could obtain information concerning the vessel and its ports of call. Steamship company employees, shipping commissioners' offices, inspectors, and the crews of the vessels are all informed of the details of the itinerary. The interior plans and details of vessels are published regularly in most technical and shipping magazines, and general particulars are currently published in the American Bureau of Shipping Register, the Department of Commerce List of Merchant Vessels, Lloyd's Register, and similar publications. At the present time the itineraries of the voyage are used as determining factors in fixing wage scales, bonuses, and crew insurance provisions. These are the facts known to those who are engaged in ocean shipping.

It is readily apparent from the foregoing that there are a great many sources of information concerning the movements of vessels other than through marine insurance, which would furnish those wishing it rather complete information.

The following three questions were suggested on the floor of the House of Representatives:

First. Whether or not foreign insurance companies located in the axis countries are in reality getting insurance business on United States ships.

Second. To what extent secret United States data is being learned through direct insurance or reinsurance coverage.

Third. Failure of the Martime Commission to intelligently administer the Government marine-insurance fund so as to be able to supply the insurance requirements of the American shipowners.

The following replies are given to the questions above, and I include a résumé of the authority granted to the Commission by Congress and our procedure with respect to insurance:

No. 1. There are no known foreign insurance companies located in the axis countries insuring or reinsuring United States-flag vessels. There are branches in the United States of the General Insurance Co., Ltd., of Trieste and Venice, Trieste, Italy; the Switzerland General Insurance Co., Ltd., Zurich, Switzerland; and the Tokyo Marine & Fire Insurance Co., Ltd., Tokyo, Japan, who are subscribers to the American Marine Insurance Syndicate C and authorized to do an insurance business in the United States. The Commission has no record of any other insurance companies who may be called axis companies participating in insurance on vessels in which the Commission has a legal or equitable interest. The Commission does not have complete insurance records on other American-flag vessels. However, we have no knowledge of any axis marine insurance companies participating in the latter group of American vessels. The Neiji Insurance Co., of Tokyo, and other companies suggested in the news article quoted are not known to be participating in such marine insurance business.

The syndicate constitutes almost the entire marine hull insurance market and is composed of domestic companies and the branches of foreign companies established in the United States and authorized to do business under the laws of the State in which they operate. The domestic companies control the syndicate and underwrite 75 percent of the business of the syndicate. The domestic companies reinsure in the English market probably 10 percent of their direct risks, generally with respect to the high-valued vessels. Twenty-five percent of the direct insurance is underwritten by the foreign-admitted branches who are members, and domestically incorporated companies controlled by foreign interests are members under the status of admitted companies—not domestic companies. All the members of the syndicate reinsure among themselves, within limitations as to amounts which may be accepted by the admitted companies.

All the admitted branches which are subscribers of the syndicate are subject to the jurisdiction of the superintendent of insurance of the State of New York. Likewise they are under control of the other States in which they are authorized to do business. No funds can be remitted to their home offices without the permission of the superintendent of insurance. These branches are independent underwriting units and there is little need for them to communicate information concerning policies and risks in which they participate to their home offices. Managers of the above-named admitted branches are known to be reliable officials who have been in charge of insurance activities in the United States for years, are believed to be for the most part American citizens, and are considered as dependable as those officials in charge of domestic insurance companies.

Approximately 10 percent of hull insurance on American oceangoing vessels is underwritten by domestic and English companies not members of the syndicate.

Cargo insurance is underwritten by the same companies who participate in the hull insurance, but they act individually with respect to cargo and not through the syndicate. (In writing cargo insurance the admitted companies are under the supervision of the laws of the State in which they operate.) The cargo underwriters may reinsure cargo risks among themselves or with foreign companies, but this is limited to companies in the English market. With respect to the reinsurance of cargo war risks, the American Cargo War Risk Reinsurance Exchange, composed of any companies which are authorized to do business in any State, accepts all reinsurance on cargo war risks offered to it and distributes the risks among the members of the companies on a prearranged basis as to amount and at a uniform rate. The same general conditions which relate to hull marine and war-risk insurance are applicable to cargo insurance.

The Axis insurance companies' policies have not been considered satisfactory security since the commencement of this war, and consequently their policies have not been accepted by American cargo owners, for the same reasons that they are not acceptable by American shipowners.

No. 2. It is not believed that secret data goes to Axis countries through direct marine insurance or reinsurance because of the conditions set forth in the preceding paragraphs. The British insurance market has by far the greatest portion of our foreign-held insurance and reinsurance.

No. 3. The Maritime Commission considers the administration of the Government marine insurance fund and the authority to insure and reinsure marine and war risks as fully in accord with the intent of Congress and the scope of the provisions of Public, No. 677, Seventy-sixth Congress, being subtitle insurance, title II, Merchant Marine Act 1936, as amended, approved June 29, 1940; sections 9 and 10, Merchant Marine Act, 1920; and sections 503 and 712, Merchant Marine Act, 1936, which are explained in detail hereafter.

Section 221 (a) subtitle, insurance, Merchant Marine Act, 1936, covering the general scope of the Commission's authority with respect to insurance and the most recently granted by Congress, and in anticipation of possible war conditions, as follows:

"For the purpose of protecting the waterborne commerce of the United States from the impediments and burdens arising from the lack of adequate facilities for the insurance of such commerce, due to extraordinary risks arising under existing war conditions, the Commission is authorized to provide marine insurance and reinsurance against loss or damage by the risks of war and reinsurance against loss or damage by marine risks, as prescribed in this subtitle, whenever it appears to the Commission that such insurance adequate for the needs of the water-borne commerce of the United States cannot be obtained on reasonable terms and conditions from companies authorized to do an insurance business in a State of the United States."

Other paragraphs of this subtitle enumerate the class of insurance and procedure to be followed:

Section 10, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, provides that the Commission may insure against all hazards commonly covered by insurance policies "any legal or equitable interest of the United States (1) in any vessel constructed or in process of construction; and (2) in any plants or property in the possession or under authority of the Board" (now Commission).

Section 503, Merchant Marine Act, 1936, provides that purchasers of vessels constructed under title V of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 shall comply with the provisions of section 9 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, with respect to any portion of the purchase price remaining unpaid on such vessels. Section 9, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, provides that upon any vessel where payments of the purchase price are deferred the purchaser shall keep the vessel insured "(a) against loss or damage by fire, and against marine risks and disasters, and war and other risks if the Board (Commission) so specifies," and "(b) by protection and indemnity insurance with such insurance companies, associations, or underwriters and under such forms of policies and to such an amount as the Board (Commission) may prescribe or approve." Section 712 requires charterers to fully insure vessels as approved by the Commission.

Under the foregoing provisions of the law the Commission requires vessel owners and charterers to properly insure vessels to protect the interest of the Government in such vessels. In approving the marine insurance submitted by mortgagors and charterers the Commission has close contact with the American marine insurance market and is familiar with the companies composing that market. It has been considered one of the primary responsibilities of the Commission to develop and maintain a strong American insurance market so that American operators may not be compelled to rely completely upon foreign underwriters of any nationality. The Commission has urged American owners and operators to place their insurance in the private commercial market in order to give the commercial market, primarily American, a wider spread of insurance coverage, thereby tending to spread risks and assist in minimizing insurance rates. The Commission insures a small portion of a number of vessels in which the Government has an interest and also assists the commercial market, and vessel owners by assuming a portion of the risk upon the high-valued vessels for which the private market cannot supply full coverage, but such portion cannot exceed the amount of the Government's interest in the vessel, and is usually much less than that amount. While the Commission does not attempt to compete with the private market, it does keep fully informed of the rates and practices of the private market and can use the underwriting authority vested in it by section 10, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, as a control over the market, if it is apparent that rates and forms of policies are not fair and reasonable. It has been the policy of the Commission to strengthen and expand the American marine insurance market.

In obtaining marine and war-risk insurance, the owner of an American-flag vessel as a general rule deals through his insurance broker and obtains rate quotations from the American and English markets. The insurance rates are based upon the loss experience of the vessel or fleet of vessels, the valuation of the vessels, and the premium return to the underwriters. Usually the majority of the insurance is placed in the market which quotes the most favorable rate, but the Commission has urged that the majority be placed in the American market. This same general procedure is also followed in obtaining protection and indemnity insurance, and a majority of this form of protection is placed in the American market, largely because the terms of the policies are more favorable in the American market.

Upon vessels in which the Government has a legal or equitable interest and for which insurance is required, the policies and the underwriters must be approved by the Commission before such protection is accepted.

Marine-insurance policies are issued for 1 year and contain a general statement of the world areas in which the vessel will be operated. If damage occurs beyond such areas, the underwriter uses such deviation as a defense against claims. At the time the insurance attaches for the policy year the insurance underwriting companies do not necessarily know the location of the vessels, nor do they receive advices during the term of the policies indicating the movements of the vessels covered.

Insurance policies insuring against the perils of war (war-risk insurance) are issued for each voyage and the cost of this insurance depends upon the itinerary of the vessels, the ports of call, and the conditions existing at the time of sailing. Both the American and English companies participating directly in the insurance must be given full information as to the risks which they are to assume including the itinerary of the vessel, so that an appropriate rate for the insurance can be fixed.

The marine war-risk underwriters frequently, but not always, shift some of their liability to other insurance companies by reinsuring a part of the risk. The insurance companies, which may be in the American or foreign markets, the latter being almost entirely British, do not as a rule receive detailed information of the vessel or its itinerary immediately, because they rely upon the primary insurer to obtain full particulars, and such information as they do generally receive is received so late that it would not be of much value to anyone interested in the movements of vessels. It could, however, be obtained promptly if desired. There does not appear to be any danger from these data being received in the British market now available.

Public, No. 677, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved June 29, 1940, authorizes the Commission to insure and reinsure American vessels and property against the perils of war and also to reinsure American vessels and property against marine risks, when it appears to the Commission that such insurance adequate for the needs of the water-borne commerce of the United States cannot be obtained on reasonable terms and at reasonable rates from companies authorized to do an insurance business in a State of the United States. The foregoing clearly indicates the intention of Congress that the Commission exercise this authority only when the commercial market became inadequate. So far from close contact with the industry and steamship operators and also numerous conferences there has not appeared to be the inadequacy in either the hull marine or the cargo insurance commercial market as contemplated by the Congress as a condition precedent, and the Maritime Commission has not felt disposed to engage in the general insurance and reinsurance business. The Commission has granted assistance, however, through the provisions of section 10, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, and continuously considered all developments to determine promptly whether Public, No. 677 should be made effective.

If all American insurance companies carried all of the required insurance to the exclusion of the English market and other foreign markets, it would be necessary to guard against the dissemination of information by employees in more than 60 insurance companies, all of which may be interested in any one vessel. If the Commission reinsured these companies, thus obviating the necessity for any of them communicating with foreign markets, the employees of the Commission engaged in handling the reinsurance would also have such information. All of these employees would, of course, be added to those enumerated above engaged in the normal transportation activities who have information concerning vessel movements. If Congress authorized the Commission to do so, which it has not as yet, all the insurance against marine risks and perils of war could be underwritten by the Commission; however, this would not prevent information as to vessels, their cargoes, and itineraries being known by a great many persons, because of the facts set forth above and also because of the large number of employees who would be required to handle this vast amount of insurance business. Moreover, were the Commission authorized to underwrite all such insurance, the private insurance companies would be forced out of business and the employees of such companies would be forced to seek other employment. Likewise the insurance brokers and their organizations would be forced out of business. The difficulty of reestablishing these American insurance facilities after the emergency is quite apparent and it is impossible to say whether they could ever again be reestablished with any degree of satisfaction to the merchant marine industry, which would again be forced to accept full coverage in the foreign market.

The S. S. America is at present insured against marine risks and the perils of war. The marine policies were arranged in July 1940 and will expire 1 year later. The amount of marine insurance required, $17,600,000 was so large that the American and English markets were called upon to insure the maximum amounts they could offer, but nevertheless it was necessary for the Commission to supplement these markets and underwrite a part of the risk. The hull marine insurance on the America is as follows: American Syndicate, $4,000,000; American market other than the syndicate, $380,457; London market, $2,781,049; and Maritime Commission, $3,838,494; the rate for all the foregoing insurance was 1⅞ percent. Disbursement insurance was underwritten as follows: American market other than syndicate, $112,000; American market, $171,500; Maritime Commission, $6,316,500; the rate for the foregoing disbursements insurance was thirteen-sixteenth percent.

The war-risk insurance on the S. S. America was arranged in the same markets as the hull insurance and in the amount of $11,820,000 for a period of 40 days at the rate of 13½ cents per hundred dollars, for three cruises to the West Indies, the last of which will be completed on or about May 22, 1941. The amounts of war-risk insurance are as follows: American Syndicate, $4,000,000; American market other than syndicate, $1,234,158; London market, $1,510,500; Maritime Commission, $5,075,342.

The outline of the membership of the American Marine Insurance Syndicate, its method of operation and participation given above shows the method by which the insurance on the S. S. America was arranged for marine and war risks in the above amounts.

I have gone into considerable detail in the foregoing statement inasmuch as the subject is one which has received very careful consideration within the Commission and within other Government establishments. I believe the foregoing outlines the practical situation as it exists and I trust furnishes you with the statement you desire.

Sincerely yours,

E. S. LAND, Chairman.

RESOLUTIONS OF LIONS CLUBS OF MUNISING, ESCANABA, AND SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a copy of the resolution adopted by the Munising Lions Club, Munising, Mich.; the Escanaba Lions Club, Escanaba, Mich.; and the Soo Lions Club, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., asking the Michigan Senators and Representatives in Congress from Michigan, to aid in enacting legislation enabling the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project, as a means of bringing a new era to the country's most important agricultural and industrial regions.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Whereas Michigan is the largest producer of export merchandise in the United States; and

Whereas the midwestern section of our Nation, which is a part of the Great Lakes region, produces more agricultural commodities and has more industrial production than any other section of the country; and

Whereas the people of Michigan possess the natural right to ship agricultural, mineral, and industrial products from their ports to the markets of America and the world in the most economical manner; and

Whereas the deepening of the St. Lawrence River will enable us to make our full contribution to the needs of our Nation and to participate in the post-war program of world rehabilitation and stabilization; and

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt has called to the attention of the American people and the Members of Congress the importance of completing the St. Lawrence seaway as soon as possible, not only as a defense measure but as a means of bringing a new era to the country's most important agricultural and industrial regions: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Munising Lions Club, Munising, Mich.; Escanaba Lions Club, Escanaba, Mich.; Soo Lions Club, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., That we do formally and respectfully request the Michigan Senators and Representatives in our National Congress to aid in enacting legislation enabling the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives from Michigan in our National Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

MUNISING LIONS CLUB,
J. H. BLIZEL, Secretary.
ESCANABA LIONS CLUB,
H. J. YELLAND, President.

Song of the Rolling Coulter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

POEM BY DON GRAY

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, one of the activities which seems to be universal in this country is to write poetry. I use the word "poetry" advisedly. Most of it is merely doggerel. The other day in the Janesville Daily Gazette, of Janesville, Wis., I ran across something I think will have an appeal to every Member of the House who has ever walked behind a plow. This is the Song of the Rolling Coulter. This is of a steel plow which was invented in the Middle West many years ago. These verses were written by a graduate of Milton College who lives on a farm near my home city, and I may say that he is now employed in making machine tools for defense. This is the poem:

SONG OF THE ROLLING COULTER

I cut the sod, the lush green sod,
And the mold of last year's stubble—
On through the clover roots, rod on rod,
On through the trash and the rubble.

O I am the rolling coulter,
And my rolling falters never—
With the sod in my teeth,
And the share underneath,
I plow the fields forever!

The lark pipes loud on the fence post there,
As we roll the greensward under—
The furrows gleam in the sunshine fair,
But tomorrow there'll be thunder.

So it's rolling, rolling, rolling on,
To the end of the long brown chapter—
A coulter rolling free am I,
And the moldboard follows after.

The rich loam flutters endlessly
To join its fresh-turned brothers,
And even my heart grows sad to see
The grass and flow'rs it smothers.

But I am a rolling coulter,
And I know why the grass is slain—
For the sower will sow
And the rich grain grow
And the bins be full again.

Then what care I for the fields of blood
Where the war-mad worldlings blunder—
Where they use good steel for bayonets
And guns to blast asunder?

The share and I, and the moldboard, too,
We plow in a land of peace,
Where the hearthstones glow, and the strong sons grow,
And the tribes of the just increase.

O I am the rolling coulter,
And I sing of life and laughter—
I plow all day in the fields of God,
And the moldboard follows after!

Genuine Security for the Old Folks of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 4, 1941

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, it is the fundamental responsibility of Congress to plan now to guide the destiny of our country and her course safely over the difficult and dangerous period of her readjustment, which will inevitably fall upon all of us following the war, or following the period of our huge national-defense spending. Democracy has been challenged by the dictators of the world as a failure, and, if democracy is to prove itself, we should and must establish a social-security program which will not only protect the old folks of our country against want and insecurity but which will also operate as a means of maintaining balance between the producer and the consumer.

Congress should enact an old-age assistance program for all American citizens over the age of 60. Among such plans is the Townsend plan, which is a permanent plan designed to restore and maintain prosperity in America. Its objective is to achieve and maintain at all times a sound and prosperous economy through increasing the circulation of money by the spending of a uniform and adequate old-age pension, levied and secured on a pay-as-you-go basis. I believe such a plan will keep old folks from the W. P. A. and relief rolls. Such an act of Congress should not require the aged to mortgage their little homes to participate in such a program; red tape should be cut; and old folks should not be required to sell their possessions to become recipients. The old folks should be entitled to this annuity as a matter of right. A democracy should guarantee this much protection to those folks who have struggled to preserve our democracies, for, after all, we are practically the only remaining democracy on the face of the globe. This is not a partisan question, and I firmly believe that the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, should grant an immediate hearing on H. R. 1036, and to all other groups who have old-age pension legislation before the Ways and Means Committee. If this is not done, I favor the signing of a petition to discharge the Ways and Means Committee and bring any proposed old-age-pension legislation to the floor of the House of Representatives at which time the Members of Congress of the United States will have the opportunity of pressing the will of their electorate. I feel certain a bill that will meet the approval of the people of America will be enacted into law. I herewith submit two resolutions, one from the Westinghouse C. I. O. Local No. 601, with a membership of 11,000, which is one of the largest labor organization locals in America; and the other resolution being from the Wilkinsburg Townsend Club, one of the largest Townsend organizations in Allegheny County, stating that they are in favor of the enactment of a liberal old-age-pension plan.

Whereas there has been introduced for consideration by the Seventy-seventh Congress of the United States a bill to provide for national recovery by raising revenue and retiring citizens past 60 years of age from gainful employment and provide for the general welfare of all the people of the United States, and for other purposes.

Whereas the above-mentioned bill, known as the Townsend National Recovery Plan, has been designated in the House of Representatives and referred to the Ways and Means Committee as House Resolution 1036.

Whereas we believe that it is absolutely necessary that the fundamental principles embodied in the above-proposed legislation must be enacted into law, making those adjustments to our economic and social system, to the end that we may enjoy a sound and permanent prosperity, under our democratic form of government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the membership of the Westinghouse Local 601, United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations, do hereby appeal to you as our elected Representatives in the Congress of the United States, to urge the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, for an immediate hearing, failing in that, to sign a petition to discharge the Ways and Means Committee and bring the proposed legislation to the floor of the House of Representatives, with the honest intent of giving it a fair and just hearing and voting to enact the fundamentals therein into the law of our land.

WESTINGHOUSE C. I. O. LOCAL 601,
East Pittsburgh, Pa.
WM. HUNTER,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

Be it resolved, The Wilkinsburg Townsend Club, No. 3, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., in regular meeting assembled, this 29th day of May, 1941, do hereby appeal to you as our elected Representatives in the Congress of the United States, to urge the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHRON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, for an immediate hearing on H. R. 1036; failing in that, to sign a petition to discharge the Ways and Means Committee and bring the proposed legislation to the floor of the House of Representatives, with the honest intent of giving it a fair and just hearing, and voting to enact the fundamentals therein into the law of our land.

Bridges Admits Falsifying Application for Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE LOS ANGELES EXAMINER

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles Examiner of May 30, 1941:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner of May 30, 1941]

BRIDGES ADMITS FALSIFYING APPLICATION FOR CITIZENSHIP—WATER-FRONT LABOR LEADER ON STAND TELLS OF TAKING COMMUNIST PARTY'S SUPPORT

SAN FRANCISCO, May 29.—Harry Bridges certainly must have yearned today to be back on Angel Island.

Over there, at his nice, soft 1939 deportation trial, it was a cinch for the loquacious and wily Bridges to talk himself out of what the Government had as evidence then. Since then the F. B. I. has been busy—and how!

So today, on the witness stand at his current deportation trial here—facing the most relentless, dynamite-packed, evidence-backed cross-examination that's been heard in any San Francisco courtroom in a long time, Harry Bridges was sunk.

He talked—he talked even more furiously than he ever had to do on Angel Island, but the more he talked the deeper he sank into a quicksand of evasions and contradictions and errors and misstatements. When, at 4 o'clock, the session ended, Bridges was up to his neck.

By that time he'd been trying to dodge the drumfire of Government Prosecutor Albert Del Guercio's questions for only 3 hours. But in those 3 hours Harry Bridges got into this mess—

ADMITS LIES IN CITIZENSHIP PLEA

1. He admitted that he had lied, under oath, in his citizenship applications. And with that subject the Government is, as yet, far from finished.

2. He admitted that he had accepted the Communist Party's support and that he had, in turn, given his own support to the Communist Party, its policies, and its individuals.

3. He admitted that he himself, during the 1934 strike, had taken seamen—more than a hundred of them—up to the headquarters of the Communist Marine Workers Industrial Union, and had there signed them up with Harry Jackson, and that he knows Harry Jackson is a Communist.

4. He admitted that time and again he had gone to the Communist headquarters at 37 Grove Street here, had bought Communist literature there. He still has some of it. He didn't deny that he'd "retained and applied" what he learned from those Red documents in his waterfront labor activities.

5. He admitted, in an hour-long losing battle of words and proof with Del Guercio, that what he had testified at Angel Island about his connection with the Waterfront Worker (a 1934 strike publication characterized by the prosecution as a Communist sheet) was untrue.

ADMITS HIRING MEN AT 50 CENTS A DAY

6. He admitted, red-faced and squirming in his chair, that while he howled to the heavens about what a splendid, fine union man he was, he went out and hired jobless seamen for a 50-cent-a-day wage to go out and peddle his Waterfront Workers.

In between, among, and around all those major admissions Bridges talked himself into such a pathetic tangle of inaccuracies, evasions, and contradictions that Presiding Judge Charles B. Sears looked at him in obvious pity, and his own lawyers looked at him in gray-faced apprehension.

Late this afternoon, when the trial day ended, Bridges was trying to get out of the trap he'd fallen into in Del Guercio's questions about his connection with that Waterfront Worker. Caught again and again in flat contradictions here, as compared to what he swore to on Angel Island, Bridges flew into a red-faced rage—the first time he has lost the aplomb and self-control he so jealously prides himself upon. At last, caught in another contradiction, he yelled:

"I don't have to check my testimony here with what I said at the last hearing on Angel Island—not unless I was lying."

"Well," grinned Del Guercio, "are you lying?"

"Ah—I don't know—I mean, that depends on who's gonna judge whether I am or not," said Bridges.

JUDGE SMACKS GAVEL AND FROWNS

On the bench, Judge Sears, the man "who's gonna judge," smacked his gavel into the palm of his hand and frowned hard at Bridges.

It was no easy work for Del Guercio to drive Bridges into the corners he caught him in. Bridges exerted all the shrewdness, the wiles, the trickery for which even his detractors give him credit. It wasn't enough. The Government had too much on him. So, battering him down with questions he couldn't evade, Del Guercio dragged from Bridges the admission that it was in cooperation with known Communist Harry Jackson that the Bridges group took over and published the Waterfront Worker; that Bridges' 1934 strike committee, at his advocacy, accepted the offer of a delegation of three top Communists of the California-Nevada district of the Communist Party, to print the strike bulletin under the auspices of the Western Worker, official organ of the Communist Party; that Roy Hudson, a member of the central committee of the Communist Party in America, came to Bridges' office in 1936, was admitted, and engaged in a huddle there with Bridges, a huddle that lasted "from 10 minutes to an hour," according to Bridges, who didn't dare set the time more definitely.

Bridges' cross-examination began less than an hour after today's session opened.

On the very first question Prosecutor Del Guercio fired at him, Bridges vented his spleen spainst the Hearst newspapers.

(At Angel Island trial, in 1939, Bridges had repeatedly screamed his hatred for the Hearst press; obtruded it again and again into his efforts to dodge the cross-examiner's queries.)

Del Guercio's first question was:

"Now, Mr. Bridges, don't you attribute your success as a gr-r-r-r-r-reat labor leader, even in a small way, to support given you by the Communist Party?"

"Nahr," snarled Bridges, "I might attribute it mahr to the attacks on me by the Hearst press."

SAYS HE RECEIVED SUPPORT OF REDS

"But you have received Communist support, haven't you?"

"That's correct; I've received support from other parties, too."

"And you have supported the Communist Party and its leaders, haven't you?"

"Yes and no," cracked Bridges.

"What do you mean?" demanded Del Guercio.

"I've supported individuals and policies of all parties," dodged Bridges.

"Well," persisted Del Guercio, "tell us just when you supported the Communist Party. Never mind the others."

"I daown't knaow," drawled Bridges. "You'd 'ave to nile it daown."

"You said you did support the Communists. Now tell us when."

"I gave a general answer to a general question."

"You mean that you refuse to answer?"

"I can't answer the question as you put it."

F. B. I.'S RECORD COVERS DETAILS

Del Guercio then switched into Bridges' life—fortified by a huge mass of documentary data, gathered by the F. B. I. in its months-long investigation into Bridges' background, last year.

If Bridges had hoped, by being vague as to his dates, to dodge being pinned down by the Government's cross-quiz, this early start of Del Guercio smashed that hope. For it was obvious, at once, that the F. B. I. has taken Bridges' life apart, day by day, week by week, month by month—almost hour by hour. It gives Bridges no chance to scuttle into a vague memory, if he hopes so.

Del Guercio started on Australia—and right away brought out a strange and significant point. Bridges, boasting one instant about how well he knew his native Australia's labor history, suddenly developed a complete blackout of memory when Del Guercio asked him what the I. W. W.'s part in that labor history was.

(Bridges has admitted he joined the I. W. W. here in America. But he has testified, earlier here, that he didn't know it was an outfit of sabotage and destruction.)

Now, suddenly, he professed utter ignorance, despite his vaunted familiarity with Australia's turbulent labor history, that the I. W. W. had burned docks, set a city afire, sabotaged property in Australia while he was a part of the labor movement there. And he said he didn't know the I. W. W. had been outlawed in Australia.

To him, said Bridges, the I. W. W. was "just a trade-union—and a little better'n some I've seen around."

And when Del Guercio asked him if Australia hadn't barred alien I. W. W.'s from the continent and had outlawed the I. W. W. in 1918, Bridges said he didn't know.

Then Del Guercio swung into the detailed record of Bridges' activities in America, beginning with his arrival here on April 12, 1920, as a member of the crew of the ship Ysabel.

"Did you desert your ship?"

"Under British law, I deserted; under your American law, I quit," said Bridges. Del Guercio had him admit that since he was British and the ship, too, then he deserted.

Then the prosecutor really began to show the extent of the Government's knowledge of Bridges. He had before him a detailed record of every ship Bridges had sailed on, what ports he visited, when he signed off, where he spent the intervening time, what he did, when, where—everything in such minute detail that Bridges couldn't have dodged if he'd tried to. He had sense enough not to.

BRIDGES QUIZZED ON SYNDICALISM

Every now and then Del Guercio dropped other matters in. Once he asked if Bridges was in favor of laws against syndicalism.

"No," cried Bridges, "you might mean something different than I do, though. To me, syndicalism means to favor direct action with complete disregard and opposition to political action of any form. I'm not in favor of a union being syndicalistic if it wants to."

Here Presiding Judge Sears interposed a question:

"What do you mean by 'direct action'?"

"I mean not resorting to negotiation, mediation, or arbitration," said Bridges. "You get your results by the direct action of walking off the job. That works all right up to a certain point. * * *"

"What is your position in regard to the criminal syndicalism laws?" asked the prosecutor.

"One hundred percent against them. I worked hard to get rid of some of them."

Then suddenly Del Guercio pulled out Bridges' first declaration of citizenship intent, the one he filed in New Orleans on July 13, 1921.

(Bridges has filed three. Followers of the Bridges case waited for the Government to demand his own explanation of the discrepancies that mark them. Apparently, this time, the Government is going to do that.)

Del Guercio asked if the statements on it were made under oath. Bridges said they were.

"And is all the information you gave therein true?"

"To the best of my knowledge, it is," said Bridges.

BUT BIRTH DATE WAS NOT TRUE

Then, demanded Del Guercio, was the birth date on it Bridges' true birth date?

"No," said Bridges, white-faced. He looked desperately toward his lawyers, ranged along the table before him, for help. They came shouting to his rescue. Up popped Carol Weiss King, his female lawyer from New York, to cry that all this was "immaterial," and to utter loud threats that if the Government was going to show that Bridges was a liar, then Bridges' lawyers "will bring in a large number of character witnesses to his reputation for truth and veracity."

"If you are permitted to," stearnly remarked Judge Sears.

Carol King gulped and said, "Oh, yes; Your Honor," and sat down. But if courtroom watchers were expecting the other Bridges citizenship applications, with other discrepancies, to come out then and there, they were disappointed. The Government didn't go further into that sort of thing then. But the other applications are in the Government's dossier before Prosecutor Del Guercio—along with what the F. B. I. has dug up about it. Del Guercio has plenty of time ahead of him.

The Bridges hearing will be in recess for 3 days over the Memorial Day Weekend.

The International Impact of Evil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] at the convention of the National Retail Dry Goods Association of America in Chicago.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad for an opportunity to discuss with a certain segment of businessmen of America some of the interdependent problems affecting the Nation as a whole, and which are directly joined with current world problems which a somewhat waning civilization must face.

When we look about us and see the world beyond the Western Hemisphere ruled by dictators, necessitous and rapacious to the last degree, we rejoice that we are Americans. We are grateful to the memory of our fathers whose wisdom and foresight were responsible for such a mighty Nation. A meeting of this kind is commonplace in America, but a rarity in the world of nations. The right of peaceful assembly is one of our constitutional guaranties. You come here from every State in the Union, give expression to your thoughts, and pass resolutions after serious consideration of the social, economic, and political questions of the hour. Your opinions are free. Your deliberations are made without governmental influence or restraint. While our Government guarantees free speech and peaceful assembly, it is also the duty of those in Government to consider the studied opinions flowing from meetings of this kind, if such opinions challenge the duties and obligations that members of various branches of government owe to a free society.

If these were ordinary times, it would be unnecessary to discuss foundations upon which our Government has remained secure for over a century and a half. We live in a dangerous world. It is a different world than that America has seen since the Revolutionary period. We live by the side of dictators whose brutal and tyrannical policy now threatens democracy everywhere. We have seen free and innocent peoples crushed and enslaved in the dictators' tyrannical march. Their fate today is primarily due to their tragic failure to recognize in due time the length, the breadth, and the height of the totalitarian philosophy. The people of France quarreled over internal problems. They leisurely passed the time, while Hitler, who is the state, prepared for the crucial hour to strike.

The smaller countries placed their faith in Hitler's pledges and treaties. They too followed the laissez faire policy and shut their eyes to the danger. Even England slept through a long period of irresolution and as a result of her inertia she is in a death struggle with the common enemy of the democracies today. Her people would not follow the advice of Churchill in 1933. Churchill, seeing the early danger of Hitlerism, tried in vain to arouse the English people from a false sense of security. He was a firm advocate of the doctrine laid down by Edmund Burke in 1792, when he declared in a great speech in Parliament "That early and provident fear is the mother of safety."

In our own country there were few who saw the danger signals ahead. President Roosevelt in 1937 made a memorable speech in this city, dedicating a bridge on the outer drive of Michigan Avenue. He saw war coming in Europe. He wanted to avert it and suggested the quarantine of aggressor nations, while at the same time proclaiming that America hated war and searched for peace. For his prescience, his sagacity, and his boldness, he was thereupon condemned by the press, and from the platform as a dictator, warmonger, and interventionist.

Had England followed Churchill in 1933 and prepared—had America followed Roosevelt in 1937 and prepared as we are preparing today upon a basis comparable with what we are doing today, I am certain that World War No. 2 would have been avoided.

Yet I cannot blame the American people in their failure to look ahead. I belong to that class. Americans hate war. We despise it primarily because of the last war, and its failure to make the world safe for democracy.

We have always striven for a lasting world peace. Being in possession of peace, and being far away from the European and Asiatic dictators, we could not visualize the danger ahead, therefore we were unwilling to face the realities and take early and vigorous measures of defense.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the American people saw the Low Countries conquered, when they saw nations that had been at peace with the world 150 years ruthlessly invaded, their goods and chattels appropriated, and their people enslaved, when they saw Italy, Germany, and Japan enter into a tripartite world agreement which took particular pains to single out the United States of America, when they saw Hitler and Stalin sign up a nonagression pact, when they witnessed Hitler conquer one Balkan country after another, the great majority of our people awakened to the all-important fact that Hitler and his co-conspirators hope before they finish their ungodly and imperialistic careers to spread the totalitarian philosophy throughout the world.

So, my friends, the hour is struck. The time has long passed when we can give mere lip service to this thing we call democracy. America furiously prepares for any eventuality, and in this program of preparation she is supported by at least 95 percent of her people. The people of America have been speaking through their Representatives in Congress during the last year. It is no coincidence that every Member of the United States Senate voted for $15,000,000,000 in contract authorizations and appropriations during the la year in order that the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps might ultimately have the planes, the ships, the tanks, and other implements of war, to defend adequately the Western Hemisphere in case of hostile attack. Our foreign policy upon this question was clearly defined by President Roosevelt on May 27 last, when he said: "First, we shall actively resist wherever necessary, and with all our resources, every attempt by Hitler to extend his Nazi domination to the Western Hemisphere, or to threaten it. We shall actively resist his every attempt to gain control of the seas. We insist upon the vital importance of keeping Hitlerism away from any point in the world which could be used, and would be used, as a base of attack against the Americas."

My friends, why did the President of the United States make plain and certain to the people what our foreign policy is in this grave emergency? Why did every man in the United States Senate vote the billions of dollars for defense? Is it because we fear England and the Royal Navy? Is it because we fear France, Canada, Mexico, or some other country in this hemisphere? No; it is because President Roosevelt and every Member of the Senate fears the spread of the Hitler philosophy to the western world. It is our duty under the Constitution to provide for the common defense. That means in time of danger we assume the responsibility for seeing that our country, our homes, our churches, and all remaining free institutions of America are made secure. We prepare because we know that the dictators of Europe and Asia have no responsibility, either to their fellow man, or to Almighty God.

With one Hitler victory after another, and with an avowed determination to conquer the world, we have no hours, no days, no time to lose. And if the people of America can really be convinced of the seriousness of the Hitler threat to democratic institutions everywhere we may be able to stem the tide by giving to beleaguered, besieged, but unafraid Britain the necessary tools to finish the job, but, regardless of any and all combinations that may threaten this country in the future, we must be in a position to meet and defeat the challenge. It is well that the dictators remember that we have as a background 300 years of liberty engrained in the bone and sinew of American life, and well may the people of this Nation remember that such way of life will be continued indefinitely if the American people exhibit the high type of patriotism, courage, and sacrifice that were so strikingly demonstrated by the founding fathers when they removed forever tyranny and oppression from this land. The dictators also know that we have the greatest natural resources in all the world. They know that we have the genius, courage, talent, and skill to use those resources in our defense. They know we have the individual freedom and liberty—something that most people in the lands controlled by dictatorships can never understand. These are the individual attributes which have made these United States the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world.

Now is the hour for all of these factors to be coordinated and synchronized to the point of maximum production. We move forward toward that objective with amazing speed, notwithstanding, we have encountered many difficulties, and in the immediate future the world will feel the power of such a union of American forces. Hitler knows this better than any living man. His policy is to divide and conquer. He hopes through his stooges and hirelings in this country to destroy that harmony and cooperation which is so indispensable for an all-out early defense. We know Hitler's Quisslings and Lavals in conquered countries, and we know Hitler encourages and nourishes cabals in these United States, but with all his propaganda and intrigue, he underestimates the inherent power of free people.

In another camp we find additional traitors to the American cause—communistic leaders, working overtime in their effort to undermine and destroy the orderly processes of government, including our huge defense program.

Fortunately, the Government knows these misguided wretches who, while living under the American flag, secretly pledge their allegiance to another.

But, my friends, it is sufficient to say that at the moment the combined forces of these wicked men are not alarming or contemptible. Nevertheless, all "fifth columnists," the saboteurs, and the Trojan horses that despise and detest America, are always under the watchful and vigilant eye of Uncle Sam, and if their acts of depredation grow, the vigilant army of the F. B. I. will also grow.

My friends, it is a privilege for me as senior United States Senator from Illinois to speak boldly and with blunt language upon this international impact of evil. My hope is that I may impart one further spark of national inspiration to members of your organization, for I realize full well the social and economic power that you, individually and collectively, wield in the American scheme of life.

I hope, too, that you may find added inspiration in coming to the State that produced the immortal Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas, the Little Giant. It is fitting that we speak of these men, because those two leaders of thought and molders of public opinion lived in a day when the Nation was divided over sectional issues. It will be remembered that these two devoted patriots disagreed as to the proper course this Nation should pursue, but once the unlimited emergency was declared by Abraham Lincoln in that Civil War crisis, the strongest supporter of Lincoln and his policies was Stephen A. Douglas, the man who had opposed him on almost every important national matter. While Stanton, Seward, Chase, and others looked upon Lincoln with suspicion and contemptuous pleasantry, Douglas became Lincoln's close adviser and ardent supporter. He made speeches throughout Illinois and other States on the preservation of the Union, and it is said by Beveridge in his Life of Lincoln that the voice of Douglas alone probably produced 50,000 soldiers from Illinois, and 500,000 from all the Northern States.

It is also a source of great pleasure for me to know that the National Retail Dry Goods Association, being thoroughly conversant with this international impact of evil and all of its ramifications that flow from the ruthless policies of European dictators, has established an unswerving policy of cooperation with the Federal Government. My investigation of your organization definitely discloses from the very beginning of our trouble that you have been awake to the impending danger confronting the American people. So patriotic, so fair, and so self-sacrificing have you been that the President of the United States has gone out of his way to commend your activities. In a letter of recent date, addressed to your Mr. Mayfield, he said, among other things:

"I am delighted that the retailers of this country are keeping defense foremost in their celebration of the National Retail Demonstration. The need to keep prices in check is as strong, if not stronger, than it was a year ago. Prevention of any runaway rise in the cost of living is an important phase of total national defense. Because of the enlightened conduct of the Nation's retailers last year, I am confident they will discharge their responsibility as well this year.

"Very sincerely yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

If the President of the United States could write every other organization in the United States a similar letter of confidence, there would be no internal problem affecting this great defense program. Your organization has never been dominated by any spirit of irresolution in any crisis. The welfare of the country has been your first dedication. Selfish motives and personal aggrandizement have been definitely shelved as dangerous trade practices. You realize that today we are again challenged with that ancient European philosophy that might makes right. You men fully appreciate and understand what some few men in this Nation do not or will not understand, and that is dictators conquer and depersonalize the individuals in democratic nations, and destroy all social, economic, and political organizations of every kind and character.

Your most recent act of sound cooperation is found in your support of Leon Henderson, Administrator of Price Administration and Supply. When Henderson a few days ago put a 42-cent ceiling on combed cotton yarn that had a current price of 52 cents per pound, the speculators and jobbers who were the only profiteers in that unjustified advance, raised the cry of dictatorship, lack of authority, and what not. Even Senator SMITH, of South Carolina, chairman of the Agriculture Committee, charged the Government with going socialistic, and other Senators charged that the President was totally lacking and devoid of any authority to issue the Executive order he did.

Diverging for the moment, I want to go on record now by saying that if anyone in America questions the President's authority to issue an Executive order fixing prices in this emergency, as one United States Senator, I am willing to give the President the legislative and statutory power to perform such services. I say this because of a most unhappy and costly policy in the last war of doing nothing to control price structure until the damage was done.

We saw prices in various commodities skyrocketed overnight. We saw millionaires made in that war overnight. Following that we saw inflation as a result of the spiraling of prices. Following the war we saw the Congress of the United States promote deflation in order to attempt to cure the evil of inflation, the result being the chief cause of the panic of 1920. We know that uncontrolled prices cost the Government billions of dollars in the last war. We are determined to avoid that in this emergency.

The Henderson organization set up by Executive order of the President of the United States seeks to keep history from repeating itself. They propose to keep retail prices from running away with themselves in all commodities; I approve this as a sound piece of business. No patriotic and prudent mind can object to this necessary activity, and happily, your organization is abreast of the times. You understand the necessity of price-fixing in this emergency. Your general manager recently issued a statement in connection with Mr. Henderson's price-fixing of combed cotton yarn when he said:

"Such is an exercise of governmental authority which all business should view as a clear indication of what may happen in any industry in which the various units are unwilling or unable to exercise a maximum amount of voluntary restraint."

Voluntary restraint upon the part of businessmen is one of the highest acts of patriotism. A rigid adherence to voluntary restraint and self-discipline by all organizations having something to sell will give the Henderson price-control organization the needed cooperation to insure a successful venture with a minimum amount of trouble. Today price-control has been fixed on only eight commodities, namely: Second-hand machine tools, zinc scrap, aluminum scrap, iron and steel scrap, nickel scrap, bituminous coal, all iron and steel products, and combed cotton yarn.

I am advised that the industries of this country manufacturing farm implements have conferred with Mr. Henderson's department and have voluntarily agreed not to disturb the present prices on farm implements and machinery. For such cooperation those industries have my sincere admiration.

Some outstanding experts contend that individual price-fixing is not effective to stop inflation. That may have been true during the last war, because of the tardiness of the Government to recognize the necessity of such control, but it is highly probable that the Henderson price-control committee has profited by the varied experiences of the Baruch committee during the World War, and have the situation well in hand.

Upon my own responsibility, however, I make this prediction: That if price control upon individual basic commodities is not successful through the failure of voluntary restraint and self-discipline upon the part of the seller, there will ultimately come a ceiling over all prices, above which they cannot rise and below which they are free to fall.

What America wants in this emergency is a stabilized price schedule, and I am confident the Henderson Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply is meeting that desire, because during the last year the cost of living has only increased between 3 and 4 percent, a record which I am certain all American consumers will applaud.

I have dwelt at some length upon the question of price control because of its importance to national defense. As I view it, it is the key to confidence and a definite solution to many of our post-war national problems. The President and the Congress of the United States seek to make America invulnerable. There are many ways which this can be done beyond training a vast army, beyond building a two-ocean navy, beyond the construction of an invincible air armada.

Before the maximum amount of ships and planes and guns can be given to the Army and the Navy at a fair and reasonable cost to the taxpayers of America the question of voluntary restraint and self-discipline which is firmly attached to all true patriots must find its way into every nook and cranny of our economic, social, and political life. That is what the President had in mind when he delivered his fireside chat Tuesday, May 27, when he said, among other things:

"Your Government has the right to expect of all citizens that they take loyal part in the common work of our common defense—take loyal part from this moment forward."

He further said:

"When the Nation is threatened from without, however, as it is today, the actual production and transportation of the machinery of defense must not be interrupted by disputes between capital and capital, labor and labor, or capital and labor. The future of all free enterprise—of capital and labor alike—is at stake."

Further he said:

"This is no time for capital to make, or be allowed to retain, excess profits. * * * Collective bargaining will be retained, but the American people expect that impartial recommendations of our Government services will be followed both by capital and labor. * * * This Government is determined to use all of its power to express the will of its people and to prevent interference with the production of materials essential to our Nation's security."

The President in that part of his message was dealing with strikes: Strikes at steel mills, strikes at airplane factories, strikes at fabricating plants, strikes at shipyards, and other strikes throughout the country that handicap our real defense efforts. I know of no other domestic question that has been discussed so much, and so little done to meet equitably the problems involved therein. President Roosevelt will express the will of the people by taking affirmative action upon this issue. Our freedom is at stake. No internal strife shall militate against its continuation.

Let it be understood that I do not contend that perhaps certain strikes may not have been justified, but certainly the reason behind the great majority of these strikes is not justified under any fair and impartial interpretation.

A number of small men in the management of industry have attempted to use the emergency for selfish gains, hoping that a situation might be created in this country where Congress through legislation would strike down all the social progress that has been made for the laboring man in recent years. On the other hand, a few small leaders of the laboring cause have attempted to use the emergency to further their own selfish ends. Ninety-five percent of the rank and file of management and labor are just as patriotic as any other group. They want to see our defenses move forward with speed and efficiency, but they are powerless to control these ungrateful leaders.

It is not my concern for the moment to determine who is at fault in any particular strike. The placing of the responsibility for defense strikes does not produce guns, planes, or ships, and it is guns, planes, and ships that we need today. The arsenal of democracy must produce without interruption, and neither labor nor management has the moral right to take advantage of the Nation's present emergency to gain some selfish end by causing the cessation of production, which is vital to our defense.

I plead with those in labor and management, as well as every other individual or group, who seek in this critical hour to take advantage of this situation to lay aside these childish things and give their all-out effort and wholehearted cooperation in order that we may have an uninterrupted and continued flow of the maximum production of defense materials for this Nation and those nations which we consider vital to our defense. A few more bombing planes, or a few more ships, or another round of powder delivered to England may save her from defeat.

My friends, the maximum production of defense weapons in this hour is more important to the security of the Nation than is the actual training of the 1,200,000 soldiers who are now in the Army.

I express a sincere and mighty hope that management, labor, and the Labor Relations Branch of the Government may be able to iron out these difficulties without losing time that can never return as we prepare ourselves for the potential danger ahead. We cannot, we must not, continue to lose these precious hours on defense contracts. Someone must act with all convenient speed. As a United States Senator, I am ready to vote for legislation to meet this bottleneck in our defense production.

My friends, the picture that I have painted is not a cheerful one. We are all aware that this world convulsion has dislocated the lives and activities of millions of people. What our fate may be in the world of tomorrow no man can tell, but the emergency is such that demands the best of each individual, no matter what his role in life may be. As one of the Senators from Illinois, representing seven and one-half millions of strong, sturdy, and true Americans, I pray to God that in this hour of peril that whatever I do, I may be right. I have only one purpose in mind, and that is to serve my country.

Hernando De Soto

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 22, 1941

Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on May 21, 1541, four hundred years ago yesterday, Hernando De Soto discovered the Mississippi River in one of the most dramatic expeditions the world has ever seen.

It was the last of a series of expeditions that from the standpoint of a combination of romance, adventure, valor, privation, courage, cruelty, exploration, discovery, and dramatic deliverance are probably without a parallel in all the annals of mankind.

There are available four accounts of this expedition which were written at the time it was made, or shortly thereafter, together with a map of the area explored, which was published in Spain in 1543. This map, which was evidently drawn by some member of the expedition, and probably under De Soto's direction, when considered in the light of information and data available at that time, is a splendid outline and a surprisingly accurate picture of the territory explored—from the peninsula of Florida to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

Three of the published accounts were written by members of the expedition. One of them was by Biedma, the King's Factor, who accompanied the expedition and whose duty it was to act as the representative of the Crown and to collect the government's pro rata share of the treasures discovered or taken from the Indians—or from any others that might be so unfortunate as to fall into their hands. His account was in the form of a report made to the Spanish Crown in 1544, 1 year after the expedition ended and the survivors finally found their way back to civilization. His report is entitled "Relation of the Conquest of Florida Presented by Luys Hernandez De Biedma in the year 1544 to the King of Spain in Council."

Another report of the expedition was written by Rodrego Ranjel, De Soto's secretary. Rather it was written from Ranjel's notes by Oviedo, a Spanish historian. Unfortunately, Oviedo seems to have destroyed these notes, apparently the custom of compilers of that day. This report is entitled "A Narrative of De Soto's Expedition Based on the Diary of Rodrego Ranjel, his private secretary, by Gonzolo Fernandez De Oviedo y Valdez."

It was published, or compiled, some time between the year 1546, the year Oviedo left Santo Domingo for Spain, and 1557, the year Oviedo died, but it was not published in English until 1904. Ranjel does not tell us that he was De Soto's secretary, and neither does Biedma. We get that information from De Soto's will.

A third report was written by a member of the expedition who called himself The Gentleman from Elvas, or A Fidalgo of Elvas. While he does not give his real name, it has been pointed out that he must have been Alvaro Fernandez, a highly educated Portuguese, who was a member of the expedition and who came from the town of Elvas. His story is well written, and while there are some discrepancies as to exact dates or days of the week, he invariably refers with accuracy to places indicated on the map mentioned. His report checks well with the report of Biedma, as well as with that of Ranjel, as to dates, names, and places, with slight variations in names or in the spelling of names, due, no doubt, to the fact that he wrote in Portuguese, while they both wrote in Spanish.

It has been contended that these writers had access to each other's reports, but that could hardly have occurred, for the reason that Oviedo died in 1557, the year Elvas' story was published. Neither Elvas nor Oviedo could have had access to Biedma's report, for while it was made to the King in 1544, it was not published, at least in English, until 1857.

A fourth report was written by Garcilasco de la Vega, usually referred to as Garcilasco, the Inca. He was born in Cusco, Peru, in 1537. His father was a Spanish officer under Pizarro and his mother was a Peruvian Indian, and a sister of Huana Capac, the last great Inca, or chief, of the ancient Peruvian Empire which Pizarro and his followers conquered and destroyed.

Garcilasco's story was written in Spain about 1587, more than 40 years after the expedition came to an end. It was based entirely upon second-hand information and is teeming with exaggerations. He got his information from "a friend," who was a member of the expedition and who related it to him verbally more than 20 years afterward. This "friend" was evidently Gancalo Silvestre, one of the cavaliers in the expedition, whose exploits during the expedition were narrated in considerable detail, although the records do not indicate that he occupied any position of prominence under De Soto, and the gentleman from Elvas does not even mention his name.

De Soto landed on the west coast of Florida on May 30, 1539, with 620 men, 223 horses, a number of hogs, and equipment necessary for the expedition.

He disembarked at what is now called Tampa Bay, but which Biedma calls the Bay of Honda, by which name it is also designated on the map referred to. The gentleman from Elvas tells us that—

> The place where they disembarked was due north of the island of Tortuga, which is in the mouth of the Bahama Channel.

The location of the Tortugas Islands indicated on this De Soto map and referred to by the gentleman from Elvas corresponds almost perfectly with that of the island of Dry Tortugas, situated due south of Tampa Bay, and made famous by the imprisonment of Dr. Mudd just after the Civil War. A comparison of these maps and the reports above referred to will leave no doubt of the fact that De Soto and his men landed at Tampa Bay.

They must have presented an imposing spectacle. Here were 620 daring adventurers selected from the very best of the young manhood of the Old World. Many of them had traveled far and wide. Some had engaged in continental conflicts; some had followed Cortez in Mexico, Davilla in Panama, or Pizarro in Peru. As one writer expressed it, they had shivered lances with the knights of the Old World, engaged in deadly combat with Indian braves from Mexico to Peru, and with their swords had placed the cross of Christianity upon the bloody altars of the Montezumas and in the golden temple of the Incas.

More than 200 of them were mounted on the finest horses to be found in all the world. They were led by Hernando De Soto, one of the most intrepid soldiers who ever set foot on American soil, and one whose record of achievements was sufficient to inspire the envy of every follower who was ambitious of renown.

At that time De Soto was about 39 years old. He was born in the year 1500 at a small Spanish town called Xeres. His father and mother were both members of the nobility, as were all four of his grandparents.

But, like many other aristocratic families, his people had become so impoverished that they were unable to give him a liberal education. His courteous and manly bearing attracted the attention of one Pedro Arias de Avilla, a wealthy member of the nobility, by whose assistance young De Soto was enabled to spend 6 years at one of the Spanish universities, supposed to be that of Saragossa.

Davila, as Don Pedro was called, was a man of ungovernable temper and insatiable cruelty. De Soto and Balboa, the discoverer of the Pacific Ocean, both married daughters of Davila. He demonstrated his affection for them by later having Balboa beheaded and attempting the execution of De Soto, whose brilliant and courageous defense of himself against the bloodthirsty old tyrant constitutes one of the most dramatic incidents in history.

During the time that De Soto was in college, Davila was appointed governor of Darien, which covered a large portion of Central America, and included what is now the Republic of Panama. He entered upon the duties of that office in 1514, and at the end of 5 years returned to Spain for a short visit, about the time De Soto returned from college.

They met at Davila's country castle near the city of Badajoz. De Soto was a fine-looking specimen of young manhood, tall, athletic, alert, courageous, and adept at such manly feats as riding, fencing, and other military exercises. He was regarded as the very mirror of knighthood. Just before Davila's return to Darien, De Soto surprised him, to put it very mildly, by asking for the hand of his beautiful daughter, Donna Isabella Debobadilla. She was a lovely and accomplished girl of 16. had been presented at court, where her extraordinary beauty and attractive personality caused her to be sought in marriage by several young noblemen of the highest rank.

De Soto's proposal seemed so absurd, owing to his poverty, that it did not even offend the arrogant old count. He contemptuously spurned it, even refusing to take it seriously, until he learned that Isabella was desperately in love with De Soto and had declared she would shut herself up in a convent before she would marry anyone else.

Davila went into a rage. He is said to have taken measures to have De Soto assassinated, but fearing the effect it might have on his daughter, he decided to take De Soto back to Darien with him, and offered him a captain's commission and free passage to Darien. Thinking this might afford him an opportunity to make his fortune, which he considered the only stumbling block to his marriage, De Soto accepted, little dreaming of the sinister design that prompted the proposal.

He managed to secure a secret interview with Isabella before his departure when vows of mutual constancy were made. Knowing her father's character, and suspecting his intentions, Isabella reminded De Soto that "one treacherous friend is more dangerous than a thousand avowed enemies."

On arriving in Darien, Davila assigned De Soto to such duties as would expose him to extreme dangers. He performed those duties with such courage and ability as to increase Davila's enmity toward him.

Davila's merciless cruelty to the Indians furnishes one of the bloodiest pages in history. They were considered heathens, with no rights which the Spaniards felt bound to respect. On one occasion Davila sent an order to De Soto to burn a certain Indian village and put every living creature found therein to the sword. De Soto flatly refused. Davila induced one, Captain Perez de la Rua, his agent in the affair, to challenge De Soto to a duel, stating that he himself was too old, being at that time about 80.

Perez was a vicious character and considered the best swordsman in the territory. But he had met his match. After 2 hours of fierce combat, in which he was wounded several times, De Soto downed his antagonist. With the point of his sword against the breast of his fallen enemy, De Soto demanded that he ask for his life, which Perez refused to do. De Soto then sheathed his sword, saying that "a life that is not worth asking for is not worth taking." He then gracefully bowed to the cheering spectators and retired from the field. Captain Perez was so badly humiliated that he resigned his commission and returned to Spain.

When Davila first came to the territory as governor, he succeeded Balboa, who had been acting in that capacity. Balboa was young, chivalrous, and popular, and had already assured his immortality by his discovery of the Pacific Ocean.

While he continued to serve under Davila, endeavoring in every way to please him, his efforts seemed to intensify the latter's enmity toward him. A reconciliation is said to have been arranged at one time, and Balboa married Davila's daughter by proxy, Davila acting for her.

This, however, did not allay the growing jealousy of Davila, who finally tried Balboa on a false charge of treason and ordered him to be beheaded. He watched the execution through a crevice in the wall of a neighboring house, not daring to look into the reproachful eyes of the dying man.

All this became known to De Soto soon after he reached the territory, and he soon became aware of Davila's increasing hatred for him. He remembered what Isabella had told him and kept on his guard.

Davila tried in every way to entrap De Soto and to prevent his correspondence with Isabella.

Finally, Davila was transferred to Nicaragua, which was being governed temporarily by Lt. Francisco Hernandez, a friend of De Soto's. When he arrived at the town of Leon, where Hernandez maintained his headquarters, the latter appeared to give an account of his stewardship. Davila interrupted him, denounced him as a traitor, and ordered his execution at once. Immediately his official executioner went into action, and in an instant the head of Hernandez rolled upon the ground.

The vast audience was horrified. As soon as the fatal blow was given, De Soto drew his sword, but it was too late to interpose. He shook his sword at Davila, who ordered him to be dragged from his horse and executed in the same manner. An officer rushed for De Soto, who brought his sword down with such force that it split the man's head clear to his chin. He then dashed at Davila with such ferocity that the latter's guards gave way before him. He placed the point of his sword against Davila's body, while the excited crowd shouted, "Kill him!" "Kill the tyrant." These shouts were even echoed by Davila's own soldiers. "Miserable old man," said De Soto, "you hear the voice of justice speaking through your subjects. In refusing to obey the call, I am scarcely less guilty than yourself. But remember that in sparing your life at this moment, I discharge all the obligations I have owed you. Be thankful that the recollection of one who is absent can make me forget what I owe to my murdered friend. I will sheathe my sword; but I swear by the sacred emblem which it bears that I will never draw it again in your service." And he kept his word.

After his dramatic break with Davila, De Soto went on an exploring expedition of his own in search of a passage connecting the two oceans somewhere between the Isthmus of Darien and the southern part of Mexico. Geographers of that day believed that such a passage really existed, just as the English believed in the existence of the Northwest Passage. While returning from this expedition, another incident occurred which demonstrates the fighting qualities of De Soto, as well as the bloody and peremptory manner in which Spanish justice was sometimes meted out among those early explorers.

Among the inhabitants of Panama, during the administration of Governor Davila, was an aged Italian scientist named Micer Codro. He was trusted by the governor and respected by all. He and De Soto became great friends, and on one occasion, when Davila had sent Micer Codro to Spain on a special mission, De Soto got him to carry a secret letter to Isabella. This was finally reported to Davila in a letter from one of his servants. Concealing his indignation, the governor sent Micer Codro on another expedition, ostensibly to make some investigation on a neighboring island, but gave secret instructions to the captain of the boat on which he sailed to torture the old man to death.

While returning from his fruitless search for the strait connecting the two oceans, De Soto happened to board a vessel commanded by this same captain. One night the captain began to regale the crowd with his former explorations and deeds of cruelty, and recited his extreme brutality to Micer Codro, when De Soto sprang to his feet, drew his sword, and, as one historian expresses it, "dealt the vaunting criminal a blow which separated his head from his body."

He then addressed the astonished crowd, gave the reason for his strange conduct, and proposed to meet anyone who felt disposed to hold him accountable for what he had done. But his explanation seemed to satisfy everyone, or at least to furnish an excuse for the failure of any of his audience to accept his challenge.

De Soto then joined Pizzaro and went with him to Peru where he became a leader in the conquest of that country. His daring exploits, his excellent horsemanship, together with his courage and boldness as a military leader, distinguished him as the outstanding member of the expedition. His bold and daring leadership were great factors in the overthrow of the Inca, as the Peruvian ruler was called, and the conquest of the Nation, which enabled the Spaniards to garner a wealth of gold and silver the like of which the world had not seen.

Let it be said to De Soto's credit that he took no part in, nor was he responsible for, the cruel execution of Atahualpa, the Peruvian Inca.

This noble chieftain had been captured by the Spaniards under De Soto at the time of the storming of their capital, and he was held a prisoner by Pizzaro. He was promised his freedom if he would have his subjects bring in gold and silver sufficient to fill the room in which he was confined as high as he could reach.

This request was complied with and his simple subjects stripped their public buildings, as well as private abodes, of all the precious metals they could find and brought them in for the purpose of securing the release of their beloved chief—one of the most beneficent rulers whose name appears on the pages of recorded history.

His nation had progressed far along the road to civilization. They were happy, prosperous, contented, and at peace with the rest of the world until the Spaniards came. Their public buildings, their magnificent highways, and their works of art challenged the admiration of the civilized world.

In this day of whirling traffic it is hard for us to understand that such a civilization could have been built by a nation of men who had never seen a wheel, whose only mode of travel was a boat and whose only beast of burden was the llama.

When practically all the wealth of gold and silver the Peruvians possessed had been gathered and the chief Inca, Atahalpa, began to appeal to Pizzaro to carry out his part of the contract, that cruel tyrant sent De Soto on an expedition into the interior, evidently to get him out of the way for the time being. Then taking advantage of De Soto's absence, he had this noble Indian led from his prison, chained to a stake in the public square, and burned to death.

When De Soto returned he was so enraged at this brutality, this cruel and inhuman execution of an innocent man, this flagrant and brazen breach of faith, that he drew his sword and rushed into Pizzaro's tent, abused him for the miserable wretch that he was, and it was all his followers could do to restrain him from meting out to him the same punishment he had administered to the murderer of his friend Micer Codro.

De Soto was so disgusted with the conduct of Pizzaro that he decided to resign his position and return to Spain. Besides he had accomplished the main object of his adventures in accumulating a fortune from the spoils of the Peruvian Empire, and was burning with desire to return and claim the hand of the beautiful Isabella Debobadilla.

Therefore he resigned his position and returned to Spain, taking with him his share of the accumulated spoils of the expedition which made him rich almost beyond the dreams of avarice.

When he got back to Spain he found Isabella waiting for him. She had remained faithful throughout all the long and lonesome years of his absence, dreaming of the time when he should return, a conquering hero, laden with riches and covered with renown.

Her dream had now come true. They celebrated their marriage in great style, attended by all the pomp and splendor of the Spanish Court at which Isabella had long been a favorite, and to which De Soto had now been admitted as one of the most distinguished men of his day.

He immediately became a national favorite, was attended by a retinue wherever he went, loaned money to the King and came to be looked upon as a national leader.

All this was very pleasant and exhilirating to the masterful, young cavalier, and for a time he enjoyed his position and popularity to the fullest extent. His cup of success was literally running over.

But while he had been the principal actor in all the achievements in which he had participated up to that time, they had all been accomplished in the name of someone else, and De Soto was ambitious to accomplish something in his own right.

Therefore, he applied to the Spanish Crown for permission to fit out an expedition for the invasion of Florida, as the North American Continent was then called. The crown granted his request and appointed him Governor of Cuba and Adelantado of Florida. The distinction between these two titles seems to be that as Governor of Cuba he merely exercised civil authority, and even that, as well as military operations, were subject to the dictation of the crown; while as Adalantado of Florida he apparently possessed all powers, both civil and military. He was to be monarch of all he surveyed.

The expedition was quickly organized consisting of about 600 men and 7 ships loaded with horses, hogs, food supplies, clothes, and other material and paraphernalia as were deemed necessary for such an enormous expedition.

They set sail in the month of April 1538. Dona Ysabel accompanied De Soto to the island of Cuba, where she remained to await the return of her husband from the expedition in which he expected to find a wealth of gold surpassing that obtained in Peru.

De Soto sailed from Habana, Cuba, on May 8, 1539, with a fleet of nine vessels—"five ships, two caravels, and two pinnances"—and landed in what is now called Tampa Bay on Friday, May 30, 1539, and began to make preparations to explore the interior.

On arriving in Florida he learned that there was a white man in that country who had been living with a tribe of Indians for many years. He sent a band of horsemen to try to see if they could find him. They soon came upon a band of Indians whom they immediately attacked when one of them called out in their own language, "Seville," the name of a town in Spain, which he continued to repeat.

Whereupon the horseman who had charged him with his lance recognized him as a member of his own race. He told the horseman that he was a Christian and a Spaniard of noble ancestry, and that he had been living as a captive among the Indians for something like 10 years.

But suppose we let the gentleman from Elvas tell his story just as he wrote it down 400 years ago:

HOW THE CHRISTIAN CAME TO THE LAND OF FLORIDA, WHO HE WAS, AND OF WHAT PASSED AT HIS INTERVIEW WITH THE GOVERNOR

The name of the Christian was Juan Ortiz, a native of Sevilla, and of noble parentage. He had been 12 years among the Indians, having gone into the country with Panphilo de Narvaez, and returned in the ships to the island of Cuba, where the wife of the Governor remained; whence, by her command, he went back to Florida with some 20 or 30 others in a pinnace. Coming to the port in sight of the town they saw a cane sticking upright in the ground, with a split in the top, holding a letter, which they supposed the Governor had left there, to give information of himself before marching into the interior. They asked it, to be given to them, of four or five Indians walking along the beach, who by signs bade them come to land for it, which Ortiz and another did, though contrary to the wishes of the others. No sooner had they got on shore, when many natives came out of the houses, and drawing near held them in such way that they could not escape. One who would have defended himself they slew on the spot, the other they seized by the hands and took him to Ucita, their chief. The people in the pinnace unwilling to land, kept along the coast and returned to Cuba.

By command of Ucita, Juan Ortiz was bound hand and foot to four stakes, and laid upon scaffolding, beneath which a fire was kindled that he might be burned, but a daughter of the chief entreated that he might be spared. Though one Christian, she said, might do no good, certainly he could do no harm, and it would be an honor to have one for a captive, to which the father acceded, directing the injuries to be healed. When Ortiz got well he was put to watching a temple, that the wolves in the nighttime might not carry off the dead there, which charge he took in hand having commended himself to God. One night they snatched away from him the body of a little child, son of a principal man, and going after them he threw a dart at the wolf that was escaping, which feeling itself wounded let go its hold and went off to die, and he returned without knowing what he had done in the dark. In the morning finding the body of the little boy gone he became very sober, and Ucita when he heard what had happened determined he should be killed, but having sent on the trail which Ortiz pointed out as that the wolves had made the body of the child was found and a little further on a dead wolf, at which circumstance the chief became well pleased with the Christian, and satisfied with the guard he had kept, ever after taking much notice of him.

Three years having gone by since he had fallen into the hands of this chief, there came another, named Mococo, living 2 days' journey distant from that port, and burned the town, when Ucita fled to one he had in another seaport, whereby Ortiz lost his occupation, and with it the favor of his master. The Indians are worshippers of the devil, and it is their custom to make sacrifices of the blood and bodies of their people, or of those of any other they can come by; and they affirm, too, that when he would have them make an offering, he speaks, telling them that he is athirst, and that they must sacrifice to him. The girl who had delivered Ortiz from the fire told him how her father had the mind to sacrifice him the next day and that he must flee to Mococo, who she knew would receive him with regard, as she had heard that he had asked for him and said he would like to see him; and as he knew not the way, she went half a league out of town with him at dark, to put him on the road, returning early so as not to be missed.

Ortiz traveled all night, and in the morning came to a river, the boundary of the territory of Mococo, where he discovered two men fishing. As this people were at war with those of Ucita and their language different, he did not know how he should be able to tell them who he was and why he came, or make other explanation, that they might not kill him as one of the enemy. It was not, however, until he had come up to where their arms were placed that he was discovered, when they flew toward the town; and though he called out to them to wait, that he would do them no injury, they only ran the faster for not understanding him. As they arrived, shouting, many Indians came out of the town and began surrounding, in order to shoot him with their arrows, when he, finding himself pressed, took shelter behind trees, crying aloud that he was a Christian fled from Ucita, come to visit and serve Mococo. At the moment, it pleased God that an Indian should come up, who, speaking the language, understood him and quieted the others, telling them what was said. Three or four ran to carry the news, when the Cacique, much gratified, came a quarter of a league on the way to receive him. He caused the Christian immediately to swear to him, according to the custom of his country, that he would not leave him for any other master; and, in return, he promised to show him much honor, and if at any time Christians should come to that land, he would let him go freely, and give him his permission to return to them, pledging his oath to this after the Indian usage.

Three years from that time, some people fishing out at sea, 3 leagues from land, brought news of having seen ships; when Mococo, calling Ortiz, gave him permission to depart, who, taking leave, made all haste possible to the shore, where, finding no vessels, he supposed the story to be only a device of the Cacique to discover his inclination. In this way he remained with him 9 years, having little hope of ever seeing Christians more; but no sooner had the arrival of the Governor in Florida taken place, when it was known to Mococo, who directly told Ortiz that Christians were in the town of Ucita. The captive, thinking himself jested with, as he had supposed himself to be before, said that his thoughts no longer dwelt on his people and that his only wish now was to serve him. Still the Cacique assured him that it was even as he stated, and gave him leave to go, telling him that if he did not, and the Christians should depart, he must not blame him, for he had fulfilled his promise.

Great was the joy of Ortiz at this news, though still doubtful of its truth; however, he thanked Mococo, and went his way. A dozen principal Indians were sent to accompany him; and on their way to the port, they met Baltasar de Gallegos, in the manner that has been related. Arrived at the camp, the Governor ordered that apparel be given to him, good armor, and a fine horse. When asked if he knew of any country where there was either gold or silver, he said that he had not been 10 leagues in any direction from where he lived; but that 30 leagues distant was a chief named Paracoxi, to whom Mococo, Ucita, and all they that dwelt along the coast paid tribute, and that he perhaps had knowledge of some good country, as his land was better than theirs, being more fertile, abounding in maize. Hearing this, the Governor was well pleased, and said he only desired to find subsistence, that he might be enabled to go inland with safety; for that Florida was so wide, in some part or other of it there could not fail to be a rich country. The Cacique of Mococo came to the port, and calling on the Governor, he thus spoke:

"Most high and powerful chief: Though less able, I believe, to serve you than the least of these under your control, but with the wish to do more than even the greatest of them can accomplish, I appear before you in the full confidence of receiving your favor, as much as though I deserved it, not in requital of the trifling service I rendered in setting free the Christian while he was in my power, which I did, not for the sake of my honor and of my promise, but because I hold that great men should be liberal. As much as in your bodily perfections you exceed all, and in your command over fine men are you superior to others, so in your nature are you equal to the full enjoyment of earthly things. The favor I hope for, great Lord, is that you will hold me to be your own, calling on me freely to do whatever may be your wish."

The Governor answered him, that although it were true, in freeing and sending him the Christian, he had done no more than to keep his word and preserve his honor, nevertheless he thanked him for an act so valuable, that there was no other for him that could be compared to it, and that, holding him henceforth to be a brother, he should in all, and through all, favor him. Then a shirt and some other articles of clothing were directed to be given to the chief, who, thankfully receiving them, took leave and went to his town.

The speech of the chief just quoted is typical of the addresses made by various chiefs throughout the expedition. This is probably the first time that any Indian chief ever greeted a visitor from the Old World accompanied by an interpreter who could speak both languages.

It may be that Ortiz helped to form his address to De Soto. Yet numerous speeches of this kind made by various Indian chiefs are found throughout the Elvas report of the expedition.

Strange as it may seem, when Capt. John Smith returned to England in 1609, he published a volume giving his experiences in Virginia, in which he made no mention of Pocahontas having saved his life. That same year Richard Hakluyt, the British historian, translated this report of De Soto's expedition by the gentleman from Elvas into English and published it in London in 1611.

A few years later Pocahontas came to England, and Capt. John Smith called on her, but neither of them ever made mention of her having saved Smith's life. About 16 years after Pocahontas died, Smith published another volume, a second edition of his exploits in America, in which the story of Pocahontas saving his life appeared for the first time.

All these books are now in the Library of Congress and available to any student of history who desires to investigate the subject.

The indications are that the story of Smith being rescued by Pocahontas was an afterthought and that he borrowed it from these experiences of Juan Ortiz in Florida. Yet every school child in America and probably in England has read the story of how Pocahontas saved the life of Capt. John Smith. A monument has been erected at Jamestown to that alleged event, and it has been carved on the inside of the dome of the Capitol. All of which carries out Napoleon's contention that "history is a fable agreed upon."

Ortiz joined De Soto and became his interpreter. Indians could speak the language of adjacent tribes; therefore every time they would pass through the territory of an Indian chief they would pick up an interpreter who could speak the language of his neighbors. In that way they collected a retinue of interpreters consisting of something like six or eight, or probably more, Indians from the various tribes through which they had passed. In order to understand the language of a tribe, he had to speak through the interpreter from the adjacent tribe, and he to the one from the next tribe, and so on down the line until they reached Ortiz who would then translate it into Spanish. To be sure, that was a very imperfect method of interpretation, but it was the best they could do and enabled them to understand in a vague way what was being said.

When we reach the Chickasaw territory, I will show how this arrangement helped to get De Soto into some very serious trouble.

De Soto's adventures in North America are well known to every student of history.

He left Tampa Bay, or the Bay of Honda, as it was called, and moved in a northerly direction for a short time, and then turned and followed a northeasterly course. A young Indian had informed him that there were large deposits of gold in an area far to the north where his own people lived, and he proposed to guide De Soto and his men to it. For some reason he changed his mind, confessed religion, and joined the church. He also confessed that he had been misrepresenting the facts, and that he did not know of any place where gold could be found. It is pointed out by some historians that large gold deposits really existed in northern Georgia, and it is entirely probable this Indian knew about them. But after witnessing the cruelty with which the Spanish treated the other Indians along the way, it is probable that this lad revolted at the idea of subjecting his people to the same punishment.

De Soto went up through what is now the State of South Carolina, and probably went a short distance into North Carolina. He struck the upper stretches of the Tennessee River and followed that stream down to about where Guntersville Dam is now situated, then turned south and engaged in a fight with the Indians under the Chief Tascalusa, at what is known as the Battle of Mabila, or Mauilla. This battle came very near being the undoing of the expedition. In it De Soto lost all of his firearms and ammunition and large quantities of other vital materials.

After the Battle of Mabila the expedition turned north, and crossed the Tombigbee River somewhere in the vicinity of the present sites of Columbus or Aberdeen, and spent the winter at Chicaca in a territory inhabited by the Chickasaw Indians. As a result of a misunderstanding with the Chickasaws, another battle occurred, which came very near proving fatal to De Soto and his band.

De Soto had a large number of hogs with him, and it is reported that he gave a dinner one night to which he invited some of the leaders of the tribe and served them hog meat. They liked it so well that some of them stole some of the hogs out of the enclosure where they were kept. Two of them were caught in the act and brought before De Soto, who had their hands chopped off, and then sent them back to the tribe. A few days later some Spaniards were caught stealing from the Indians, or, rather, robbing them. De Soto ordered them put to death, but before the execution could be carried out, messengers from the chief came to demand their punishment. On the urgent advice of other leaders, Juan Ortiz misinterpreted their message and told De Soto the chief said he did not want them punished. On receiving this information, he ordered them released. This so enraged the Indians that they decided to get even. One dark night, March 15, 1541, they attacked the Spaniards, fired their cabins, stampeded their horses, and burned up nearly all of their clothes and equipment, including their saddles. The Spaniards had to build forges, retemper their swords, and repair their saddles and patch up such clothes as they could make from the materials at hand.

On Tuesday the 26th of April they left Chicaca and went to a town called Alibamo, which is shown on De Soto's map as being about the site of Ackia, the capital of the Chickasaw Nation, where the French under Bienville fought the Chickasaws almost 200 years later, in 1736, and which is now the site of the Ackia National Battlefield Monument a few miles northwest of the present city of Tupelo.

From Alibamo they traveled in a northwesterly direction until they struck the Mississippi River on May 21, 1541. They crossed this stream and traveled many hundreds of miles in a westerly or southwesterly direction trying to find their way to new Spain, as Mexico was then called. Being discouraged, they returned to the Mississippi River, where De Soto sickened, and died on the 21st day of May 1542, just 1 year to a day after his discovery of the Mississippi River.

They buried him near the camp and told the Indians that he had gone to heaven. One of the chiefs informed them that it was their custom, when a great man went to the happy hunting ground, to kill two or three braves to go along with him, and in obedience to that custom he brought several of his own braves and offered them for that purpose, but the Spanish declined to sacrifice them.

These Indians happened to be friendly to De Soto and they became suspicious as to his whereabouts. They were seen to approach the place where he had been buried and to hold conversations, which, together with their gestures, indicated that they were trying to locate the body. In order to conceal the facts from them the Spaniards took up the body, wrapped it in heavy cloth, filled the cloth with sand in order to sink it, took it out at night, and buried it in the Mississippi River.

The Spanish then built boats in which they descended the Mississippi River to its mouth. They were harassed continuously by hostile tribes, and many of them were killed. When they reached the mouth of the Mississippi River they managed to follow the coast line around to the west until they finally came in sight of some people dressed in their own fashion. They called to them, and to their surprise and delight were answered in their own language. They had reached the shores of Mexico.

When they landed they knelt, kissed the ground, and gave thanks to God for their deliverers. They were conducted to the capital of the territory and provided with food and clothing. Of the more than 600 men who started on the expedition, only about 320 survived.

The news of their arrival soon reached Isabella in Cuba, where she had been anxiously awaiting some word of her illustrious husband, from whom she had not heard for several years. When the news finally reached her the blow was greater than she could stand, and she died within 3 days.

Thus ended in double tragedy the career of Hernando De Soto, one of the most intrepid knights, one of the boldest adventurers, one of the most daring explorers, and the greatest soldier that Spain ever sent to the New World.

ARTICLE FROM THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor for June 2. The article is a condensed excerpt from an address by Pope Pius XII on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of an encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. The address deals with the problems relating to the rights of labor, and social and economic policies necessary to the establishment of national and international justice essential to good social order and world peace.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of June 2, 1941]

BASIC RIGHTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL STRESSED BY POPE IN RADIOCAST

VATICAN CITY, June 2.—Pope Piux XII, outlining his views on how the "fundamental values" of social and economic life should share in "that new order which the world expects and hopes" will emerge from the war, emphasized safeguarding of the rights of the individual.

In a Sunday radiocast commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's social encyclical, the pontiff said he wished to give "some further directive moral principles" on the three fundamental values: the use of material goods, labor, and the family.

He cautioned against too extensive state interference in the rights and duties of individuals and families and upheld man's right to freedom in his "physical, spiritual, religious, and moral movements."

On the use of material goods, he said:

"Undoubtedly the natural order deriving from God demands * * * private property and the free reciprocal commerce of goods by interchange and gift as well as the function of the state as a control over both these institutions. * * *

"To safeguard the inviolable sphere of the rights of the human person and to facilitate the fulfillment of his duties should be the essential office of every public authority. * * * The care of such a common good does not imply a power so extensive over the members of the community that in virtue of it the public authority can * * * decide on the beginning of the ending of human life, determine at will the manner of his physical, spiritual, religious, and moral movements in opposition to the personal duties or rights of man and to this end abolish or deprive of efficacy his natural rights to material goods."

On labor:

"The duty and the right to organize the labor of the people belongs, above all, to the people immediately interested: the employers and the workers.

"Every legitimate and beneficial interference of the state in the field of labor should be such as to safeguard and respect its personal character both in the broad outlines and as far as possible in what concerns its execution; and this will happen if the norms of the state do not abolish or render impossible the exercise of other rights and duties equally personal; such as the right to give God his due worship; the right to marry; the right of husband and wife, of father and mother to lead a married domestic life; the right to reasonable liberty in the choice of a state of life and the fulfillment of a true vocation."

On the family:

"A so-called civil progress would * * * be unnatural which—either through the excessive burdens imposed or through exaggerated direct interference—were to render private property void of significance, practically taking from the family and its head the freedom to follow the scope set by God for the perfection of family life."

Pope Pius also suggested the opening of "habitable regions and vital spaces now abandoned to wild, natural vegetation and well suited to be cultivated by man" to immigrants from other lands as a means of contributing both "to the increased welfare of man and the progress of human culture."

Must We Fight Again?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered in the city of New York on April 14, 1941, at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of Women United, entitled "Must We Fight Again?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Madame Chairman, distinguished guests, mothers of American youth, must we fight again? Must we fight again on foreign shores? That is the question that springs from the lips of every American mother 24 hours in every day and every day in every week. The mothers of America are the ones who are silently praying for peace; they are the ones who daily cry out for the end of war because they will be the greatest sufferers, the greatest losers in the event of our physical participation in the present European conflagration. Governments may become bankrupt, nations may be absorbed and their independence lost, but the greatest sacrifice of all is that made by the mother who gives her son, in many instances her only son, her own flesh and blood, in the flush of youth to the god of war. There is tragedy, anguish, and a broken heart that neither time or circumstances will ever heal.

Should you, the mothers of American sons, in 1941 be called upon to make this sacrifice in either England, France, Greece, Africa, or elsewhere? Should you be forced to make this the greatest of all contributions other than in the Western Hemisphere where our Government and every American is pledged to defend the Monroe Doctrine? I say to you in perfect candor and in the deepest sincerity you should not. And to this end I pledge you and the people of America that I shall do everything in my power to see that they are not sent abroad again to die on alien shores. I shall do my best to see that there is never again an A. E. F. in 1941, '42, or in any other year.

How many of you remember 11 a. m. on the morning of November 11, 1918? That was probably the most important moment in history, when the greatest war, the war fought to end all wars, came officially to an end. That was the hour when the armistice became effective and men ceased to die. Over 9,000,000 had already paid the supreme price and some 28,000,000 of others were returned to their respective homes their bodies broken, their minds torn, to spend the remainder of their years, many of them, on pain-wracked beds.

That was only 23 years ago, and yet it appears that the American people as a whole have forgotten, have forgotten the blood that spilled, the grief they endured, the money their Government spent in those 18 months of our participation in the World War. The best evidence that the majority of our people have forgotten is the fact that the American Congress recently passed the so-called lease-lend bill by nearly a 2-to-1 vote.

The war had hardly ended when the American people said, "Never again." If any public speaker wanted to secure applause he had but to mention the fact in the course of his address that he was opposed to America's participating ever again in any foreign war, and if any national legislator wanted to secure the favor of the American people he had but to declare he would never vote for any measure which would take America into another foreign war. How scon we forget.

Must we again, as in 1917, fight to save democracy, fight to end wars, and fight for the preservation of civilization and Christianity? That's what we did then, and that's what the propagandists and the warmongers tell us we must do again. The situation is vastly different now from what it was then. In 1917 we honestly and sincerely thought that we were fighting a holy war, and we were willing to make any sacrifice to rid the world of the then prevailing monster, the Kaiser. We were willing to make the sacrifice to forever save civilization from the attendant suffering of any more wars.

For a moment let's review and see whether or not the objectives we sought so valiantly and conscientiously 22 years ago were attained. Was democracy saved? Of course not. If it had been, would the whole world be literally mad and on fire tonight? Did World War No. 1 and Versailles end all wars? Of course, not. Since November 11, 1918, wars and revolutions have raged throughout the earth. In China, Manchukuo, Spain, Ethiopia, and even on our own Western Hemisphere in Bolivia and Paraguay. As a result of these wars and revolutions, it is estimated that more than 5,000,000 people have actually been killed and millions of noncombatants, children, old men, and old women, have starved, suffered, and died.

Now, just a word as to the cost of war. Before we have liquidated the debt of the last war we will have spent $100,000,000,000. With only 50,000 combat casualties and 234,000 wounded we, at this late date in 1940, had 66,000 veterans in Government hospitals and receiving domiciliary care. In fact, our available veterans' institutions are insufficient at the present time to care for the thousands of needy World War veterans.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding that the average American citizen well understands the complete failure of our objectives in 1917–18, even tonight, at this very hour, there are those who tell us that our duty and even our own future preservation and very existence demand that we once more must cast down the gauntlet and do battle with practically the entire world with the exception of the British Empire. Their platform, their battle cry, is: Feed, finance, and fight. That's a real order, but there are those in the United States, as there were in France, who cried out for war, and who declared war, when they were aware of the fact that the French Government was constructing only 200 airplanes per month when at the same time the German production approximated 3,000 planes per month.

In this group we find the warmongers, the war profiteers, both big and little, those too old or so disabled as not to permit of their participating in actual physical combat, and those whose reason has been swept away by cunning propagandists and who have fallen prey to hysteria and fear. I charge, my friends, that they are the ones who are now urging us to proceed with convoys, and then just a little later they will be the ones who will cry the loudest and longest for a declaration of war. Remember this, when the order comes to convoy, then the order to declare war is just a matter of time.

In all this dark picture and during these days when we who firmly believe that the future safety and perpetuation of our beloved country demands that we devote our energies and every effort to its defense here in the Western Hemisphere and not across the oceans, there is one constant ray of hope that burns on and on. It is the determination of those Americans who have become disillusioned and even now while we are being carried away on all sides by the shrewdest, most complete, and effective propaganda campaign known in all history, remember the small part our country has played in the power politics of Europe since 1918. These are the people who know that the majority of our people are opposed to our entering this war and the sending of American boys to foreign shores. Mind you, however, there are strong forces and subtle influences working night and day to drag us in and unless you, the womanhood of America, band yourselves together and cry out from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to the Rio Grande in one great chant "This is not our war! We will not send our boys abroad," then as surely as the morning sun will come over the eastern horizon the blood of our youth will be spilled in all probability in Europe, Africa, and Asia.

Now, a word as to national defense. In my opinion, every man and woman in America is conscious of our need for the proceeding with all the speed possible of our defense program. This is not the time when defense should in effect be sabotaged by the differences of labor and capital. This is as much their problem as it is ours. Our future safety may depend entirely upon the completion of this gigantic program and our Government should take a firm hand to see that nothing is done to interfere. We must prepare today for defense; tomorrow may be too late.

In recent months it would seem that it has become a major crime in the United States to be an American. Those who speak and act as Americans should are instantly pounced upon and then sneered at as dupes or agents of foreign powers, hostile to this republic. They are branded as un-American. There are some who go so far as to say they are traitors. This mode of attack upon American patriots in thought and deed is nothing new. It was put into ruthless operation in the Revolutionary War against George Washington and those who under and with him were risking their lives and everything they had to the end that America would be emancipated from trans-Atlantic chains and enabled to live her own life in her own way safe from all foreign interference and all foreign influence. Some call us continentalists, some appeasers, some fifth columnists, but whatever they call us, because we are interested in America our views upon the issue of saving America for Americans, still prevail in our hearts and minds.

In conclusion I want to say that a "Gold Star" is a beautiful cherished symbol, but no Gold Star ever made can fill the void left by the empty chair at the breakfast table. Let's keep always fresh in our mind our 50,000 war dead, the 234,000 twisted and torn bodies. Let's not be forced by our entrance into this War to place another "Unknown Dead" in Arlington National Cemetery to rest eternally beside the "Unknown Dead" of World War No. 1. Let's be strong like our brave forebears who gave us this great nation, let's make ourselves so strong that we will be invulnerable from attack from without and within, let's preserve our cherished ideals, institutions and government and let's put our trust and faith in Almighty God to guide us and to show us the way to make this preservation secure.

Town Hall's Meeting of the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY FRANCIS M. SHEA

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Francis M. Shea, Assistant Attorney General, at Town Hall's Meeting of the Air on May 29, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I venture to say that this country has never heard a more dramatic, a more fateful pronouncement than these words of the President, "I have tonight issued a proclamation that an unlimited national emergency exists and requires the strengthening of our defense to the extreme limit of our national power and authority."

Extraordinary powers are given the President of the United States in the face of a national emergency or the imminence of war. Many of these extraordinary powers, to be sure, had already been brought into play by the proclamation of a limited national emergency. Most of the so-called emergency powers were probably to some extent available. The limits of their justifiable exercise were, however, circumscribed by the terms of the earlier proclamation. The time has now come for the full use of whatever powers may be necessary for our national defense.

But a more important aspect of the proclamation is that it ends equivocation. It casts the die. It is the solemn and deliberate declaration of our responsible leader that the Nation is in immediate peril. It puts aside for us as a Nation all ordinary things, all personal things, all partisan things. It calls for a single aim, the safety of our country. It demands the unmeasured devotion of ourselves and all we have to our common cause.

The proclamation serves also to remind us that the President of the United States is not only the civil head of our Government, he is Commander in Chief of our armed forces. He has pronounced the solemn judgment that the life of the Nation is at stake. In such times the President must be first and foremost the Commander in Chief of our armed forces. The great security which we may feel tonight is the sure feeling that the President himself has no doubts as to his first obligations.

But there is this further security which we may feel as well. It is the security of our knowledge and our long tradition that the Commander in Chief of our armed forces remains always the President of the United States. That is the great symbol of our national life. It means that though our whole national will be bent toward military ends, the man who leads us in this effort is the constitutional head of our Government, the aims which we seek are the constitutional purposes of our Government, and so we may be sure that militarism shall not become for us an end in itself.

The question put us tonight is, What is the citizen's role in an unlimited national emergency? I have spent a little time in discussing the role of the President in such an emergency. I have spent this time because his role is but the prototype of the role which each of us must play.

It is our obligation as citizens to use all our powers to the extreme limit for the defense of the Nation. It is our obligation to be soldiers first but citizen-soldiers first and last. The habits and the practices of the soldier must never outrun in us the purposes of the citizen.

Let me try to make concrete what it seems to me are our obligations in this period. Let me attempt it with two or three examples. They cannot be exhaustive, but I hope that they may be suggestive.

There is nothing more difficult than to cut loose from our habitual ways and our habitual calculations. Yet our safety today demands ways which in normal times no prudent man would venture. We must, for instance, expand our capacity for airplane production without calculation of its ultimate use. It would probably be a safe rule of thumb to ask our experts for the extreme calculation of our needs and to order them to proceed with triple the program that they calculate. The President's call for a yearly production of 50,000 planes was such a bold act of imagination. It is only such boldness that can save the Nation. Men who say, "What use can I have for this plant when the war is ended? Where will my business be then? What will happen to my large foreign interests if this course be pursued?"—such men are dangerous to our security. Only by having our eye on the single aim, the aim of preserving the Nation, only by refusing to let our eye wander toward views of ultimate business expediency or the soundness of investment can we possibly bring down the thing we are aiming at.

Let me now turn to a second point, a second series of examples to demonstrate that only a President-Commander in Chief and only a citizen-soldier can win security for a democracy. The fall of France demonstrated for us that it was not the force of arms we needed most to fear, but the forces of division. We can have our security only if we can maintain the Union, this time not the union of the States, but the union of the spirit of all our people.

This war will be won by the forces of democracy and our security will be made fast only if labor has its heart in it, only if our youth has its heart in it. It will be won only if all our many and diverse alien populations have their heart in it. In times like these we cannot afford to forget those principles and those interests which are responsible for the devotion of all our people to this democracy.

It is of first importance for labor to understand that these times of stress will not be seized upon to diminish the rights of labor. It is the responsibility of all of us as citizens to make that clear. It is the responsibility of the Government, of the managers of business, of professional men, but above all, it is the responsibility of wise labor leaders. They can guide labor in ways that will put our common cause first. Those ways are the surest to preserve the rights of those they lead.

We can be thankful today for the National Youth Administration, for the Civilian Conservation Corps, for the fact that there have been leaders in our country who saw that democracy had to find ways of keeping open opportunity for youth, even in hardest times, if democracy was to survive. These leaders can now speak to youth for democracy. But it is the duty of all of us as citizens to speak to youth for democracy, and to keep open the opportunities of democracy for youth.

And what is our responsibility toward aliens? It is well to remember that we are a nation of aliens. If we remember this, we will know how to deal with those who represent the latest immigrations. We cannot have a united people if large alien groups are dissident, and they will be dissident if they feel any deep-rooted discriminations. Our problem is twofold. First, we must give these people democratic reasons to be proud of themselves in substitution for the Fascist reasons that have been given them by expert propagandists. And secondly, it is our duty to make it clear to all our citizens that this is a nation where race, color, creed, time of arrival or accident of birth does not circumscribe the possibilities open to each man. This must be implicit in our conduct, not merely in our talk.

There are enemy aliens. They must be dealt with. They must be dealt with surely and effectively, but it cannot be too often repeated that this is a professional job. The main job of our citizens is to refrain from making enemies of our aliens and to turn themselves to the task of making aliens devoted citizens of our democracy.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I hope to get time today later on to go in decent detail into some of the problems our country faces, as it goes forward to protect freedom and democracy against a whipsaw of Fascist forces on the one hand and Communist ones on the other. At the moment I rise to say one thing. When the National Defense Mediation Board was set up, I made a 1-minute speech and stated at that time that in my judgment the personnel of the Board was so evidently fair and contained such fine representation from labor that it was the duty of every group, capital and labor, to cooperate with this Board to the greatest possible extent. The one movement in this country in which I am probably most deeply interested is the labor movement The first step of every dictator has been the destruction of the organizations of the people, and labor has gone first. My basic desire is to really protect the labor movement. And in so doing I have got to speak out against some utterly irresponsible tactics which, if persisted in, will react against the whole movement, fine as it is. When I read in the newspaper that the president, Mr. Orton, of the International Woodworkers, refuses the proposition offered by the Mediation Board, which grants a wage increase of part of what the union asks, continuing negotiations, and retroactive payment of wages if they may be increased as a result of the negotiations, and then charges the Board with being "an all-out, labor-busting and strike-breaking device * * * to bulldoze our workers" it seems to me that we have evidence there of a kind of leadership that will never do labor in this country any good, that is not directed toward the welfare of the United States, but which in my judgment is directed from some other source in this world. I could submit evidence of some of Orton's organizational connections but his own actions speak louder than that. True labor leadership today will seek three objectives above all others: the wage standards of the men and the recognition of their organizations; the avoidance, like the plague, of any action that will put labor in a position where it will lose public support at a time when it needs it so much; and, finally, the welfare of the United States. Ninety-five percent, at least, of union members and leaders ask these things. A few like the men above referred to are just simply on the other side from the real interest of American labor.

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM PERTH AMBOY EVENING NEWS

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial taken from the June 2 issue of the Perth Amboy Evening News which comments on the need for a separate air department.

I agree with the opinion expressed in the editorial, and hope we shall set up a separate air force department now, and not wait until we are in the middle of a fight to discover the need for this new branch of government.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Perth Amboy (N. J.) Evening News of June 2, 1941]

AIR DEPARTMENT

Any doubt as to the importance of a formidable air force has been removed as a result of the record made by airplanes in this war. Britannia for years ruled the waves but Germany today rules the skies and it is being proven that control of the air is now more valuable in carrying on a mechanized war than control of the oceans.

The long-distance bomber, capable of flying thousands of miles nonstop with several tons of bombs, has proven its value as a weapon of both attack and defense. It is essential to the United States, and as bigger and better bombers are built so will the United States be brought closer to those countries which are now separated from us by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

At the present time both the Army and the Navy have their own Air Corps. Recommendations have been heard from time to time for several years that the United States divorce its air forces from the Army and Navy and make it a separate department in order that efficiency might be increased.

There are the "die hards" in the Navy who, despite what has happened and is happening in Europe today to prove conclusively the advantages airplanes have over warships, still maintain that it is better to spend $100,000,000 for a battleship which can be sunk like the Hood from the air with a loss of 1,200 or more lives than it is to build 200 or more bombers capable of carrying tons of explosives and only comparatively small crews.

The British Navy has not been responsible for preventing the invasion of the British Isles. Neither have the antiaircraft guns nor the large army encamped on the islands. Again it has been the airplane, the Royal Air Force, which has filled the gap and despite the difference in numbers of planes has succeeded in battling and holding off the air invaders.

Crete was invaded via the air and other countries have found themselves fighting a losing battle because troops, guns, tanks, and other war materials were dropped from the skies. American airplane production has reached a new peak but many of the planes now turned out are being used to bolster up Britain's air strength.

The day of the airplane has arrived and a Nation's power will be directly proportionate to its air power, both in numbers, distance, performance, and striking power. There is still some use for the battle fleets but there are many places, too close to land, where they cannot operate without being the targets for air bombs dropped either by dive bombers or other high-flying types.

With our air force becoming so important it seems that it should come under the direction of a department which specializes in that particular branch of the service instead of splitting it up between the Army and Navy as is done at present.

This war and future wars will be won via the air. The nation that is to come out the eventual winner will be the one that loses no time in making the most of its chances to improve, develop, and enlarge its bombing planes, fighters, and the other types which are essential in war today.

Convoying

REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have received, under date of May 27, a letter addressed to me by Kenneth Ogle, chairman of the Indiana Committee for National Defense, which committee is affiliated with the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. With his letter he enclosed a resolution of the Marion County Central Labor Union, which includes the city of Indianapolis, Ind., in favor of convoying. According to Mr. Ogle, this resolution was adopted with only one dissenting vote, the action being taken by the delegates. He expresses to me a desire that this matter be given the same publicity as was accorded a straw ballot on the question of convoying and entering the war, which was conducted by the Indianapolis News, and which was called to the attention of the House by me.

Therefore, while I have declared myself as personally opposed to convoying, I want, in the interest of fairness and in this manner, to present to the Congress and the country the sentiments of the Marion County Central Labor Union, as expressed in the following resolution adopted by its delegates:

Whereas the Nazis prior to actual war engage in intrigue, both economic and political, of every description as previously exemplified in Europe and currently in every country in South and North America with the possible exception of Canada, but including the United States, and

Whereas if Hitler wins over Britain his economic attack will continue successfully since he will have South America and much of North America at his mercy through control of their more important markets, and

Whereas under these circumstances, most of these countries would be forced to adhere to his doctrine—in other words become Nazis, and

Whereas the United States cannot afford to be surrounded by Nazi nations in this Hemisphere, and

Whereas the only way in which this can be prevented is to bring about the complete defeat of Germany, and in this undertaking the least we can do is to deliver the goods to Britain now: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Central Labor Union urges all citizens, including especially those of industrial America in organized labor and management, join in saying to the President, we support:

(1) Full mobilization of the industrial, economic, and moral life of this country for production of war materials, and

(2) Use of American naval forces for police, convoy, or in whatever way is most effective to insure the delivery of these materials to Britain, and

It is further our belief that in these times of stress and national peril it is absolutely essential for the defense and safety of this country that public opinion unite behind the duly constituted government of this country.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

ADDRESS BY SGT. ALVIN C. YORK

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Sgt. Alvin C. York at Arlington on May 30, 1941:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, of which I am very proud to be a member, have kindly invited me to address you today. They could have chosen many far better speakers. There is a famous trans-Atlantic aviator, for one, and a United States Senator whose favorite bird must be the ostrich. They would have been glad to come here, but I was invited instead.

Maybe the veterans felt I knew this Unknown Soldier a little better than either of them.

You see, but for the grace of Almighty God, in this consecrated tomb might be the mortal remains of one whose name is Alvin C. York. Both the aviator and the Senator were denied that privilege, which possibly explains why they feel differently than the veterans do about this country's most pressing problems. Liberty is not merely something the veterans inherited. Liberty is something they fought to keep.

There is a line in Scripture which says that if a man doth die, his spirit shall nevertheless live on. How true that is, you here today have seen with your very own eyes, for the spirit of this soldier lives on in the heart of every real American.

There are those in our country today who ask me and the other veterans who fought in World War No. 1: "You fought to make the world safe for democracy. What did it get you?"

Let me answer them now. It got me 23 years of living in an America where a humble citizen from the mountains of Tennessee can participate in the same ceremonies with the President of the United States. It got me 23 years of living in a country where the Goddess of Liberty is stamped on men's hearts, as well as the coins in their pockets.

People who ask us that question—"What did it get you?"—forget one thing. Yes; we fought that last war to make the world safe for democracy, and we did—for a while. The thing they forget is that liberty and freedom and democracy are so very precious that you do not fight to win them once—and then stop. Liberty and freedom and democracy are prizes awarded only to those peoples who fight to win them, and then keep fighting eternally to hold them.

By our victory in the last war, we won a lease on liberty, not a deed to it. Now, after 23 years, Adolf Hitler tells us that lease is expiring, and after the manner of all leases, we have the privilege of renewing it, or letting it go by default. I have no doubt that the American people choose to renew it, Senator WHEELER to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Senator ought to know by now that you can't protect yourself against bullets with an umbrella.

Isolationism is not a new idea. If it were, it might be worth trying, if only because every new idea deserves a chance. Those here who defend isolation as our policy must have remarkably short memories. They must have already forgotten the awful sight of small European countries dying like so many little children stricken with a new and terrible plague.

France let Germany into the Rhineland because there was a large group of isolationists in the French Government. They weren't afraid, because they were protected by the Maginot line, beyond which no invader could possibly advance. They forgot that there are more doors to every house—even every house of cards—than the front one.

Before the people of England were fortunate enough to get as their leader that great statesman and lover of the democratic process, Winston Churchill, England also had a large isolationist group who were content to let Germany devour Europe. They were content if only Germany would promise to stay on the other side of the Channel. I hope the day will never come when our Capital is renamed—Munich, D. C.

At the beginning of this year our Congress passed, after a series of debates which displayed the democratic process in fullest flower, a bill known as the lend-lease bill. It gave our President the right to sell, lend, lease, or otherwise dispose of any war materials—and here I quote—to any country whose defense is vital to the defense of the United States. It made this country what it should rightly be, an arsenal for democracy.

But Hitler is not going to be defeated by any guns, or tanks, or planes that lie gathering rust at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean.

Congress agreed, when it passed that law, that an English victory was vital to the defense of the United States. It has become no less vital to us since those stormy hours. And yet I hear the same voices who opposed that bill now opposing the use of convoys.

We must give all-out aid to England, and we must give it now. If that means that we have to use convoys, then we should use them. The time is not now ripe, nor will it ever be, to compromise with Hitler, or the things he stands for.

If we do not protect our shipments of foods and munitions, there is some question as to whether or not England can long hold out. And if England falls, we are next on Hitler's list. Make no mistake about that.

For that selfish reason, if for no other, it is our business to see that Hitler and his assassination of those rights that together constitute the American way of life is stopped, and stopped now.

The Atlantic Ocean, our appeasers say, is wide and affords us protection from foreign invasion. That is true—so long as England rules the waves. But if she fails, and barbaric Germany should be triumphant, the only part of the Atlantic Ocean that would be safe for America would be that part which daily laps our shores, and is protected by powerful coast artillery units.

If Hitler wins in Europe, we Americans will find ourselves surrounded by hostile nations who will not, even if we so choose, let us keep to ourselves. The evil combination of Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan will then operate against us even more openly than it does now. I may be wrong, but I doubt that the American I am now looking at, or the American 3,000 miles from here, or at any point in between, is a man from whose shoulder you can continually knock chips without having him decide to fight.

If I am wrong, and he is that kind of a man, then let us stop making guns, and let us surrender to Hitler right now, while we can still do so on our own terms.

But if he is that kind of a man, then Americans have changed. The boy whose remains are in this Unknown Soldier's grave wouldn't recognize that kind of an American. England is fighting for her very life—for the right of her people to be free. We have always fought for that right. If we have stopped, then we owe the memory of George Washington an apology, for if we have stopped, then he wasted his time at Valley Forge.

We are standing at a crossroads in history. The important capitals of the world in a few years will either be Berlin and Moscow, or Washington and London. I, for one, prefer Congress and Parliament to Hitler's Reichstag and Stalin's Kremlin. And because we were, for a time, side by side, I know this Unknown Soldier does, too.

We owe it to him to renew that lease on liberty he helped us to get.

May God help us to be equal to the task.

Proximity of United States to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

EDITORIAL BY STANTON HUDSON

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD editorial comment appearing in the Sedalia (Mo.) Times, of May 30, 1941, written by Mr. Stanton Hudson, who was a very distinguished and gallant soldier during the last war, on the subject of the general proximity of the United States to war.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sedalia (Mo.) Times of May 30, 1941]

MY COL'M

(By Stanton Hudson)

Of course, I'm as concerned as you are about the situation as regards war, but the biggest problem facing us right here in Sedalia right at this moment is our need for a right smart shower. The Nazis may get us later, but the immediate threat is from our potato bugs. Like the Nazis, they have their allies, too. They have the cutworms helping them, just like Hitler has Mussolini. And then over on my beans there are some unidentified "fifth columnists" who are doing their bit, too.

In spite of the President's pronouncement the other night of "unlimited emergency," whatever that may mean, I still stand on my original premise that we have no business whatever in this present war. We found out, and generally agreed after the World War, that we had no business in it, either. I only hope that we find out about this war before we get in it—not afterward, as was the case 25 years ago.

Though the President termed those who want to stay out of this war "timid," this is a very inappropriate appellation. Senator BENNETT C. CLARK served with the A. E. F. 23 years ago. To now call him timid sounds rather foolish. He has spent the years since the A. E. F. examining the causes and reasons for war, and has come to the inescapable conclusion that there is no justification for our entry into the present war. I rely on his judgment, which I believe to be as sound, and probably sounder, on the subject of war as any now being voiced.

The "timid" class includes me, too, I guess, because I don't want any truck with this war, or any other. Really, I don't think I'm so awfully timid. If I was, I wouldn't have volunteered in the last war to "Make the world safe, etc.," the same day war was declared. Naw, I ain't timid, I've just had experience.

And I'm not pro-German, or pro-Hitler, nor an Anglophobe, nor nothin'. I just don't like war, having seen its utter barbarianism, waste of life and limb and property, and senseless uselessness. I don't care anything about the Germans one way or the other, and feel exactly the same way about the English—which is exactly the way they all feel about us. I care only about my own country and my fellow Americans. I care so much about them that I don't want to see any more of them killed helping any foreign power that secretly thinks of us as chumps, after it's all over.

Because of an astounding increase in size since my discharge from the Army I wouldn't be considered very choice cannon fodder now, but I am willing to again offer myself in the defense of my country any time it is threatened by a foreign power. But this time I've got to know.

The Taking of Polls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 5 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

EXTRACT FROM ARTICLE BY HELEN ESSARY

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to present a request for unanimous consent for inclusion of a matter in the RECORD.

One of the most startling features of the new propaganda machine in this country has been the employment of so-called polls for the purpose of influencing and speeding up the entrance of the United States into war. On yesterday in the Washington Times-Herald there appeared an article written by Mrs. Helen Essary, herself a very distinguished newspaper writer in this city, and wife of one of the most distinguished men who has sat in the press gallery of the United States Senate during my time, in which she tells of her own knowledge of the methods employed as to surveys by some of the so-called polls.

I am not authorized to speak officially, but I understand she refers to the Gallup poll, and she says the poll taker was referred to particular citizens, especially those connected with the W. P. A. and relief. I ask unanimous consent that that portion of Mrs. Essary's article appearing in yesterday's Washington Times-Herald which refers to her information as to the method of taking polls, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the extract from the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 4, 1941]

(By Helen Essary)

The authentic and startling glimpse I got recently into the methods of forming public opinion by polltaking gives me some concern. Not only had I never met a polltaker before, I had never met anybody who had ever been asked a question by a public-opinion polltaker. Nor had I ever met anybody who knew anybody who had ever been asked a question by a public-opinion polltaker.

Naturally, talking to a polltaker in the living flesh, whose name must be anonymous, was a big experience. I was curious.

"How do you choose the people to question?" I asked. "I assume that you pick at random in order to get a typical group."

"Oh, no," the polltaker answered. "I am given the names of 15 people whom I must go to see."

"What sort of people?"

"P. W. A. workers and people on relief."

"Well, aren't they likely to be prejudiced in favor of the administration?" I asked.

"Possibly. But I do what I'm told. I've just finished a questionnaire on convoys."

"Did most of your people know what convoys meant?"

"Very few of them did. So I had to tell them."

"Now, this is, indeed, interesting," I continued. "How did you describe a convoy?"

"I merely said that convoys are ships going in pairs. One ship going with another."

"Did you explain that one of such ships is a warship with guns to be shot when necessary? And that shooting such guns is an act of war and will put this country and its people in great danger?"

"No, indeed," was the calm answer. "I didn't go into that. I didn't think they'd understand."

Well, there are you. Of sure stuff are opinion polls made. Hardly a serious, honest reflection of what people think.

The Kingsbury Ordnance Plant—A Tribute to Army Engineer Maj. Benjamin T. Rogers, Bates & Rogers Construction Corporation, and Charles Cole & Son

REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. SCHULTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House of Representatives, I rise on the floor of the House this afternoon to speak about the Kingsbury Ordnance Plant, sometimes referred to as the Union Center Shell Loading Plant, and to pay tribute to a remarkable organization, the Army engineers, and to several men in particular.

The first one that I wish to talk about is Maj. Benjamin T. Rogers in charge of the construction of this huge project, a man of exceptionally outstanding abilities and unusually fine temperament. Major Rogers was sent out on this project when it was first brought into being and into a bare wilderness of some 13,000 acres of land, with farm houses dotted throughout the 13,000 acres, and including a cemetery, railroad depots, ditches, and boggy lands. Immediately upon his arrival it was evident that his leadership and his ability to bring peace out of chaos was shown.

As we all know, the contract was let to Bates & Rogers, a firm coming from the West that had been engaged in a great amount of railroad construction and other works of that nature. This firm was soon to be joined by Charles Cole & Son, of South Bend, Ind. Mr. Cole's architectural engineering ability is known to almost everyone throughout the entire Middle West. Any number of cities will attest to his unique ideas. Many buildings, bridges, and plants stand today as a monument to this architect-engineer.

These three that I have mentioned, Maj. Benjamin T. Rogers, of the Army Engineering Corps; Bates & Rogers Construction Corporation; and Charles Cole & Son, architect-engineer, make up one of the greatest combinations that I know of. I am mighty proud to say that the Kingsbury ordnance plant stands today about 80 percent completed, ready to ship shells within the next week or so, because of the outstanding teamwork that has been displayed by them. It has been my pleasure to visit the plant several times, and I know of no Government construction that has been carried out by the Federal Government in the United States that has gone on more smoothly and with practically no labor trouble than has the Kingsbury plant because of the guiding influence of this organization. I hope that should the Government have any other projects of like nature to be built in the very near future, that because of the serious situation this Nation finds itself in, that our Government will see fit to take advantage of this remarkable trio. and because of their experience and ability to do things in a big way, they will place them in charge, and I defy any Member of Congress to show me any project that will cost from one million to one hundred million dollars that has been more successfully constructed with less waste of money than has this one.

For the benefit of some of the Members I want to say that in accordance with Public, No. 309, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved August 7, 1939, and Public, No. 703, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved July 2, 1940, a contract was let to Giffels, Vallet, Inc., Detroit, Mich., and Charles W. Cole & Son, South Bend, Ind., as architect-engineers for the construction of a shell-loading plant, including necessary buildings, utilities, and appurtenances, on a 13,000-acre tract of land situated between the New York Central and St. Louis Railroads and the Kankakee River on the east, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad on the south, United States Route No. 35 on the west, the Wabash Railroad on the north, and the Grand Trunk Railroad on the northwest, said tract of land being approximately 7 miles from La Porte, Ind., to the south. By virtue of the same act of Congress, a contract was let to the Bates & Rogers Construction Corporation, Chicago, Ill., on October 30, 1940, as contractors for the building of the project. On November 7, 1940, a contract was let to Todd & Brown, Inc., New York, N. Y., as design consultants and operators of the Kingsbury ordnance plant.

Four administration buildings were all occupied by December 26, 1940, and the job of constructing permanent buildings, railroads, roads, loading lines, and miscellaneous buildings was begun in earnest. As originally planned, the daily output of this plant is to be 40,000 fixed rounds of 20 mm.; 50,000 fixed rounds of 37 mm.; 40,000 fixed rounds of 75 mm., or 90 mm., or 105 mm.; 40,000 fixed rounds of 60 mm. trench mortar, with corresponding fuzes and boosters for the above. One hundred and thirty-five storage buildings had to be constructed with the following operating buildings: Five load lines, 2 fuze lines, 2 booster lines, 1 ammonia nitrate-amatol plant, administration buildings and shops, fire-department buildings and equipment, staff dwellings, mess halls, hospitals, guards' quarters, and so forth. Operating utilities as follows. Water, electricity, air, steam, and sewer lines, gatehouse and fencing, railroads—35 miles, later changed to 65 miles—roads, and walks. By May 1, 1941, 100,000 square feet of storage space will be available for occupancy, increasing proportionately thereafter until the total of 1,016,750 square feet have been constructed.

The original estimate of the cost of the project, including the purchase of land, was set at $13,340,000, which also included the contractor's fee. Notice to proceed was given November 4, 1940, and ground was broken for the temporary administration buildings on Armistice Day, November 11, 1940, prior to which time the architect-engineers had been making their preliminary surveys for about 2 weeks. Inasmuch as the project was somewhat new and different in design from any other arsenal, Vandykes were procured from the Picatinny Arsenal, Dover, N. J., and had to be redesigned so they could be adapted to the needs of this plant. At the present writing there are 115 approved plans for buildings on this project with a possible 200 more to follow. With an increase in the number of buildings, miles of road, miles of railroad, and additional utilities, it is now estimated that the project will cost $23,000,000. The project is right up to schedule, being about 35 percent complete, with final completion date scheduled for November 1, 1941.

The construction of the Kingsbury Ordnance Plant is under the supervision of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army, represented by the constructing quartermaster, who is assisted by the architect-engineer firm of Giffels, Vallet & Cole, and the constructing contractor, Bates & Rogers Construction Corporation, all joined together to construct and equip a plant to be operated by the firm of Todd & Brown, Inc., under the supervision of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, represented by the commanding officer, Major Rogers. The constructing quartermaster's function is to insure construction of a plant in accordance with plans and specifications promulgated by the architect-engineer in conjunction with the design consultant, Todd & Brown, Inc., all the while coordinating the various operations to conformance with existing standard War Department construction specifications. The constructing quartermaster serves as coordinator of the activities of all agencies participating in construction of the plant.

The firm of Bates & Rogers Construction Corporation is well manned and well equipped for carrying out the various construction operations necessary for speedy completion of the plant. Every opportunity has been taken to mechanize the construction operation, some of the special features being two central concrete-mixing plants with a combined total of 2,000 cubic yards of concrete per day, which is delivered to the construction sites by a fleet of about 30 transit mixer trucks. A two-way radio communication system enables the constructing quartermaster, the works manager, and the various superintendents of Bates & Rogers, and various other officials to transmit and receive orders immediately. Included among the construction equipment are 38 caterpillar tractors, 16 LeTourneau carry-alls, 4 LeTourneau rooters, 7 motor patrols, 20 LeTourneau bulldozers, 1 Baker hydraulic, and 8 road rollers. Thirty large cranes are also in use. It is estimated that between 2,500,000 and 3,000,000 cubic yards of dirt will have been moved upon completion of the project.

In its inception the operation as a whole was designed as nearly as possible along the lines of a large-scale military operation and every effort was made to safeguard the interests of the United States in the purchase of supplies and equipment; for example, although each of the three contractors was authorized to purchase his own supplies and equipment, all purchases were concentrated in one purchasing agency with the exception that on those items covered by Treasury Department contracts, which were required in quantity and which could be purchased at substantial savings to the Government, these purchases were made direct by the constructing quartermaster. On such items as office furniture and machines and automobile tires and equipment substantial savings have been affected.

This office has been on the alert to cooperate with similar activities in the United States and have transferred large quantities of automotive and other equipment into this organization that were on the verge of being released to vendors after substantial rentals were paid by other War Department construction activities. We, in turn, have released a quantity of concrete forms from this project, at no cost, to two other projects, and will be able to release additional equipment as the work nears completion. The constructing contractor, who is the central purchasing agency for the five organizations, joined together on the project, conducts his purchasing activities in full accordance with all Government rules and regulations governing purchases. Even on minor items he is organized to the extent that competitive bids are received and awards made to the concerns serving the best interests of the United States.

Labor relations on this project have been particularly gratifying. Due to the peculiar geographic location of this project in relation to nearby large employment centers and also the fact that the prevailing wage rate as determined by the Department of Labor was lower than the prevailing rates for similar classifications in the larger employment centers immediately adjacent to the project, a certain amount of readjustment was to be expected and was made without any disruption of construction operations. Local labor has been employed extensively. For example, of the approximately 83 civilian employees in the constructing quartermaster's office, 56 are residents of the immediate area. The architect-engineer employs approximately 325 people; the construction contractor, approximately 3,700; and it has been determined that larger percentages of local employment prevail in these organizations. Of the 3,700 employees of the constructing contractor, a canvass reveals that over 70 percent were from La Porte County, in which the plant is located. And there, my friends, is the story of Kingsbury, a tribute to the trio.

Antiwar Sentiment Unchanged by President's Fireside Chat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Washington Times-Herald by Mr. Griffing Bancroft, showing that mail to Members of Congress shows that the majority of people in America remain opposed to convoys and war. The article follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald]

(By Griffing Bancroft)

President Roosevelt's fireside chat and his declaration of a national emergency have not altered the antiwar sentiment, in mail to the Members of Congress, an International News Service poll showed today.

Following speeches April 24 by Secretary of State Hull and Secretary of Navy Knox—two addresses which touched off the intervention drive—representative groups in the House and Senate were polled as to what effect the drive was having on their mail.

MIDDLE WEST AGAINST WAR

The canvass showed the Middle West overwhelmingly noninterventionist, the South running about 50–50, and the far West and East going 2 to 1 and 4 to 1 against convoying.

Since that poll, important utterances have been made not only by President Roosevelt but by virtually every member of his Cabinet.

Today the same legislators were asked what effect these addresses and statements have had on their mail. By sections, here is a summary of replies:

In the Middle West, letter writers have become more overwhelmingly opposed to force, much more violent in demanding that their representatives do something about it, and generally opposed to the President's speech.

LITTLE CHANGE IN SOUTH

In the South there was little change, two districts showing interventionist gains, two veering the other way, and eight remaining the same. On the whole the South liked Mr. Roosevelt's address.

New England and the East stayed at about 4 to 1 against intervention, with little reaction to the speech, but in the far West interventionists showed slight gains, although sentiment was still against armed participation.

Here are typical results of the survey:

Middle West: Senator RAYMOND E. WILLIS (Republican), of Indiana—Mail is almost altogether opposed to intervention and stronger and more vocal. Not a single letter favoring the President's speech. Representative STEPHEN BOLLES (Republican), of Wisconsin—No shift; still 80 to 1 against convoys and unanimous against war, although a little more anxious about it now. Representative ROBERT F. JONES (Republican), of Ohio—Writers much more disturbed and violent now, fearing free speech may be done away with. Representative RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ (Democrat), of Michigan—Before had a few favoring convoys; now all are against.

South: Senator ALLEN J. ELLENDER (Democrat), of Louisiana—A month ago 15 letters a day, mostly favoring convoys; now 3 a day, about 50–50. Representative PAUL J. KILDAY (Democrat), of Texas—Less mail now; still 50–50. Representative JOHN J. SPARKMAN (Democrat), of Alabama—Still almost unanimous favoring convoys. Representative J. PERCY PRIEST (Democrat), of Tennessee—Complete returns on 2,000 questionnaires sent into his district shows 92 percent favoring convoys.

New England: Senator RALPH O. BREWSTER (Republican) of Maine—Percentage for convoys up a little, but still mostly against. Representative FOSTER STEARNS (Republican) of New Hampshire—Still about 50–50. Representative GEORGE J. BATES (Republican) of Massachusetts—Still about 4 to 1 against convoys, with noninterventionists up a little.

East: Representative WILLIAM P. COLE (Democrat) of Maryland—Was 4 to 1 against convoys, now 3 to 1. Representative D. LANE POWERS (Republican) of New Jersey—From 50–50 to 70–30 against intervention, but most favored the emergency declaration. Representative SOL BLOOM (Democrat) of New York—Little heavier against convoy now, but still about 50–50, received 150 postcards in 1 day opposing war; 12 letters favoring speech, none against.

Far West: Senator HIRAM JOHNSON (Republican) of California—Virtually no mail now on convoy while it was 25 to 1 against, about 50–50 on speech. Representative JERRY VOORHIS (Democrat) of California—No change, still mostly against but reaction to speech favorable. Representative WESLEY E. DISNEY (Democrat) of Oklahoma—Still very heavy, about 4 to 1 against convoy, virtually none on speech.

Aid for the Middle-Aged Mechanic

REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I represent a district in New York which is largely populated by mechanics. They are family men who have spent years at their trades. I find that when they apply for positions at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, or other governmental departments, they invariably receive a rating of 70 percent from the Civil Service Commission, which is the lowest passing mark. The reason for this low rating is to be found in the fact that in recent years they have been unable to follow their trades, either through lack of employment or because they were working outside their trades on W. P. A. projects, and are assumed to have lost their skill. I assume that other Representatives have found a similar situation in their districts. Unless something is done for these middle-aged mechanics of our country, they can have little or no hope of again getting back into industry. I believe if freshening-up courses were made available to these men in our trade and vocational schools many hundreds of mechanics would be made available for defense work. To that end, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 4958) authorizing the appropriation of $10,000,000 for that purpose, to be expended under the direction of the United States Commissioner of Education.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1941.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
Mayor of the City of New York,
City Hall, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: I wish to call your attention to a situation in which, I believe, your assistance would be invaluable. Representing, as I do, a district whose residents are mostly mechanics, I find that hundreds of them have filed applications for employment with the various Government agencies, especially at the Brooklyn Navy Yard and Army Base. Although they have spent years at their trades, they invariably receive a rating of 70 percent, which is the lowest passing mark. I am advised that the reason for the low rating is because in recent years they have been out of employment or not working at their trades on W. P. A. It appears that long unemployment or employment at other than their trades automatically brings their rating down.

Might I suggest that freshening-up classes in the vocational schools and trade schools be made available to these men so that they might brush up on their trades, enabling them to secure employment at their trades and get off W. P. A. or the relief rolls? These men have not the funds with which to pay tuition in private trade schools, and unless some such opportunity such as I have suggested is afforded them I fear the New York mechanic of middle age will not again be able to get back into private industry.

If Federal funds are necessary to establish or to aid such classes, I would be pleased to bend every effort to obtain such allocation.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WALTER A. LYNCH,
Member of Congress.

TRADE SCHOOLS PAY DIVIDENDS

Even before the mobilization of industry for national defense provided new impetus, the movement for vocational education had made considerable progress in the New York City school system and numerous educators endorsed the argument that in this mechanized era, mastery of a trade is a prime requisite for the youth embarking on the task of earning his own living.

This year's graduating classes in the city's vocational high schools are reaping substantial benefits from the nature of their training, and they provide fresh evidence of the foresight of the pioneers who overcame stiff opposition in academic circles and effected a great expansion in vocational education.

Morris E. Siegel, director of the Board of Education's division of evening and continuation schools, reported recently that hundreds of seniors in the 24 vocational schools have been offered jobs, and he predicted that by graduation time, at the end of June, 70 percent of the 3,500 students in this category will have employment. Further, he is willing to prophesy that every last one of the seniors will be working before October. The 566 enrolled in aviation mechanics (a record number) are all expected to find positions immediately upon graduation.

Not in the lushest days of 1929 prosperity could the academic institutions produce figures like this—and certainly not at present. The diploma between the lines of which are written proficiency in Latin and literature just cannot compete in job-getting power with the one granted for skill at the lathe and the internal-combustion engine; at woodworking or metalcraft.

This is not to say that cultural instruction is a delusion. It is anything but that. Dr. Ernest E. Cole, New York State commissioner of education, citing statistics to show that in 1911 fewer than 1,000 pupils were enrolled in trade and vocational courses in this State as against 300,000 today, said, nevertheless, that it would be calamitous to neglect cultural advancement. With this we thoroughly agree.

But now the national interests join with personal economic considerations to demand that the schools turn out abundant contingents of workers efficient at the machines on which at this moment the preservation of civilization depends in more acute degree than on the professions and white-collar pursuits whose personnel also must be provided by the schools and colleges.

It is true that the quick successes foreseen for the current New York City vocational graduates is not equivalent to a guaranty that any boy or girl who learns a trade is sure to get work at once. In fact, the State employment service says there is an oversupply of electrical and auto mechanics, and it has advised the board of education to discontinue defense-training courses in those subjects and to concentrate on machinists, many thousands of whom are needed at once.

On the whole, however, the balance today is sharply in favor of students with manual skill as against their purely academic colleagues—from the bread-and-butter standpoint.

National Youth Administration in Kansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, the National Youth Administration seeks to aid young people by (1) providing part-time employment for needy secondary-school, college, and graduate students from 16 through 24 years of age, so that they may continue their education; (2) providing part-time employment for needy, out-of-school youth on projects designed not only to afford productive work but to benefit youth generally and the communities in which they live; (3) extending job training and counseling services for N. Y. A. youth and the preparation and distribution of occupational information; and (4) promoting health and recreational activities for N. Y. A. out-of-school project workers.

A summary of current operations of the N. Y. A. programs in Kansas shows the job has been well done, and I am happy to report that many, many Kansas school officials have recently written to me urging that there be no reduction in the N. Y. A. appropriation for 1942.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a report on current operations of the N. Y. A. programs in Kansas:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to cite a few cases to show the actual results of the N. Y. A. program.

William Stone, 21, was one of five children whose mother was forced to place them in a charitable institution for care upon the death of their father in 1929. Taking her youngest child, a 2-year-old girl, the mother went to another State to seek employment, and the family was not reunited until 1938.

In the meantime, young Stone carried papers during the years he attended high school, being graduated from a Wichita school in 1938. He was unable to find anything but an occasional odd job, and in the latter part of that year he received N. Y. A. employment. He has been employed on N. Y. A. projects over a period covering 2 years, although he has left whenever he has been able to secure private employment.

It was during the time he was receiving N. Y. A. training that he heard of an opening with a Wichita millwork company, and, following up his lead, he was subsequently hired at $16 a week. He has been working for the company as a machine operator—saws, drill press, and similar equipment—for more than a year.

An elder brother has recently secured employment with an aircraft factory. Their earnings, coupled with the money his eldest sister receives as a stenographer at the N. Y. A. project, enables the family to remain together.

Martin, Carl, and Simon Hein are the eldest sons of a former Reno County, Kans., farmer who lost his land, a quarter-section farm, in the hard times of the depression. All have received part-time employment at the Wichita N. Y. A. woodworking project, although all three have since obtained private employment with local companies.

Martin, 27, averages between $115 and $120 a month as a driver for a Wichita cab company; Carl, 25, receives 57½ cents an hour for a 40-hour week as gang foreman in the wing-flap section of an aircraft factory; and Simon, 23, works as a filling-station attendant for between $16 and $18 a week, depending upon whether he works overtime. None went beyond the eighth grade in school.

Their father had only odd jobs to sustain the 11-member family after moving to Wichita from Reno County, although he later received a W. P. A. job at approximately $62 a month. At that time he was the only breadwinner in the family, and he now is employed as a maintenance man for Sedgwick County, with a maximum salary of about $86 a month.

The three boys, Martin said, "just loafed around" until they heard about the N. Y. A. from other guys. Martin was the first to receive part-time employment in the woodworking project here. Later Carl and Simon were employed together on the same project. Most of their salary from the N. Y. A. went to aid the remainder of the family. Indeed, all are contributing part of their present salary to the family's upkeep, since they are living at home.

Martin's experience is typical. Running away from home some time ago, he obtained employment as an apprentice in a machine shop at Tulsa, Okla. But, after a time, he became homesick and returned to Wichita. He was out of work for 2 years before being employed at the N. Y. A. project. He was required to leave the project 2 years ago because of his age. Hearing of an opening with a taxicab company here from another youth on the project, he immediately applied and was accepted.

Martin expressed a desire to "set up" his own shop for cabinetmaking here in Wichita as a result of his experience on the woodworking project. However, he said the prospect of obtaining enough money to make the initial outlay to equip the shop with a band saw, lathe, and other woodworking tools appeared almost hopeless.

He said he was not content with his present employment, but that he did not want to change jobs "and get something that won't be steady." He said employment as a carpenter in an aircraft factory did not appear permanent enough to warrant a change.

Simon, who is employed as a filling-station attendant, said his employer had given him assurance that his job would be permanent. He is blind in his left eye, the result of a childhood accident. Another accident last year in which he fractured an arm at the elbow has been giving trouble, and he has been paying for medical attention beside contributing to the family finances. Simon quit the N. Y. A. project here last month to take his present job.

When asked whether he believed his work on the N. Y. A. project had benefited him in any way, Martin said:

Well, we all want to go into woodworking, but Carl is the only one whose training is doing him any good. But it did keep me and my brothers off the street and out of jail.

Harold and Melvin Sample, aged 19 and 24, respectively, are permanently employed by Wichita firms. Harold, who had been receiving work experience with the Wichita N. Y. A. out-of-school program, is working for a local contractor as a carpenter; Melvin who began the training program, left after working through only one pay period and is employed as a bus boy in a grill here.

Harold became interested in the woodworking project through his father, a carpenter. The scarcity of work in that field during the winter months did not deter the youth, although he had seen that his father's wages had averaged between $400 and $600 a year since the depression.

Both he and his father are employed by the same contractor at the present time, and assurance has been made that enough work will be obtained to keep them steadily at their jobs for at least a year. Harold has been working for 2 months at 35 cents an hour. He said he expected to be raised to 40 cents an hour within the next 2 weeks.

He was graduated from high school in 1935. Out of work for almost a year, he received employment at the woodworking project. He left the N. Y. A. project several times during the 2 years covered by employment here to take private jobs, none of which were steady. In June 1940, he quit to take a job in an Oregon box factory. The work was seasonal, however, and after a series of odd jobs he was hired by his present employer.

The N. Y. A. has taught me a good trade—and it really has helped me. I think it's a good thing for a fellow to learn a trade. He may get sidetracked, but it always gives him something to fall back on.

He said—

Melvin was graduated from high school in 1940, a year ago. He was unable to find anything but odd jobs, and finally, on his brother's insistence, applied for an N. Y. A. job. He quit soon after with this explanation:

I thought I was licked when I couldn't find a decent job after leaving high school, and taking an N. Y. A. job seemed like going on relief. When I got that first pay check and had a little money in my pocket, I had confidence enough to start looking for another job. Of course, $10 a week and board isn't much, but it helps the folks. And I don't intend to be making only $10 a week the rest of my life.

Nadine Sharon, 22, a former N. Y. A. youth, is now employed as a power-machine operator for a Wichita tent and awning company which has begun work on a Government contract to manufacture pup tents for Army use. Unable to finish high school, Miss Sharon, after working at odd jobs, applied for part-time employment with the N. Y. A. to supplement the income of her father, a salesman for a tea company in Wichita, whose $22-a-week salary went to the support of a family of six persons.

At the present time Miss Sharon is receiving $20 a week, plus bonus. Her brother, also a former N. Y. A. youth, is employed by a lithographing company.

I appreciated my N. Y. A. job so much—

She Said—

It kept me from feeling that I was a dead weight on the family.

Gene Stewart, a 20-year-old Fredonia, Kans., youth, entered the radio unit of the Topeka N. Y. A. resident mechanical center last October. He had been interested in radio throughout his high-school career, but no facilities for training this vocation were offered. His knowledge of radio previous to entrance at the N. Y. A. training center had been gained through reading technical journals and books on radio.

Two weeks ago the chief engineer of radio station WIBW, Topeka, the Capper Publications, sought out Allan Barstow, radio engineer at the N. Y. A. unit and requested that he recommend a youth whose record at the N. Y. A. training center indicated a high degree of capability.

Stewart was recommended for the job and at the present time is an engineer at W. I. B. W. His beginning salary, Barstow said, could be placed somewhere between $18 and $25 a week. From all appearances, he added, the position is permanent. Stewart had received a technician's license, issued by the F. C. C., after entering the N. Y. A. radio unit.

The N. Y. A. radio unit at Topeka is the only one of its kind in the State of Kansas. It was started in October 1940. However, the unit already has a high percentage of placements, even after so short a time. In addition to the placement of Stewart with W. I. B. W., Barstow reported that another youth had received a civil-service position as an operator for the border patrol; another has received employment as an apprentice electrician with a Topeka firm; two youths are in the Army's signal division (both, it is believed, are in Federal service at Camp Robinson, Ark.); and three or four others are planning to enter the Army this summer, intending to make a career of Army radio work.

The potentialities of N. Y. A. training in radio work and other trades in fitting youth to take a place in the national-defense program need hardly be stressed.

Fifteen of the 40 youths at the radio unit at Topeka already have received their amateur operator's license, with other applications now pending approval by the F. C. C.

Union Now Idea Old Stuff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

ARTICLE BY JOHN B. TREVOR, PRESIDENT OF AMERICAN COALITION

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a discussion of Union Now, by Mr. John B. Trevor, President of the American Coalition, which appeared in a recent issue of The New Republic.

UNION NOW?

(By John B. Trevor, president, American Coalition)

In the deluge of propaganda which is now submerging the American people, patriotic citizens should give some attention to an effort by internationalists to arouse public sentiment in behalf of a merger of the United States into the British commonwealth of nations. There is, of course, nothing really new about this plan. It is a plan which goes back to the days and dreams of Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie. Union Now in its modern dress is based on a book so entitled, of which the author is Clarence K. Streit, a former League of Nations' correspondent for the New York Times.

Mr. Streit's original conception was broader than now appears to be the scope of his plan. He originally contemplated a union of fifteen democracies; that is to say, the United States of America, Canada, the United Kingdom (of England, Scotland, and Wales), France, Ireland, Switzerland, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, Australia, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa. On the basis of one representative for each million of inhabitants, the union congress would have been apportioned as follows:

Australia	7
Belgium	8
Canada	11
Denmark	4
Finland	4
France	42
Ireland	3
Netherlands	8
New Zealand	2
Norway	3
Sweden	6
Switzerland	2
Union of South Africa	7
United Kingdom	45
United States	124
Total	277

With the collapse of virtually every vestige of democracy on the continent of Europe, Mr. Streit has modified his plan to include now only the English-speaking nations, and he has reconstituted his proposed parliament by giving a vote to one out of every five million inhabitants of the constituent countries of the proposed union. Under this plan the United States would have 27 representatives, the United Kingdom 11, Canada 3, Australia 3, and Eire, Union of South Africa, and New Zealand 2 each, as set forth in a leaflet issued by the Federal Union, Inc. On the face of it, there is a bait offered to the American people in an apparent control of the union congress through its 27 representatives, as against 23 elected by Britain and the various constituent members of her commonwealth of nations.

There is a good deal of fog in Mr. Streit's new plan regarding the exact status of the 380,000,000 British subjects who would not have the franchise, should the United States and Britain with her dependencies consummate a union. When this question was put to Mr. Streit in the course of a recent debate, he evaded a direct answer. It appears safe to say that these 380,000,000 out of 495,000,000 British subjects would be definitely subjects, rather than citizens of the new commonwealth. Of course, such an arrangement negatives the fundamental basis of Mr. Streit's proposed declaration of interdependence, which says: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal," etc. If that statement be true, these 380,000,000 people should be given a vote to elect representatives who would determine their destinies.

In his book, Mr. Streit frankly says: "Whatever we may wish, we must recognize that India's politically inexperienced millions cannot at first be included in this union on the same population basis as the western democracies. * * * It would seem now practically necessary to distinguish in the union territory between the parts that are already fully self-governing and those that are not, and restrict the right to vote in the union elections and to hold elective union office to those born or naturalized citizens of the former" (p. 140).

If that is not a confession that the British Empire, as it is now constituted, is not a democracy and the plan of the proposed union undemocratic, it is impossible to find words to properly characterize it. In other words, the paraphrase of our immortal Declaration of Independence is mere eyewash. But one thing is certain: If the present subject races of the British Empire are given the right to vote, complete control of the union would pass to the black, brown, and yellow people held by Mr. Streit to be so politically undeveloped as not entitled to any determination of their own fate in his proposed union.

If the people of British India and other British colonial possessions were granted equality with representatives of other parts of the British Empire, the 495,000,000 people of that Empire would have 99 votes as against 27 votes of the United States. Let me put this matter in another way: Assume that the people of the white races of the British Empire and the United States stood together; they would, roughly speaking, possess 50 votes as against 76 votes. It hardly seems within the realm of possibility that the English-speaking races, for the sake of union now, would contemplate such an eventuality with complacency; but, unless they do, union now is not a democratic plan. It is a plan to perpetuate British imperialism—nothing more and nothing less.

Looking at this plan from a purely American standpoint, it hardly seems conceivable that, if the American people once understood the real significance of Union Now, they would give it any consideration whatsoever, because, aside from the objections which have been set forth above, Union Now contemplates a union citizenship—a single citizenship which would give perfect freedom of migration to the people of the union to wander whithersoever they willed within the borders of the union. What such a plan would mean to America needs no comment.

It is, perhaps, not a matter of common knowledge in this country, but it should be, that certain constituent states of the British commonwealth of nations have taken effective and vigorous steps to prevent the submergence of their territories by the Oriental races of the empire. It is, therefore, obvious that Union Now—if its consummation can even be seriously contemplated—would hold within itself the seed of civil dissension, such as that which divided our own nation in a bloody and disastrous Civil War.

In conclusion, it must be said that however fantastic Union Now may seem, there is another feature in it which cannot be disregarded. If Union Now is accomplished, it will involve the United States immediately and directly in the war. It would result in a call for American troops to defend British possessions in Asia and Africa; a demand for our fleet to police the seven seas; and, a draft upon our economic resources to pay all the bills, past, present, and future, contracted by the British Empire in the prosecution of her wars.

That is Union Now.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, some people may be surprised, but I am not surprised, to get the news as shown in the headlines "C. I. O. lumber union defiance of Mediation Board forces emergency power show-down." This is the most logical result that could obtain from the way the whole situation has been handled from the beginning with these outlaws. Many governmental officials before have learned, and learned early, that you could not deal with an outlaw, but it appears that our Labor Department, headed by such left-wingers as Madam Perkins, Hillman, and others, either never learn or they intentionally do not want to learn and are playing right in with these outlaws to destroy not only the national defense of this country, but the country itself. That is a very terrible statement to have to make, but as against that we are faced by a very terrible factual situation which makes such a statement necessary by those who are willing to look the situation squarely in the face and strip it of all propaganda and mealy-mouthed excuses of justification.

This is no surprise to many of us because we have consistently pointed out what would happen if this country continued in its weak-kneed, mealymouth, childish handling of serious situations with socialistic, communistic, racketeering, outlaw labor misleaders. We have pointed that out time and again. If ever a group has set the stage for this very thing, the Perkins element and the Hillman element have furnished this perfect setting. They have consistently knocked down, throttled and destroyed the constructive labor element, and have just as consistently placed in power the destructive outlaw element of the C. I. O. on the National Labor Relations Board itself, on other boards, and all down the line. I say, definitely and positively, that this Perkins-Hillman left wing element is entirely responsible for this situation, and as they belong to the administration itself, the administration has its explanations to make for keeping in powerful position such people as these. Many Congressmen and many Senators have consistently pointed out to this administration the subversive, communistic, racketeering, outlaw element that is in the administration, and we have just as consistently told them that their chickens would come home to roost. It appears that these chickens are now here and it is up to this administration to handle this situation with a strong American hand, in a strong American way, and these outlaws should be dealt with in the only manner that any outlaw was ever dealt with.

I hope the stage has not further been set for socialism, communism, and fascism, and if it has been set, I call on the administration to see that their plans do not go through, namely, to take over business. I have repeatedly said that this was the program that these Communists would strike and put business in a position where deliveries were not made, and then have this administration take over business and thereby socialize this business. The answer to this question is not for the Government to take over the plants, particularly where industry and business have cooperated to the fullest extent with Government, and where it is found in these same plants, that these racketeering outlaw leaders have done everything possible to destroy the program, to deny defense to this country, and to take any step of any kind that they could to turn it into a socialistic, communistic republic.

This country has gone a long way to the left, much against the protest and the vote of many of us. Many things have been covered up under the name of social gains, while these same things would have been more truly named had they been called socialistic advancements. This thing has come to such a pass now that these socialistic, communistic, racketeering outlaws feel that they are bigger than the United States. Can it be possible that they feel they are so entrenched in this administration that they can defy those of us who are not socialists? Can it be possible that they are getting ready to dig in and take over the Government? There are many signs indicating this to be the case. I have never yet heard anyone in this administration caution or tell the C. I. O. what to do. Have we come to a point where this Government is afraid of these communistic outlaw leaders? If we have not, I say it is high time to show them definitely and positively where to get off.

Here we are asking our people to unify themselves, to present a solid front, to make sacrifices financially, to make sacrifices with reference to their personal liberty, of the things they want to do. I think our people would be perfectly willing to make the patriotic sacrifices that should properly be made, but I don't believe they are going to do it if they are taxed extra billions only to have these billions turned over to these socialistic, communistic outlaw leaders and their gangs. I believe the young manhood, who are working for $21 per month, are going to be dissatisfied to have their personal liberty taken away from them and to see these socialistic, communistic outlaws enriching themselves, and empowering themselves in government, at their expense. Do they think for a minute that these young men, who have patriotically given up their lives to go into the Army and the Navy and the armed forces of this country, are going to look upon these socialistic, communistic outlaws taking over our Government with any complacency? These young men have proved themselves to be Americans and they are not going to stand idly by and see these Socialists, Fascists, Nazis, and Communists take their Government away from them while they are in the Army.

Our people are willing to get together to follow a leadership that they think is solid and proper, but they are not going to be sold down the river by any administration, be it Republican or Democratic. Therefore, I again say to the administration that if they want our people to follow them and to entrench themselves behind the administration, they had better place their house in order so that our people can do it with confidence. Many of our people are now looking questionably upon many of the things that are being done leaning toward socialism, and particularly, toward the favoritism shown these socialistic, communistic outlaw labor leaders.

LETTER FROM DAVID LASSER

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is so effective an answer to charges made against him and because I think it reveals an earnest and forthright attitude toward the work he is doing and has tried to do, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD with my remarks the following letter from David Lasser:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 2, 1941.

The Honorable JERRY VOORHIS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN VOORHIS: I want at this time to express my appreciation for your defense of my record when it was attacked in some quarters on the floor of the House. I think you are entitled to a full statement for the record on those questions which have been raised against my background and activities. You have my permission to use this letter in any way that you see fit. I am answering point by point those questions which have been raised.

1. I am not and never have been a Communist, nor have I had any connection with the Communist Party. I was the head of an organization, the Workers Alliance, which came under the control of the Communist Party. When I became personally convinced that such was the case I tried within the organization to rid it of the Communist control. When it became clear that that was impossible I followed the dictates of my conscience and resigned from the Workers Alliance in June 1940, making public the reasons for my resignation.

The American Security Union, which I helped form after my resignation from the Alliance, forbade membership from Communists, Nazis, Fascists, or others who believe in dictatorship, domestic or foreign.

2. My visit to Russia in 1937, in connection with a trip to England, France, and Spain, had no sinister or communistic purpose. I went there as people in all walks of life, including famous aviators, preachers, businessmen, official missions, and even Congressmen, have gone, to see for myself what was the actual situation. I took part in no official gatherings; my activities were chiefly looking at the various projects and developments, which one usually does as a sightseer.

I returned to this country glad that I was an American. I do not regret the education I received. I wish that all those who have any illusions regarding that dictatorship could have the same education.

3. In connection with a mass delegation of unemployed at Harrisburg, Pa., 5 years ago, the statement is made that under my personal direction violence resulted.

Let me say that I have never approved of, encouraged, nor condoned violence in any phase of my activities.

Secondly, this action was called by the Pennsylvania unemployed to meet the threat of starvation. I went there to represent the national organization. There was not violence, but bitterness, high feeling, tension, and acrimony even within the legislature itself, for the legislature was paralyzed with inaction, and 600,000 men, women, and children in Pennsylvania were slowly starving.

There were no clashes with the police, no arrests. It is true that many days after a relief appropriation was finally passed and the delegates had returned to their homes, charges were made in some sections of the press and in the 1936 political campaign that some damage had been caused in some gallery seats. Those making the charge never made a request for an investigation to determine who caused the alleged damage.

4. I do not claim that during the years of intense unemployment all was sweetness and light. Our Nation was passing through a period so stormy and dangerous that other nations with similar situations lost their democracy and freedom. In those nations the unemployed were won over to the camps of fascism or communism.

As leader of an unemployed organization, during the period when unemployment was the crucial problem before the people, I had the task of representing the interests of the unemployed and helping maintain their faith in our democratic way of life. I tried to do something positive and constructive and with a spirit of complete loyalty to our great country and its institutions.

5. With regard to my present position: I accepted this post to make my contribution to the speeding up of the return of W. P. A. workers to private industry and to make them available for our defense-labor supply. I believe completely in this task. I am conscientiously doing my best to make it successful. Certainly, every American should be permitted to make his contribution to our national defense according to his abilities.

In my field trips and work on this job I have had full cooperation from business, labor, employment services, school officials, and national-defense officials. A harmonious working relationship has been established with all of them.

I am ready to continue that service to the best of my ability as long as I am needed. Those who oppose the continuation of an adequate W. P. A. program should be deeply concerned that this task shall be successful; for only by the return of W. P. A. workers to private industry can the W. P. A. program be justifiably reduced.

What I ask is an honest chance to do my part in this great task—of returning the W. P. A. workers to private industry so that they may play their part in our great defense effort.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID LASSER.

Less Than 1,700 Union Veterans Living on Decoration Day, 1941

HON. WILLIAM R. THOM

DECORATION DAY ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM R. THOM, OF OHIO, DELIVERED AT ALLIANCE, OHIO

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am reprinting herewith the text of an address I delivered on the occasion of the annual observance of Decoration Day, May 30, last, by the patriotic organizations of Alliance, Ohio:

Through the years from early manhood that I have been a spectator of Memorial Day exercises, I have always speculated, as probably you have, about the day when the last of our Civil War veterans of the North would vanish from the human stage. While thought of death has never troubled us, I confess to having wondered also whether I should be present when this occurred. The answer to both of these questions has been a long time coming, but it is near. More than 2,000,000 of these Union soldiers have marched out of our world, and the little remnant left, averaging in age over 96 years, cannot much longer stand the assaults of time. Because the Union soldier caught the imagination of my boyhood, the world will never be the same, at least to me, when the last one in his blue coat, decorated with his Grand Army button, bids us goodbye.

Because I thought this audience might be interested, I asked the Veterans' Administration at Washington to furnish me with the current number of Civil War pensioners. On April 30th last, exactly 1,673 survivors were on the pension rolls, as against 2,381 on June 30th of last year. A year ago there were living 198 Civil War soldiers in the State of Ohio. What a pitiful handful to join with us in this Memorial Day. And because many younger folks here perhaps did not know the Union veteran intimately, I am, without seeming to depreciate the services and bravery of the soldiers of the Spanish-American and World Wars, going to speak of this vanishing breed of men.

The Union veteran usually was an outstanding and forthright individual in his home community. Who of us, as boys, did not hang on every word of his war tales, told over and over again? Many of them, not content to rest on the laurels of their Civil War battles, fought on in civil life to great fame. Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Harrison, McKinley were Northern Civil War soldiers who reached the Presidency amidst the acclaims of their comrades. Many of them sat in the Cabinets of Presidents. Scores of them were sent to the House of Representatives and the United States Senate. Today, the voice of the Union soldier, as well as of the Confederate soldier, is missing in the Congress. The last Northern soldier of the House of Representatives was Gen. Isaac R. Sherwood, a former Canton, Ohio, editor, and the last Confederate soldier in that body was Maj. Charles M. Stedman, of North Carolina. Singularly enough, as if to symbolize the reunion of the North and South, Sherwood and Stedman, in the House of Representatives at the same time, were bosom friends and highly revered by all other colleagues from whatever section of the Nation.

The average Union soldier was a man of rugged nature. He must have been to survive the disease and the hard campaigning of the Civil War. Perhaps merely because he was an ex-soldier, I always thought he stood out among his fellows as made of tougher fiber. He had strong, powerful hands. If he was tough in body, he was often tough in mind. He was a bulldog when it came to clinging to his convictions. Reared in an atmosphere where passions ran high over disunion and slavery, the soldiers I knew continued to be combative whether in the field of politics or religion. As we look back and remember the hates the Civil War left in men's souls, both North and South, we realize that civil strife is the most deadly malady that can affect society.

It is the miracle of our history that while the people of the North and of the South were alike swept by gusts of hate, the Government in Washington was guided by the kindly Lincoln, so untouched by all the rancor that swirled around him. Forbearing, patient, forgiving, Lincoln topped all these qualities with a sense of humor that blossomed even when trial and tribulation were all around him. The other night I was reading how a native German who bore the title of count visited Lincoln during the war days to offer his services as a soldier. He related rather proudly how his ancestors had been counts so many centuries. "Well," said Mr. Lincoln, interrupting him, "that need not trouble you. That will not be in your way, if you behave yourself as a soldier." The poor count was puzzled, and when the interview was over he asked his companion what the President could have meant by so strange a remark.

May I now indulge in a bit more of reminiscence. My mind goes back today to another Memorial Day, not in our United States, but in Germany of 1924. On a Sunday in August of that year I was in Berlin. As I stood with other Americans on that famous German thoroughfare, Unter den Linden, I saw young Germans in threes and fours walking through the streets, some of them wearing printed streamers fastened in their coat lapels, on which were written the words, "Nie mehr krieg." Interpreted, this meant "No more war." Inquiry revealed that they were proceeding toward the German Reichstag Building, where, on that day, kindly Fritz Ebert, President of the Republic, was speaking in honor of the Germans who had fallen in the World War.

To me this assertion of opposition to war so proudly displayed by these young Germans was an omen that militarism was waning. In those days most of us held high hopes that the world had tired forever of war. But alas at the same moment, there was languishing in prison in Bavaria, Adolph Hitler, an exsoldier and die-hard of the World War, who had just found defeat in a bold attempt to overthrow the German Republic. In that fortress prison he wrote "Mein Kampf" in which was set down all the devilish designs that today are afflicting the world you and I live in.

Thoughtful men of that day looked upon him as a harmless agitator, whose ambitions outran his capabilities.

Writing in 1927, a volume of history on "The Rise of the German Republic," Harold Griffith Daniels said:

"Hitler, a resident of Vienna, had been apprenticed to a house painter, and from being a Socialist he was driven by his own violent anti-Semitism into the ranks of the other extreme. He first came to Munich when the war broke out, and he served in the German army, subsequently acquiring German nationality. Modelling himself on Mussolini in all but political intelligence, he cast himself for the part of a German Gambetta, for which he was totally unequipped. Though combining sincerity with a gift for glib oratory and more than a touch of megalomania, he was a complete stranger to the realities of politics and seemed lost in a world of fantasy as he delivered his harangues, a mixture of anti-Semitic behavior, pose and vanity. In his ecstatic visions he saw a dictatorship with himself as President of the Reich, destined not only to restore order in Berlin, but to operate beyond the German frontiers and liberate Germany from the consequences of the last war."

Today millions of lives, including our own, are touched by the career of wild adventure of this house painter who so completely shattered the estimate of himself just quoted. Modern invention, intended to liberate man, has been used by him to bring danger over three continents and to threaten us as a Nation. While Hitler upbraided the world for the harshness of the Versailles Treaty, he found it possible to organize, through the sweat and labor of his people, the most powerful military machine the world has ever known. Other nations innocently busied themselves with political machinery to preserve peace. Hitler strove to build military planes, cannon, and whatnot to destroy peace wherever it might be found in the prospering independent nations, large and small, that were his neighbors.

I wish, as your Representative in Washington, I could tell you when and how his career will be cut short. I doubt if the world will ever rest in peace until he no longer directs the fortunes of Germany. For the moment he is land bound. Until he attains free entrance into the Atlantic Ocean, both north and south, we can feel measurably safe from attack. For a moment when the battleship Hood sank in the waters, it looked as if he were winning his way to the sea.

Those of us who are in Washington, where the international situation haunts us from morning until night, realize only too deeply how our constituents abhor war and pray that it may not come with its devastating destruction to our people. If you saw your President as he looks today, you would know that his nights as well as his days must be filled with pain and agony. He knows from the tearful appeals of mothers and fathers that pass through his office in letter and telegram what your deepest and most fervent hope is.

I believe most sincerely that his first aim is to preserve the security of the hemisphere in which you and I live. Perhaps he realizes a bit more than do we, the power and the range of the new military assaults of the air. I have been thinking much as you have about his message of a few nights ago. Definitely, in that speech he emphasized as never before, the primary purpose he has to protect the Americas—North and South. We, as a people, I believe, can be unified in the knowledge that whatever we do shall be done to keep inviolate the Monroe Doctrine, the cornerstone of our foreign policy since the early days of the Republic.

I feel that the President, despite his bold words that have been messaged across the waters, has not thrown all caution and deliberation to the winds. He still deems himself your servant, anxious to hear your attitudes. In the spoken word, he must not seem weak and indecisive, for the Hitler crowd must realize that so far, and no farther may they approach this hemisphere. His speech, I know, was a disappointment to many who have formed themselves into a war party that has been pressuring him for an immediate war declaration. He knows too much of our military strength to go that far. Perhaps he was disappointing to those who wish to be assured of no belligerency under any circumstances. If I understood his attitude, he seeks to keep his freedom of action unbound so far as possible with definite and constraining pledges, so that he may pause, shift, or take a new tack that tomorrow or the next day seems best for the liberty and well-being of our people. Perhaps when he charts this middle course, he satisfies most of us.

This day's observance, when we revive those choice memories dates back to May 30, 1868, when the first Decoration Day was held by order of Gen. John A. Logan, Commander in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. Year by year the Civil War soldiers themselves, with the aid of their daughters and grandchildren have strewn the flowers over the graves of their dead. They gave up this duty of love reluctantly when they began to totter to their patriotic successors, the Spanish War Veterans and the soldiers of the World War. Together these organizations with daughters and sons of Civil War veterans, have carried on the tradition, and soon they will be in complete command, without a Civil War veteran round whom they may rally.

Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday I wrote to President Roosevelt, calling his attention to a letter written by former President Woodrow Wilson. That letter solved the strike situation at a time when the administration of World War days was faced with the same strike problems which confront the present administration.

I think it is important for every Member to read that letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1941.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I think you will agree that one reads with profit the messages and papers of your old chief, former President Woodrow Wilson. So many present situations parallel those with which Mr. Wilson had to deal, both at home and abroad.

I believe that the great majority of labor in this country are embarrassed by the unforgivable conduct of some of the members of the machinist local in San Francisco, which broke its contract and put on an outlaw strike tying up the production of ships, an item we need most now.

May I call your attention to a letter written by President Wilson in dealing with a like problem in 1918? It was a letter that ended a machinists' strike. You, of course, recall and no doubt have considered the methods employed by the Chief Executive in those stirring days. Nevertheless, I am sure that you will understand that I refer the same to you, prompted only by a desire to be helpful.

The letter was addressed to a local lodge of the International Association of Machinists at Bridgeport, Conn. It reads as follows:

"WASHINGTON, September 13, 1918.

"GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your resolutions of September 6 announcing that you have begun a strike against your employers in Bridgeport, Conn. You are members of the Bridgeport branches of the International Union of Machinists. As such, and with the approval of the national officers of your union, you signed an agreement to submit the questions as to the terms of your employment to the National War Labor Board, and to abide the award, which in accordance with the rules of procedure approved by me might be made.

"The members of the Board were not able to reach a unanimous conclusion on all the issues presented, and as provided in its constitution the questions upon which they did not agree were carried before an arbitrator, the unanimous choice of the members of the Board.

"The arbitrator thus chosen has made an award which more than 90 percent of the workers affected accept. You who constitute less than 10 percent refuse to abide the award, although you are the best paid of the whole body of workers affected, and are, therefore, at least entitled to press a further increase of wages because of the high cost of living. But, whatever the merits of the issue, it is closed by the award. Your strike against it is a breach of faith calculated to reflect on the sincerity of national organized labor in proclaiming its acceptance of the principles and machinery of the National War Labor Board.

"If such disregard of the solemn adjudication of a tribunal to which both parties submitted their claims be temporized with, agreements become mere scraps of paper. If errors creep into awards, the proper remedy is submission to the award with an application for rehearing to the tribunal. But to strike against the award is disloyalty and dishonor.

"The Smith & Wesson Co., of Springfield, Mass., engaged in Government work, has refused to accept the mediation of the National War Labor Board and has flaunted its rules of decision approved by Presidential proclamation. With my consent the War Department has taken over the plant and business of the company to secure continuity in production and to prevent industrial disturbance.

"It is of the highest importance to secure compliance with reasonable rules and procedure for the settlement of industrial disputes. Having exercised a drastic remedy with recalcitrant employers, it is my duty to use means equally well adapted to the end with lawless and faithless employees.

"Therefore, I desire that you return to work and abide by the award. If you refuse, each of you will be barred from employment in any war industry in the community in which the strike occurs for a period of 1 year. During that time the United States Employment Service will decline to obtain employment for you in any war industry elsewhere in the United States, as well as under the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Board, the Railroad Administration, and all other Government agencies, and the draft boards will be instructed to reject any claim of exemption based on your alleged usefulness on war production.

"Sincerely yours,

"WOODROW WILSON."

Does not the reading of this letter suggest the thought that these men in San Francisco who recently have elected to go beyond the pale of unionism and record themselves as willing to jeopardize their country's welfare in an effort to serve their own selfish desires are deserving of the same treatment accorded like offenders by the just and wise Wilson?

I have the honor to be, dear Mr. President,
Your obedient servant,
DAVID E. SATTERFIELD, JR.

Since writing the above the defense program of this country has been confronted with a defiance on the part of some members of labor organizations who utterly disregard even the orders of Mr. Philip Murray, president of the very union to which they belong.

The following is an editorial of The Evening Star, published in its issue of June 5. It is a splendid summation of the present situation, and brings it succinctly up to date. The one bright spot in the whole picture is that the majority of the rank and file of labor in this country are not in favor of, nor do they condone the course of conduct of those who are engaging in these outlaw strikes. The sooner the Congress realizes this the better.

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 5, 1941]

CHALLENGE FROM LABOR

The President and the Members of Congress, endeavoring to carry out the national-defense program, today find themselves confronted with a defiant and truculent challenge from important sections of organized labor, and if this challenge is not dealt with promptly and in decisive fashion it is perfectly obvious that the security of the Nation will be put in gravest jeopardy.

During the past 24 hours those elements in the labor movement which obviously have no intention of cooperating in the defense effort have shed all pretenses.

In Washington, O. M. Orton, leader of striking C. I. O. West-coast lumbermen, has rejected recommendations for settlement of the dispute which were submitted by the National Defense Mediation Board. These recommendations were endorsed by two C. I. O. officials on the Board panel considering the case, and their acceptance was urged by Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O. In spurning the settlement plan despite these considerations, Mr. Orton in a manner reminiscent of the attitude of John L. Lewis at the outset of the coal strike, charges the Board with being an "all-out, labor-busting, and strike-breaking device" seeking to "bulldoze and mislead workers with false and hysterical propaganda."

At Ingleside, Calif., 9,000 C. I. O. workers at the North American Aviation plant, which has $196,000,000 in war-plane orders from this Government and Britain, have gone on strike in direct violation of an agreement, ratified only last Saturday by the union membership, not to strike while their controversy was pending before the Mediation Board. The walk-out was ordered before any action could be taken, and on the flimsy pretext that the board was "stalling the workers."

And from San Francisco, it is reported that striking A. F. of L. machinists, who have tied up work in 11 shipyards, including construction of vessels urgently needed by the Navy, have flatly rejected a request from the Senate committee investigating defense strikes that they return to work.

Viewed in the most favorable light, the attitude of those responsible for these strikes establishes beyond dispute that they are selfish, irresponsible, and wholly indifferent to the welfare of the Nation as a whole. They have taken a position which does not permit of further temporizing. Weakness on the part of the Government at this time could serve only to encourage other irresponsible labor groups to take advantage of the national emergency for selfish purposes, and it is plainly the duty of the President and his supporters in Congress, however great may be their chagrin at reaping such a bitter harvest from their efforts on behalf of labor, to take the lead in meeting this challenge squarely and without equivocation.

Now is the time for the President to act upon his recent declaration that "this Government is determined to use all of its power to prevent interference with the production of materials essential to our Nation's security."

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

ADDRESS OF MAYOR CHARLES C. LITTLEFIELD, OF HAWORTH, N. J.

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a speech by the Honorable Charles C. Littlefield, former commander of the American Legion Post of Haworth, N. J., and mayor of my home town of Haworth, given on Memorial Day.

Mr. Commander, honored guests, and friends of Haworth, I wish to thank Haworth Post, No. 13, American Legion, who sponsors this service, and all the participating organizations for giving to Haworth citizens this opportunity of again observing Memorial Day. I welcome again this year our citizens who, by attending, are also participating in remembrance of those we honor today.

As should be well known to all of us, this day originated as Decoration Day—a day on which graves of the Civil War dead, both Blue and Gray, were decorated in their memory. Since its origin, it has become known as Memorial Day—a day on which we pay tribute to them, in both simple and elaborate services, as well as by decorating graves of our soldier dead of all wars.

During these last few years, I have felt that more of us should take some time on this day to do more than speak words honoring our soldier dead of all wars. This year, in particular, those of us who can, might more specifically refresh our memories of the War of 1917 and 1918 and those men who were sacrificed in that war. We should remember those youths of 23 years ago who gave their lives for a very great cause. We might also remember the events leading up to their sacrifice in that cause.

We shall be specific and review the fact that the bronze honor roll on the large rock memorial at the Station Park lists the names of 53 men who went from Haworth in 1917. Fifty-three men, from a community, the population of which was about 600 at that time, gave up their peaceful pursuits and were willing to give their lives for a cause—a cause in which they believed. Two of those men never returned. The only outward evidence in Haworth of their existence at any time is given us by these 2 living trees which have been dedicated to their memory by veterans of that war who now live in Haworth. One of the two young men who never returned was Harold A. Rowley, who died in camp on October 18, 1918, less than a month before the war ended. The other was Sheldon C. Houston, son of Mrs. Imogene Houston Bryant, our only Gold Star Mother in Haworth. Sheldon died in battle on November 4, 1918, only 7 days before the armistice.

Each year our American Legion post, by a simple act of placing an American flag in each of the markers under these memorial trees, has called your attention to the sacrifice made by these two men. Each year Haworth citizens have thus honored these two Haworth citizens who sacrificed their lives for a cause. We are meeting here again to so honor our soldier dead.

It would be well this year not only to honor them by this simple ceremony but to ask ourselves for what cause they died and whether they died in vain. There was a cause for which they died; was there not?

As one of those who participated in that war and who saw other men die for that cause, let me recall to you one phrase defining that war, which is very vivid to me. It was "the war to end all wars." Other spellbinding phrases were used, such as "make the world safe for democracy," and "we have no fight with the German people." Similar phrases are being used today with variations, but "the war to end all wars" is not yet being repeated by those who are talking war but who will not have to do the fighting.

"A war to end all wars." A phrase that we who fought believed in so much that we said, "It shall not happen again." Do you remember all that? I do.

I also remember those who were alongside of me at the front in 1918 and who did not return. I find it difficult to picture them to you and make such a picture alive and real. So I recall to you these two Haworth young men who did not return, and I ask you: Have we kept faith with them to whom we do honor today? Are we keeping faith when we are permitting a repetition of what happened 25 years ago? History will show, if you lay that period and its results alongside of the present, that we are traveling the same paths as then. We are listening to the same false reasons as then, and you can be sure the end will be the same as then. Only, this time, there will be more than 2 out of 53 from Haworth who fail to return.

As an example of the similarity, let me quote from the headlines of this morning's newspaper:

"Eden Defines Britain's War Aims."

"Foreign Secretary Calls for a World Based on Roosevelt's Four Freedoms."

"Says German Wars Must Stop Forever."

"Bid Empire, Allies, United States Plan to Help Europe Rebuild Free Economy."

Does that sound similar to President Wilson's 14 points? Does that look like the "war to end all wars." Does that correspond with a "United States of Europe."

Are we going to repeat this every 25 years? Is the youth of our Nation to be wasted periodically on European soil as that continent's youth has been? Are we, this Memorial Day, giving only lip service in honoring those two soldiers who died only a few years ago?

If so, why cannot we make an about face? Why cannot we face cold, hard facts? We cannot undo the mistakes of that war and the kind of peace we permitted, but we can profit by those mistakes. We can begin now to keep faith with our honored dead.

Let us put forth every effort to awaken ourselves and develop our strength by showing the entire world that this true freedom our youth fought for in 1918 is safe here in the Republic of the United States of America and that it will be maintained here. Let us not confuse our truly representative form of government with so-called democracies in Europe and let us keep it from being submerged in a world of serfdom, whether that serfdom is ruled by empires or dictatorships.

We do not wish to force our form of government on other peoples—we tried it 25 years ago, and they were not successful in its use. But let us by example, show that our form of government works for us at all times and under all conditions. We have maintained our Republic in peace and war against all outside pressure, whether political or economic. We can continue to be so strong that there will be no successful attack on us, either by military force, economic pressure, or diplomatic propaganda, that can dislodge our position in the world.

We can do this if you and I believe in our God, our country, and ourselves. If we so believe, and act accordingly, we shall remember the sacrifices made by our youth in 1918, take heed, and "never let it happen again." If we do that, these two young men from Haworth will not have died in vain and we shall keep faith with those whose sleep should be "sweet and deep in Flanders fields."

Townsend Movement Gains Support

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

RESOLUTION OF CITY COUNCIL OF DU BOIS, PA.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, interest in the Townsend plan in my congressional district is growing by leaps and bounds. Former critics are now found ready to admit that the need of an adequate old-age pension was never more apparent, and they are eager that the problem be given detailed study and favorable action at an early date.

As an indication of the widespread support for the Townsend bill, I submit herewith a copy of the resolution adopted by the City Council of Du Bois, Pa., urging passage of H. R. 1036. The resolution is as follows:

We, the undersigned members of the Du-Bois City Council, County of Clearfield, State of Pennsylvania, believe something must be done to provide adequate pensions for our deserving senior citizens, and at our regular meeting have adopted this resolution:

"Whereas the members here assembled believe that a national uniform system of old-age pensions should be adopted throughout the United States of America; and

"Whereas the proposals embraced in the Townsend bill (H. R. 1036) will greatly relieve, if not entirely abolish, unemployment, and will provide to the people the American standard of living; and

"Whereas the various States of the Union are finding it difficult to raise a sufficient revenue to finance the payment of adequate pensions to the aged; and

"Whereas that a universal tax be levied and moneys so raised shall be divided pro-rata and paid to all citizens of the United States who have attained the age of 60 years and over: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America to consider the basic principles of the Townsend bill (H. R. 1036) now in committee; and be it further

"Resolved, That one copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the following: the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee; the Honorable JAMES J. DAVIS, Senator; the Honorable JOSEPH P. GUFFEY, Senator; the Honorable JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Congressman."

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

ARTICLE BY CHESTER ROWELL

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial on inflation, by Chester Rowell, appearing in the San Francisco Chronicle on May 31, 1941:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle of May 31, 1941]

SUM OF GROUP DEMANDS ADDS UP TO INFLATION

(By Chester Rowell)

Unless it is faced boldly, and soon enough, the automatic spiral of inflation may get beyond control before many of us, and especially our Representatives in Congress, even realize that it is started. For, considering only the immediate situation, each step of it—a rise in wages to meet the increased cost of living, and an increase in prices to get the money to pay those wages—seems the natural and obvious thing to do. If each of them could be done only once and then stopped it would be the right thing. But if it is done the next time, and the next, and the time after that, the result is soon explosion destroying the structure it was intended to maintain.

We see it beginning already, on both the price and the wage side. Labor demands the maintenance or improvement of the "standard of living," and imagines it can be done by raising wage scales. It can—once. One of the moving causes of the wave of strikes and threatened strikes is just this. In some cases, like the proposed 30-percent increase in railway train operating scales, it goes far beyond any increase in living costs that has yet occurred or is presently in sight. Fortunately, the Railway Labor Act provides a means by which whatever is proper will be done, with no likelihood of a strike that would paralyze the transportation system of the country just when it is most needed. In some other less mature industries fighting seems to be the only way either side knows to settle disputes.

On prices the same thing is happening, especially in industries with many votes. President Roosevelt had to make a bargain with Congress to keep it from piling up both loans and direct payments to farmers until the sum of the two would have gone away beyond the parity mark which has been the professed goal of the whole farm-subsidy movement. He finally signed the 85-percent loan bill, in consideration of an agreement to amend the direct-payment law down to the sum called for in his original Budget. Whether the leaders who made this deal can deliver the necessary votes in Congress remains to be seen. If they cannot, food prices at the farm (which ought to go up reasonably) will start skyrocketing instead. Then retail prices will soar still higher. Then wages still higher, to meet them. And then the prices of the goods which the farmer must buy from the city will follow. And parity will become a will-o'-the-wisp, always just beyond where it can be reached.

The direct regulation of prices fares no better. Steel costs more to make and there is a competitive demand for more of it than can be made. In a free market that would put the price up much too high. Politics, on the other hand, may force it too low, until private capital for the necessary increase in plants cannot be obtained, since it could earn no return, and the Government will have to go into the business and charge the losses to the rest of us. Politics, however, works the other way in the attempt to hold down the price of spun cotton. The city worker, to be sure, wants his shirts and underwear cheap, but if they are dearer he thinks he can meet that by striking for higher wages. But the cotton farmer is afraid that if the price of finished cotton is held down, his raw cotton will be cheapened, too. And his Representatives are putting up a roar in Congress.

Taken just one at a time, in a free market, not only is each of these steps separately right, but the piling up of them all into a ruinous inflation is automatic. Since each of the items is right, but the sum is wrong, something beside summation must be done about them.

And neither of the easy answers would answer anything. It is quite true, for instance, that if the profits of industry increase, labor should get its share of them. But if labor got them all it would not meet the automatic increase in the cost of living. And, besides, there would soon be no industry to pay the wages.

Also, competition is not the answer. For competition works both ways. If industry pours out money in wages for making things, half of which are to be destroyed in war, there will be free money available to buy much more than the other half. Naturally, the scarce consumable goods will go to the highest bidders, and the standard of living for those who most need it raised, will go down still further.

Since this is the automatic result of the free operation of free economic forces in a free market, applied to the present abnormal and unfree unbalance of production and consumption, it follows that we must open our minds to the idea of doing something artificial about it, in this artificial emergency.

Everybody, in fact, wants just that done—to the other fellow. Whether it is food, manufactured goods, or labor, whoever has it for sale wants the price to go up, either naturally or artificially. But whoever has to buy it wants the price held down, even if it has to be done by arbitrary action of the Government.

Since none of us want the half of it done which applies to us, perhaps the result of our all getting what we want will be that none of it is done—and none of us, therefore, will have what we want.

Ponder, in time, over this paradox. For, unless you think it through by logic, now, you may find yourself paying for it later in hardship. You will know all about it, then, by experience. Learning it beforehand, by thinking, is cheaper.

W. P. A. Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY L. HAINES

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, in a few days the relief bill for the next fiscal year will come before the House for action. In connection with W. P. A. there is one matter that I desire to call to the attention of the House, and that is the necessity for persons to be certified by the bureaus of public assistance in each State before they can be given employment on W. P. A. It seems to me that insofar as World War veterans or Spanish-American War veterans are concerned an exception should be made, particularly to that group which is now granted a disability award by the Veterans' Administration.

Many of these men receive but twelve to thirty and forty dollars a month and have families to support. Because of their disability they are unable to obtain work in private industry, and because of their ages they are discriminated against. In my own State, Mr. Speaker, W. P. A. permits men to earn from twelve to fourteen dollars a week. It must be perfectly obvious to any right-thinking individual that men cannot rear their families or even give them the bare necessities of life on such a small income. The Veterans of Foreign Wars are vitally interested in their buddies and feel that an exception should be made in respect to men having honorable discharges from the Army and drawing a small disability payment. I have advocated this for a long time, feeling that we can never repay the debt we owe these men, and so I want to suggest to the House that provision be inserted in the new bill making this group eligible for certification on W. P. A. without being required to have a relief status.

In connection with this matter I received a letter several days ago from the State Director of W. P. A. for Pennsylvania in which he suggests such a provision. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I want to insert as a part of these remarks the letter in question, and I sincerely hope that the Members of this body will give this matter their very careful and sympathetic consideration and support.

The letter follows:

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION
FOR PENNSYLVANIA,
HARRISBURG, PA., June 2, 1941.

Hon. HARRY L. HAINES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAINES: May I suggest that in the new W. P. A. Act provision be made that veterans who are unemployed be entitled to assignment on W. P. A. work without having first been relief cases.

At the present time, one man out of every seven working on the W. P. A. in Pennsylvania is a veteran, and it seems to me that these men who have fought for their country should be entitled to a job on W. P. A. without first having to beg for relief. In addition, let me point out that disabled veterans, men who have lost an arm or a leg, or have been so maimed as to be granted a disability award, in a very large number of cases because of the disability award granted by the Federal Government are rejected for relief by the Department of Public Assistance, and that, of course, bars them from employment by the W. P. A.

The disability award granted these men is small, amounting to just about the same grant that the Department of Public Assistance would give them for relief, and yet, because it comes from the Federal Government and not from the Department of Public Assistance, these men are denied the opportunity of a Federal job.

I believe that if proper provision is made to care for our unemployed veterans, it will have a very decided effect in raising the morale of the young men who are now being inducted into the Army and Navy. If the veterans of the last war are not taken care of, the possible veterans of the next war may think our country an ungrateful master.

Sincerely and cordially yours,
PHILIP MATHEWS,
State Administrator.

Let There Be No Strikes on Defense Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

LETTER FROM WILLIAM J. BOWEN, PRESIDENT EMERITUS, BRICKLAYERS, MASONS, AND PLASTERERS INTERNATIONAL UNION OF AMERICA

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein a letter sent by William Bowen, president emeritus of the Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers International Union of America, to all subordinate unions, and also a report of a meeting of delegates of the building and construction trades of America on strikes and national defense.

President Bowen, one of the outstanding labor leaders of all time, in this letter has conveyed the expressions and the policy of all true labor leaders in this country during this emergency. Those who know him and the officers of this great international union, know by past experience that they will see that this request will be carried out.

The letter follows:

BRICKLAYERS, MASONS AND PLASTERERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1941.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: We draw your attention to the May issue of the Bricklayer, Mason and Plasterer which conveys our first attitude in respect to the incidents leading up to what has now become a conflagration of the entire world. May I here say, that in the outset my views were of a character that indicated that the war on the other side of the ocean was no concern of ours unless the American continent and particularly Canada was invaded. The situation has changed insofar as our idea of what is involved is concerned and with the events that have occurred and are recurring it is necessary for a change of views.

With what I have seen in the last two wars, in which the United States of America was involved, I am constrained to say that it would be abominable upon our part if we did not make our boys ready to do what now seems the inevitable. So let us lend to our boys' efforts every effort at our command to see to it that the sons of America shall not go into the conflict without every advantage that is possible for them to have. Let us get them ready. Let us pray to God that that readiness shall be of a character that will convince the entire world that our boys shall be so equipped as to meet attack from whatever source.

I request you as one of my associates in the movement to which we subscribed our young lives and in our mature years to carry out the traditions and policies of our International Union to bend every effort along the lines which the foregoing indicates.

Let there be no strikes on defense contracts.

With kindest personal wishes and as ever,
Sincerely and fraternally yours,
WM. J. BOWEN,
President Emeritus.

CONFERENCE HELD IN BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT OFFICES, MAY 26, 1941

The following building and construction trades organizations were represented:

Asbestos workers, C. A. Sickles; bricklayers, H. C. Bates, R. J. Gray; electrical workers, A. Wagoner; engineers, Wm. L. Maloney, F. A. Fitzgerald; iron workers, Leslie Myers; laborers, Joseph V. Moreschi, John Garvey; marble polishers, William McCarthy; painters, William Gallagher; plasterers, James M. Myles; plumbers, George Masterton; sheet-metal workers, Robert Byron; teamsters, Fred Tobin; also present, Mr. Joseph Keenan, Labor Relations Division of the Defense Commission.

Mr. Keenan advised those present that considerable difficulty was being encountered whereby some building and construction trades organizations were demanding increased wages rates on defense projects after contracts had been awarded and work actually started and advised that some action be taken that would adjust this situation as it was bringing about adverse criticism by administrative officials and the general public and that this criticism was being directed at the building and construction trades organizations.

Mr. Sidney Hillman, of the United States Defense Commission and Office of Production Management, also addressed those present on the same subject.

All organizations represented were polled on the following question:

"Shall the organizations represented at this meeting go on record to complete all defense jobs on which contracts had been awarded prior to an increase in wages becoming effective at the old rate of wages? Further, we will use every effort to adjust any disputes that may arise on any building and construction defense project without any stoppage of work."

The motion was unanimously carried after an individual vote of each representative was taken:

Asbestos workers, yes; bricklayers, yes; electrical workers, yes; engineers, yes; iron workers, yes; laborers, yes; marble polishers, yes; painters, yes; plasterers, yes; plumbers, yes; sheet-metal workers, yes; teamsters, yes.

Should the United States Have a Department of National Defense?—Should It Have a Separate Department of Air Defense?—What Is the Best Preparedness Pattern for Us To Follow?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, every day brings this country new lessons in national defense as developments are studied in the rapidly shifting scenes of the wars raging in Europe, Africa, and Asia. Most striking of these lessons thus far is the emphatic demonstration of the steadily increasing importance of air power in modern war, especially from the standpoint of increasing the defensive strength of a country against attacks from either sea or land.

It is also becoming increasingly obvious that the air arm of national defense in modern warfare is fully as important, if not in fact more important, than either the Army or Navy, and that a smoothly working coordination among all three defense establishments and a unity of action is imperative to secure the best results in either offensive or defensive military tactics. Many Americans are therefore asking themselves and their Congressmen whether this country has fully developed the coordination of command and action which is essential if the great air strength which the United States is fast developing is to render the greatest protective service. To date, no thoroughgoing and complete study has been made by unbiased, authoritative officials into this all-important matter.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 228

I have therefore, today, introduced in the House, House Resolution No. 228 providing that the Speaker should appoint a select committee of nine Members to make a careful and complete inquiry into the optimum method of utilizing the air power of this country. This committee would give full consideration to the advisability of creating a separate air force under a Secretary of Air Defense, to the possibility of consolidating all of our defense establishments under one head in a Department of National Defense with heads of the Divisions of War, Navy, and Air, having positions of coordinate rank in order to unify and strengthen our national defense, and to the wisdom of retaining our present set-up with air power serving as separate adjuncts to the protective power of both the Army and the Navy.

House Resolution No. 228 would answer the questions being raised all over America as to the best method of utilizing our airplane resources in national defense. The matter of protecting the Western Hemisphere is too important a matter to be entrusted simply to traditional procedure, to the judgment of civilian heads of our Army and Navy Departments who show a natural reluctance to suggest substantial changes in our existing establishments, or to the amateur conclusions of editorial writers and newspaper commentators. It is a matter of vital concern to our Nation and to this hemisphere and, in my opinion, merits the careful consideration which can come only from a congressional inquiry into the relative merits of all proposals for reaping the full benefits from the vast capacity of this country to produce military aircraft.

Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I herewith attach the complete language of my resolution asking for an investigation of the best methods for unifying and modernizing the defense establishments of the United States, in view of the growing importance of air power in all types of modern warfare:

[H. Res. 228. Mr. MUNDT submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules]

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee to be comprised of nine Members of the House of Representatives, who shall be appointed by the Speaker, eight of whom shall be chosen from among the Members of the House Military and Naval Affairs Committees, and the chairman of which shall also be appointed by the Speaker but who shall not be a member of either the House Military or Naval Affairs Committee. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment was made.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the select committee to hold hearings and conduct an investigation to determine the advisability, if any, of giving the air forces of this country a coordinate standing with the Military and Naval Establishments either by the creation of a Secretary of Air Defense having equal rank with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Navy or by the consolidation of all defense establishments of the Government under a Department of National Defense with heads of the Divisions of War, Navy, and Air having positions of coordinate rank in order to unify and strengthen the defense establishments of the United States.

SEC. 3. The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member thereof designated by him, and shall be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

SEC. 4. The committee shall make a report of its findings to Congress at as early a date as is commensurate with a careful and complete study of the problems involved.

AMERICA CAN MAKE ITSELF IMPREGNABLE

Mr. Speaker, it is not my contention that the war plane of today has antiquated the battleship nor replaced artillery. However, it is apparent to all who study the developments in today's wars that the war plane has added a great new defensive weapon just as it has provided a new method of spreading horror and destruction by the bombing of cities and harbors. No longer does a nation need to meet battleship with battleship to protect its interests on the seven seas. The disabling of the battleship Bismarck demonstrated that aerial torpedoes launched from war planes can cripple and sink the mightiest ships that float and that a country like the United States can protect itself from hostile ships by developing and maintaining a great fleet of seagoing planes, equipped and prepared to carry aerial torpedoes, and ship-shattering bombs far out to sea to harass and destroy would-be invaders of our hemisphere. This should give new courage to those who fear an invasion of America. This country can turn out airplanes and train pilots almost without limit; it can darken the skies with defending planes which can destroy and turn back invading sea forces long before they can get close enough to our shores to land their troops and equipment or to pour out destruction from their giant guns. And because of the mobility of air power, we can project this protective air armada out to sea to protect both South and North America with equal certainty.

We need only the bases in South America, an abundance of the proper type planes, and pilots trained in the use of aerial torpedoes and giant bombs. All of this need not replace our battleships or be developed in lieu of a two-ocean navy, but when used as a supplement to such a defense establishment it can make America invincible against attack from any combination of powers in all the world. All we need do is to use our native intelligence, our vast resources, our American ingenuity, and the industrial units of this country to build and equip an air fleet and train its operators in order to utilize the lessons of this war in making America a citadel of strength and a fortress of freedom which can forever protect itself against the avarice or malice of any combination of enemies which dares to leave its homeland to try an attack across the watery wastes of sea and into the death-dealing air armada which we can send out hundreds of miles from home to meet them if and when they come.

NEEDED: MORE BASES AND MORE PLANES

Mr. Speaker, I have long been among those advocating that a greater use be made of the potential air power of the United States in building an impregnable defense establishment for the Western Hemisphere. Nearly a year ago I proposed that we arrange with South America to give us the right to construct air and sea bases on that continent. I favor building all the island air bases we can get to protect the approaches to the Western Hemisphere from both the east and the west. A fully equipped air armada on an air base which we control in Brazil will better protect the interests of the United States than an army of soldiers in Dakar. Fully equipped sea and air bases in this hemisphere will do much more to safeguard the destiny of America and to promote the development of freedom everywhere than will the landing of a partially equipped army of soldiers on any battlefield in all the world outside of the Western Hemisphere.

In line with my resolution to discover the best method of utilizing and unifying the air forces of America, I am including with these remarks some typical excerpts from newspaper articles and editorials of the past few days indicating what a widespread interest is being manifest in developing the optimum method of using our air power while we are at peace and have time to make any changes which might be necessary. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the findings of such a committee of inquiry as my resolution proposes would do much to develop national unity and to stimulate confidence in the defense program to which all America is now so wisely and unselfishly devoting its attention.

TYPICAL NEWSPAPER COMMENT

[From the Washington Daily News]

A WARNING UNHEEDED

In this day and age when air power is kicking navies out of seas and armies out of islands, it is a little painful to recall that when Maj. Gen. Henry H. Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps, was promoted some months ago to be Acting Additional Deputy Chief of Staff of the Army, this unprecedented recognition of the air arm was hailed as a great forward step in air-mindedness.

It doesn't take a military expert to figure out from the headlines that aviation has outgrown the status of second fiddle—everywhere else, that is, except in the United States. Here the Army and the Navy continue to insist that aviation's proper place is in the back seat, with infantrymen and mariners at the steering wheel.

It is common knowledge that many airmen, both in the Army and Navy, are in favor of an independent status for aviation. But it is seldom that these flying experts will talk for the book. They know the head men are opposed, and their traditions of discipline are powerful enough to keep them silent.

That doesn't go for all of them, however.

General Arnold himself and his former executive officer in the Air Corps, Col. Ira C. Eaker, had this to say in a recent book:

"Many feel that eventually the defensive air component of the Nation will be given a status coordinate and commensurate with that of the Army and Navy. When that time will come, if it does come, is not yet clear. It came in some of the other nations of the world when the pressure of war was upon them. We shall be fortunate if our time for that reorganization comes in the relative calm of peace, or, at worst, in the preparatory and not in the fighting stage."

Coming from an Acting Additional Deputy Chief of Staff, that is stronger language than it may seem.

But what has been done about his warning? Nothing.

The fighting stage has not yet come. But we are certainly in the preparatory stage.

What are we waiting for?

SINGLE AIR FORCE

(By Al Williams)

Each time public opinion forces recognition of its growing demand for a competently organized American air force, out comes old exhibit No. 1, the headquarters air force. And now that the European war has demonstrated to the American citizen that air power will be the determining factor in this struggle out comes that exhibit.

The ordinary people of England were asking in 1938, "Are we going to be bombed? What of our air force? How does it compare with Germany's?" Never did I hear one question about the size and efficiency of the British Army or Navy. The people were looking to the air, from which instinct and intelligence told them their menace was coming.

The plain British men and women were more realistic and practical than their leaders. But whenever British citizens became too loud in their demands for an unquestionably superior air force the Army and Navy leaders mobilized another million men or launched another battleship.

Now ordinary Americans are becoming restless about the known and suspected inadequacy of our fighting power in the air. They haven't forgotten Gen. Billy Mitchell. They know far more than is suspected about the stubborn, selfish resistance of the current leaders in both services to anything like a self-determining air force, legally authorized to work out the destiny of real American air power, without interference and under leaders who have won their leadership from the cockpit.

And what are we getting? Promises.

Next July—next fall—something or other is going to happen. Thousands of planes will be rolling off the production lines. Always in the future.

And what are we getting from Washington? Statements such as, "American combat planes are not only equal to but better than any European aircraft." This untruth has been passed along to the people time and time again by politicians and political appointees.

The American public is getting just what the British public got when it was demanding air power—real air power that could have fought this war over Germany and not over England.

And what are we getting in the headquarters air force? Well, the headquarters air force is the combat planes and air crews of the old Air Corps—with the rest of the old Air Corps devoted to training, procurement, maintenance, repair, and what not required to keep the headquarters air force provided with combat planes and fighting air crews. This smoke screen is exceedingly thin.

That leaves us with a headquarters air force and an Air Corps—both under the old Army. Two air services in the Army, divided against each other, thus permitting the old Army game of service politics to squelch any progressive air crusader who sees this European air war in its true light.

The one thing to do is to consolidate honestly all our air services—Army and Navy—into a genuine air force, freed from control by men who know nothing about air power and who even now fail to understand its predominance.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing are typical of newspaper comments appearing in many papers throughout the country these days. I shall not encumber the RECORD by inserting more of them at this time, but I have personally checked over 50 such comments within the past week. These comments stimulate our thinking and challenge our curiosity, but they neither condemn nor correct the existing situation. What is needed is a congressional inquiry, such as suggested in my resolution, No. 228, to get all the facts and search out the truth, so that the United States can be certain it is following the best path to get the full benefits of the mighty force which air power has become in effective defense planning in the world of today.

Unified Air Defense

REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 5, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, the major business before the country and the Congress today is, as we all know, the problem of national defense. Since the fall of Crete and the disabling of the Bismarck by aerial torpedoes there has been a growing concern in this country about the problem of our own aerial defenses. This week I checked over 50 editorials and newspaper comments, which expressed alarm as to whether we have sufficiently unified and strengthened our own aerial defenses.

Because I believe Congress is entitled to the full facts and the most-expert advice in forming its opinions, I have today introduced a resolution asking the Speaker to appoint a committee of nine, selected from the membership of the House Committees on Naval and Military Affairs, for the purpose of conducting an inquiry to see whether we need a Secretary of Air Defense, whether we should consolidate all our defense establishments in a Department of National Defense, with coordinate officers handling Navy, War, and air, or whether the present arrangement is the best solution. I believe this is too important a matter to be left to editorial commentators or to civilian heads of the War and Navy Departments. It involves the basic structure of the defense of America, and we are entitled to the full facts in this matter. I hope my resolution is adopted. It is known as House Resolution 228 and has been referred to the Rules Committee.

A congressional inquiry, such as my resolution provides, will simply be a search for the truth, and the facts will speak for themselves to suggest what changes are needed or to assure the country that the existing arrangement is the best possible method of fully utilizing the rapidly growing importance of aviation in the field of national defense. It does not contribute to our national unity or our peace of mind to have many of the best newspaper writers in the country expressing the conviction that a vital change is needed in the handling of the air arm of our national defense. The inquiry which I propose should settle this matter for all time to come on the basis of information provided by the best-informed authorities in the United States speaking with the freedom and protection provided them by such congressional inquiry.

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Mr. Ralph S. Ruth, of Mecca, Calif.:

MECCA, CALIF., May 31, 1941.

Hon. HARRY R. SHEPPARD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HARRY: After listening to the Honorable BURTON K. WHEELER, Mr. Lindbergh, and a few more who keep insisting that we all write to our Congressmen, I feel called to do as they say and write you.

I get around over my district pretty regularly and hear the expression of the people, and I find there is a very, very small percentage of the people here who will agree with the above-mentioned gentlemen regardless of their political affiliations. I have heard all your speeches, and besides I know you quite well personally, and I want you to know that the big majority of the people in my district place full confidence in your good judgment. I know none of us want war, but at the same time, after you have done as we are told we should, "turn the other cheek," there comes a time when you are entitled to give the other fellow a good kick in the pants.

Seriously, though, Harry, the big majority of the people here are back of the President in the stand he has taken 100 percent, and after listening to the fine speech he made I am very sorry that I am not a younger man, but I am a pretty tough old hombre and am now looking for a place where I could fit in.

I don't know how many letters you have been getting of the sort WHEELER and Lindbergh want sent, but they got under my skin to the extent that I had to write you how I feel about this matter. With best wishes and kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

RALPH S. RUTH.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

SPEECH OF GOV. W. LEE O'DANIEL APPOINTING HIM A UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM TEXAS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, June 4, 1941, the Texas congressional delegation at its regular weekly luncheon had as its guest the Honorable ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON, who was sworn in as the junior Senator from the State of Texas last Monday, June 2.

Gen. Sam Houston is credited with gaining Texas' independence from Mexico at the Battle of San Jacinto, April 21, 1836. Gen. Sam Houston, the father of the junior Senator from Texas, was a close and intimate friend of President Andrew Jackson. By reason of this friendship, when the junior Senator was born, his mother named him for President Andrew Jackson. Gen. Sam Houston took the oath of office as a United States Senator from Texas 95 years ago.

The biography of Senator ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON, in the latest edition of the Congressional Directory, is as follows:

ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON, Democrat, of La Porte; son of Gen. Sam Houston, first President of the Republic of Texas, and one of the first Senators to serve after Texas was admitted as a State into the Union; born in Independence, Tex., June 21, 1854; educated at Baylor College, Bastrop Military Academy, Texas Military Institute, at Austin, and Old Salado College; was graduated from West Point Military Academy; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1876; clerk of the United States district court at Dallas, 1879–89; appointed United States marshal by President Theodore Roosevelt and served from 1902 to 1910; Prohibition Party candidate for Governor of Texas in 1910 and 1912; one of the organizers of the Travis Rifles at Austin during the reconstruction period in 1874; also formed a troop of cavalry for Roosevelt's Rough Riders; appointed to the United States Senate on April 21, 1941, to fill the vacancy in the term ending January 3, 1943, caused by the death of Hon. Morris Sheppard; has the distinction of being the oldest person to become a Member of the Senate of the United States.

Our late beloved Senator Morris Sheppard died April 9, 1941. On April 21, 1941, the Honorable W. Lee O'Daniel, Governor of Texas, appointed Gen. ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON to be United States Senator from Texas, to serve until Senator Sheppard's successor is elected by the people of Texas June 28, 1941, at a special election called for that purpose. Governor O'Daniel's speech, which was delivered on the San Jacinto battleground April 21, 1941, when he appointed General HOUSTON United States Senator, was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Sons and Daughters of the Texas Revolution, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, the lessons of the past loom large in our thinking as we face the problems of the new day. The contribution of the centuries to our present life and mode of living is a notable one indeed. Too often, when we flash on the screen of our mind the picture of a hundred years ago and then change it quickly to the picture of today, we are tempted to marvel at our present advanced state in contrast to the primitive simplicity of those days gone by, and to commend ourselves too highly for bringing about this change. For in studying the intervening pages of history, we see that our growth has not been of a mushroom variety. We see that our progress has been step by step, and that the superstructure which now towers so high has been built—stone upon stone, timber upon timber—through the ages, and that into the building of that structure of our present society has gone not only the genius of what we might want to term our own supertalent, but also the intelligence, the strength, the courage of mind, body, and soul of men who are no more.

Contemplation on the contribution of the past gives needed restraint to our own vanity, a heightened appreciation of the intellectual qualities and the attributes of character of those who have gone before, and encouragement and inspiration in the thought that—

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time."

The rock upon which we stand is the rock of ages. The faith which we have was the faith of our fathers before us. The commandments which we obey were those engraven on stone on the summit of Sinai and spoken from the lips of the Nazarene in His Sermon on the Mount.

God grant that we may cling to these eternal verities which come as our sacred heritage of the past; that—faced with the fury of storms which now beset us—we may chart our course by the compass that has been tried and found true by those who captained our ship on yet another voyage.

"Lord, God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget."

On April 21, 1836—5 years more than a century ago—on this very spot, yes, at this very hour—the destiny of the land called Texas hung precariously in the balance. How that destiny was achieved; how valorous men—out-numbered, without rations, and adequate arms—defeated a dictator and his invading hordes—is a story which you know full well. "The sixteenth most decisive victory in the history of the world" it has been called, a victory starting a chain of events which brought to these United States a third of its present area; a victory which laid the groundwork for the change in sovereignty of nearly a million square miles; and, more important than all this, a victory which decided that our people should be free—free to work, free to worship, free to build here a new promised land that would contribute to the happiness and well-being of mankind.

I could speak appropriately today of the leader of our forces at the Battle of San Jacinto. I could mention the methods by which he and his brave men won victory on San Jacinto's field. We could recount the events of his earlier life which contributed to the military genius for which he was renowned—of his campaign with Andrew Jackson in the war of 1812 and the brilliance of his achievement then for the service of his country. Or we could examine the heritage which was his; the staunch record of his father, a soldier in the Revolutionary War; of earlier ancestors in Scotland who fought with John Knox for "God and Country."

What a record was his as a statesman, a leader in the civil life of every community in which he dwelled. I know of no other character in our State or National life who served as Governor of two different States, as a Representative in the Congress from two different States, as one of the first two United States Senators from his newly annexed State, as the President of an independent republic, or who whittled a pine stick on the floor of the United States Senate. (In these mad days—in the rush and tumble and turmoil of our present life—how remarkably pleasant it would be, or clarifying to our befuddled minds, if we could all sit down "for a spell" and do some good old-fashioned whittling like Sam Houston did in the days of old.)

The incidents in the career of Gen. Sam Houston are pleasant thoughts upon which to dwell, interesting circumstances to recall. But I pass on from these considerations, remembering the simple but prophetic comment of Andrew Jackson: "The world will take care of Houston's fame."

I am thinking today not so much of the details of San Jacinto's victory, nor of the achievements of Sam Houston as orator, statesman, and leader. I am searching rather for the reason for his phenomenal success, the cause of his courage, the guiding principles which led him to such great fame.

In an obscure document, penned by his hand on October 8, 1835, I think I have discovered that creed. You will remember that he was then commander of the Department at Nacogdoches. His first act in that capacity was to issue a general order to the forces at his command While it was in the form of a military order, it seems to me that that message, and particularly its conclusion, was an address to the people of Texas, an expression of the sentiments of heart of one of their number, a promise of freedom to come, a consecration to duty, a call for high courage from all men of good will.

It was so striking and significant in its content, so sincere in its tone, that I know it must have brought a warm, a fervent, and a zealous response from those whom he had been chosen to lead.

Concluding that order, General Houston said:

"The morning of glory is dawning upon us. The work of liberty has begun. Our actions are to become a part of the history of mankind. Patriotic millions will sympathize in our struggles, while nations will admire our achievements. We must be united—subordinate to the laws and authorities which we avow, and freedom will not withhold the seal of her approbation. Rally around the standard of the Constitution, entrench your rights with noble resolution, and defend them with heroic manliness. Let your valor proclaim to the world that liberty is your birthright. We cannot be conquered by all the arts of anarchy and despotism combined. In heaven and valorous hearts we repose our confidence. Our only ambition is the attainment of national liberty—the freedom of religious opinion and just laws. To acquire these blessings, we solemnly pledge our person, our property, and our lives. Union and courage can achieve everything, while reason combined with intelligence can regulate all things necessary to human happiness."

Reading those inspired words, we find, I think, the background, the basis, the fundamental reason for Houston's achievement. And we find there further, it seems to me, a message so prophetic, a creed so lasting, a statement so significant to our present day that it might well have been written on April 21, 1941, instead of more than a hundred years ago. Listen to his solemn admonition; hear his heroic words; consider the soundness of his expressed sentiments—and you will thrill, as I have thrilled, to the challenge of this clarion call of a century ago.

"The morning of glory is dawning upon us." Surely it was dawning then, and surely is our sun still rising in the eastern sky of hope. Our State is rich in resources. Our land of Texas—170,000,000 acres in extent—can count among its cherished advantages all those things which man requires—food for his sustenance; shelter for his comfort; bountiful raw materials to be shaped into other things by his handiwork and skill, or to be molded and fashioned by mighty machines; resources of energy at his every command. Here are playgrounds for his pleasure; scenes of beauty for his inspiration; an empire for his conquest.

Our factories are humming; our soil produces new wealth; our people are working and happy. "The morning of glory" is surely here.

"Our actions are to become a part of the history of mankind." Sam Houston spoke well. The history of Texas—as a Republic, as a State—is known throughout the world. The name of Texas—said to mean "friendship"—is associated also with thoughts of fortune, of force and vigor, and of great faith. Our actions—the actions of Texans of a hundred years—have become indeed a part of the history of mankind and have opened avenues for new opportunity, further progress, and high achievement.

"We must be united—subordinate to the laws and authorities which we avow, and freedom will not withhold the seal of her approbation." That is Sam Houston speaking, my friends: Sam Houston speaking to his soldiers, to those about him; Sam Houston speaking to generations yet unborn.

How did he say we would succeed? "We must be united—subordinate to the laws and authorities which we avow." Sam Houston did not mean united in partisan groups; Sam Houston did not mean united in separate organizations, and cliques; Sam Houston did not mean united in classes which engage in strife. He called upon his countrymen to be united—just plain united! And that meant all together—all for one and one for all—dedicated to a common cause which deserved well their devotion, their strength, their every effort.

How true his words ring today, how timely his message!

I decline, my friends, to accept the viewpoint that there is an irreconcilable conflict between any arbitrary groups of our people. I refuse to recognize any chasm between Americans that cannot be spanned by those basic virtues of honesty, integrity, and fair play—virtues which are characteristic, I think, of the vast majority of the 130,000,000 who constitute the citizenry of the United States of America. I believe that, whatever the diversity of our views, we do have a common ground on which we can stand in peace and contentment; we do have the ties of a heroic past which should bind us closely together; we do have the promise of a rich and useful future which should inspire us to go forward in fellowship and good will.

"We cannot be conquered by all the arts of anarchy or despotism." Who is that speaking? Is it the voice of our great President and leader in today's crisis—telling us to be of stout heart and good cheer? Is it the pledge of 1941? No, my friends; again it is rugged old Sam Houston—breathing defiance to dictators of yet another age and telling them, as we tell the despots of a modern day, that "liberty is our birthright" and that we propose again today to "entrench our rights with noble resolution and defend them with heroic manliness."

Thank God for truth which withstands the onslaughts of time! Thank God for the sentiments of heart of free men which do not change though faced with the dark forebodings of an uncertain future!

I am told that in an old newspaper in the New York Library there is a poem by an unknown correspondent, written in December 1841, and referring to the San Jacinto Battlefield. It was as prophetic as the words of Houston. Its writer said:

"In future time, then, may the pilgrim's eye
See here an obelisk, pointed to the sky,
Commemorative of each patriot's name,
Who nobly battled for his country's fame;
And on its pedestal and tapering spire,
Read epitaphs that free men will admire,
Inscribed in lasting characters of gold,
To celebrate the gallant and the bold."

Dreamed in 1841—completely realized today. The obelisk does stand, pointed to the sky, commemorating each patriot's name and recording his contribution to an empire's fame.

May there be engraven just as deeply upon the tablets of our hearts the heroic words of Gen. Sam Houston when he called upon us—all of us—Texans of 1836, Texans of 1941—to pledge to this sacred cause "our person, our property, our very lives," and let us share with him the noble thought that "in heaven and in valorous hearts we repose our confidence."

It is particularly important, I think, that we should recall at this very time these words of admonition from one of our great leaders of the past, a leader who faced the challenge of dictatorship, a leader who was chosen by his comrades to direct their efforts in throwing off the yoke of tyranny and in guaranteeing for themselves and for their sons, and for their sons after them, the sacred and inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Those sturdy pioneers of another day accepted the challenge. They placed themselves in the path of the despot's desire. By their actions, as well as by their words, they pledged full allegiance to Houston's sentiment that the sacrifice of person, property, and life itself on the altar of freedom was not too great a price to pay for the privilege of organizing and maintaining a Government which would exalt the rights of man and preserve for mankind those essentials to a free and untrammeled existence.

How similar are the situations of 1836 and 1941! True, the proportions are immeasurably different, the battle front now more far-flung. But the issues are almost parallel; the opposing forces have striking resemblance to those of a century ago. The challenge to our safety, well-being, our very existence is just as serious today as it was in the perilous years which our fathers knew.

Our general well-being, the vast resources of our land, the prosperity which we have known in the past and the prospect which we have envisioned for the future have, I am afraid, given us a sense of complacency which is inconsistent with our present situation. I do not wish to spread alarm. I hope that we shall not know fear in our hearts. But I am convinced that the democracy which was bequeathed us through the noble effort and sacrificial service of those who have gone before, the democracy which we cherish and under the beneficences of which we thrive and prosper—I do believe that that democracy is in the direst danger. And I do know that unless we shall become sufficiently aware of the peril which besets us and bestir ourselves as did the patriots of old, the most serious consequences may be in store.

But what shall we do? What shall we do to preserve the contributions of the past? What shall we do to maintain our government in the traditional American Way? How shall we combat the threat of totalitarian tyranny—a tyranny that has already in less than 12 months reduced to ruins 11 nations which embraced our democratic ideals, a tyranny which has virtually enslaved 250,000,000 people whose only offense was that they were in the way of a mad march of power-crazed men. How shall we continue to be free?

Our soldier and sailor boys and our marines did not hesitate long over that question. With marked unanimity and with patriotic spirit reminiscent of Valley Forge, San Jacinto, and the Alamo, they answered the call, and, with no murmur of protest, gave up their trades, their professions, their careers, and shouldered arms for the military and naval protection of their land.

The example which they are setting should be an inspiration to those of us who have not yet had our full share in the all-out plan of American preparedness. Our production lines must turn out more and more materials for these lads of ours. There must be machines for them to travel over highway and field, planes to soar through the skies, ships to sail the high sea. Whether we be executives or managers or labor, our duty is clear; the test of our patriotism is at hand.

In Texas we do not intend for the wheels of any machine nor the line of any assembling operation to stop for one moment while men quarrel or engage in petty partisan bickering. I proposed to the Texas Legislature the enactment of a law prohibiting the use of force or violence, or the threat thereof, in any labor disputes, and the legislature passed that bill within 8 legislative days after it was submitted. Texas can say to the world, with full assurance, that defense production in this State will not be delayed by any such practices as those described. The State of Texas has many resources and facilities which are being put at the disposal of the Nation, and those resources will be made available without interruption or delay. Sam Houston and his men destroyed the bridges behind them. Theirs was an all-out effort. There were no drones. The Houston philosophy and practice of 1836 is the Texas philosophy of 1941.

Our Government must be made strong, effective, honest, and sound. If a bungling bureaucracy gets in the way it must be replaced in favor of an efficient administration of our plans. If there are weaknesses in the structure of our Government—National, State, or local—we must hasten to strengthen those sections of our ramparts.

We must give full attention to home defense, to care of those in need, to the provision of employment for those who know no skills, for the training of our labor reserves to serve in positions more profitable to them and beneficial to the country's defense.

We must sweep from the framework of our official structure and from the recesses of our minds and hearts any evidences of selfishness, envy, and greed. We must stand shoulder to shoulder for the common cause and give to that cause all of the strength, the courage, and the talent with which a gracious God has endowed us.

My friends, shafts and monuments have been erected to our pioneer patriots—and fittingly so. And there would be pride and gratitude in their hearts, I am sure, if they were here to see these physical evidences of our esteem. Sam Houston, being human, must have been proud of the battles which he won, the high offices which he attained. But also, being human, there must have been a particular tenderness and love in his heart for his family and his close friends, a solicitude for their well-being, a pride in their achievement. I have read the last will and testament of Sam Houston, and I have noted the attention which he gave to instructions regarding the education and training of his children. How concerned he was for their future; how anxious that they should be strong, and noble, and good! How glad he would have been to know that they grew into manhood and womanhood possessed of high intellect, of gracious bearing, of profound faith!

There is one son of Gen. Sam Houston who is living today. On June 21 he will reach the age of 87 and, despite the strain of the busy, purposeful, and successful life which he has lived, he is still a close student of the trend of the times. His latest book, Texas Independence, declared by experts to be one of the most authentic works on Texas history yet to be issued, appeared but 3 short years ago.

I want to pay tribute to him today. I have just been to see him in his quaint house overlooking Galveston Bay. I have inspected the shelves of his study, lined with books representing the best literature of the ages. I have seen mementos of his successful career as a military man, and I recalled with pride that it was my honor 2 years ago to give him an honorary commission as major general of the Texas National Guard as a token of esteem for his distinguished service for that organization. I have heard him speak with great fervor on moral issues which demand the attention of our society; I have known of his work as a civic leader in every community in which he has lived. His literary skill, his ability as a lawyer, and his charming talent as a painter are well known.

Elected the first president of the San Jacinto Chapter, Sons of the Republic of Texas, in Houston, he has been identified through the years with the study of our history and with efforts to perpetuate the record of our noble past. Even as his father brought fame to him, through a life characterized by courage, high intelligence, and consecration to a great cause, so has ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON, in turn, honored his father by being diligent in the service of society, devoted to his native State, and dedicated to the highest principles of public and personal virtue. He has carried the banner of Houston high and has added luster to an already ennobled name.

As Governor of the State of Texas, I have wished to recognize the useful life of ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON and to pay another tribute to the immortal memory of his father.

I have today, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the land, appointed ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON to the high position of United States Senator from the State of Texas to serve until the vacancy caused by the untimely death of the late Senator Morris Sheppard shall have been filled by election, as provided by law.

Many names of distinguished and honorable men and women have been recommended to me for appointment to this high office, but not once has the name of Gen. ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON been suggested to me. He receives this high honor, not because of endorsements of many friends—although I doubtless would have received many such endorsements if the people of Texas had known that I was considering him for the place—but because I have searched the pages of history to find the one who, I think, is most entitled to this tribute.

To whom could six and a half million Texans owe a greater debt of gratitude than to the only living son of Gen. Sam Houston? What act could bring such joy to the heart of Gen. ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON than to walk into the Senate of the United States and to occupy, as Senator from Texas, the same seat which his illustrious father occupied on March 30, 1846, as one of the first two United States Senators from Texas? What could be more inspiring and encouraging to the other 95 United States Senators, at this crucial time in world history, than to sit in session with the son of that great general who in days of crisis a hundred years ago played such an important role in the history of this State and Nation? And last, but not least, what a contribution Gen. ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON in his own right can make to our cause of freedom and democracy. He receives this honorable appointment not alone as a tribute to the memory of his distinguished father, but also because he is eminently qualified for the place. His own high intellectual attainments, his long and useful experience, his patriotic service to his State, distinguish him as a great son of Texas and make it particularly appropriate that he should receive, to climax his career, the highest honor in our power to bestow.

In the name of the people of Texas, and moved by the impulse of our grateful hearts, I salute once again the name of Houston.

Ladies and gentlemen, as I said before, I visited Gen. ANDREW JACKSON HOUSTON today, and just as I broke the news to him of his appointment the sun suddenly shot through the dark rain clouds in such fashion that it appeared dazzling. I said:

"General, do you know what caused that sun to burst so suddenly through those dark and heavy rain clouds?"

He said, "No, Governor; what caused it?"

I said, "General, it appears to me as if our great and good, loving God has just spread the clouds apart so the spirit of your illustrious father could smile down upon his son on this particular scene and see the big smile on your face."

Mr. President

REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, attention has been directed in the public press to a statement purporting to come from the White House, claiming that 95 percent of the letters received there approved the President's proclamation of an undeclared war. I am not going to say that it is a misstatement, deliberate or otherwise, because I have not the means of disproving it. I do want to say, Mr. Speaker, that such a representation of public sentiment is completely and entirely inconsistent with the mail received by my office, and also not in keeping with that received by other Representatives of the people with whom I have discussed the subject.

Every week, every day, I receive appeals from citizens who are appealing to their public servants to keep our country out of war. And I want to reproduce here, Mr. Chairman, one petition I received from a group of citizens I think representative of the kind of America we like to think about. These citizens live in the small town typical of our Nation, where they are not swayed by the hysteria of arguments and propaganda disseminated for selfish objectives.

The petition was sent to me, addressed to the President. In addition to sending it there, I am asking to have it reproduced in this public document, where I know it will reach the attention of those who keep account of what this legislative branch of their Government is saying and doing. The petition follows:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

MR. PRESIDENT: In the last election we, the undersigned, trusted your promise that you would not send our boys to fight in battlefields of foreign countries, and for this solemn promise we voted for you. Please, Mr. President, do not disappoint us—keep your promise.

Gasless Sundays

REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the people of our Nation are greatly disturbed over the proposed plan of Secretary Ickes to establish gasless Sundays in our country, in an apparent effort to conserve the supply, while at the same time we are selling both oil and gasoline, in large quantities, to Japan. The oil and gasoline which we sell to Japan will no doubt be delivered by her to the Axis Powers, or used by Japan as an ally of the Axis Powers, in an effort to defeat the democracies of the world. This is a policy which is so inconsistent that it should not be countenanced by the people of this country. Our Nation has given aid to China, and to the democracies, by way of supplies and money. When we sell oil and gasoline to the enemy of those democracies we are placing the weapon in their hands with which to defeat the same democracies which we have been attempting to aid. This policy should be stopped, and the President and his agencies should be prevented from further pursuing this unholy policy.

Mr. Speaker, we do not know whether this is merely another gesture to create a greater war hysteria in this country, or whether the Secretary of the Interior is in good faith in his announced policy of establishing the gasless Sundays in this country. But, in either event, the policy is so unsound in the face of the existing facts that such an order would be meaningless; and it would be almost wholly impossible of enforcement. The people know the facts respecting the sale of gasoline and oil to Japan, and they know that the oil and gasoline which Japan obtains from us will be used against every democracy in the world, including the United States, in the event of our involvement in a shooting war.

An article, with a Washington date line of June 3, 1941, is very illuminating on this subject, which I herewith include, which reads:

GASLESS SUNDAYS SUGGESTED BY OIL-INDUSTRY LEADERS

WASHINGTON, June 3.—Gasless Sundays and other restrictions throughout the United States, and possible conservation measures affecting the whole of the Western Hemisphere, were suggested by the oil industry today as means of meeting expected shortages in petroleum.

The industry's report said the east would begin to feel a petroleum deficiency by July 1 and this would be intensified progressively into autumn and the next year.

The oil men, here for talks with Government officials, recommended creation of an industry committee, and its spokesmen pledged cooperation "to any extent" in meeting needs of supply.

The mention of restriction on Sunday use of automobiles backed a suggestion made by Ickes last week.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that our high Government officials have full knowledge of the sale of oil to Japan.. The negotiations by the great oil companies with Japan for the sale of such commodities has the sanction and approval of our Government.

Herewith I incorporate an article, appearing in the press of our country, under date line of June 3, 1941, which will be of interest to the people of our Nation, which reads as follows:

JAPAN TO GET OIL SUPPLIES

FLEMINGTON, N. J., June 3.—The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey outlined to stockholders today details of an agreement to sell additional supplies of oil to Japan "negotiated with the full knowledge of the American, British, and Netherlands East Indies Governments."

It appears from the articles, above set forth, that the present administration is adopting a policy of aiding both sides in this European war—the Axis Powers and the democracies—which would have the tendency of prolonging their war, and in the event of our involvement in it—which I hope will never happen—the very supplies we are now sending to Japan would be used against us. And the very sad aspect of this entire matter is that in order to aid the Axis Powers, by selling gasoline and oil to Japan, our own people in this country are to be penalized by having imposed upon them "gasless Sundays" and a very strict limitation in the use of oil and gasoline for every purpose, including that of domestic use for heating homes in our country.

This policy is entirely inconsistent. It should never be inaugurated in the face of the existing facts. Our own people should have recognition, and not the arch enemies of the democracies.

The W. P. A. Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, 60 percent of the people now employed by the W. P. A. are more than 40 years of age and over half of them are over 45.

What does this mean? It means that by and large these are folk who cannot expect to find jobs elsewhere, however much the defense program may expand.

18-MONTH SUSPENSION IS WRONG

It means also that to suspend these workers at the end of each 18-month period constitutes an utterly unnecessary hardship and accomplishes no good purpose.

The W. P. A. workers today are not people who want relief nor people who could get work elsewhere if they tried. They are a group of older men and women who must either depend on local relief or else work for the benefit of their Nation on this public-works program. I have never yet met a W. P. A. worker who would not give anything to secure a private job if he could find one.

PROPOSAL TO CUT 500,000 JOBS IS WRONG

It seems to me to be utterly wrong to cut the W. P. A. as has been proposed by the Budget and as is proposed in the committee's bill. It will mean laying off some 500,000 people in the next month or so and it will mean just about 2 people can have such work next year for every 3 who have had it this year. And this will be done in the face of the fact that over a million heads of families now need W. P. A. work and cannot have it.

I know a good many people who were formerly unemployed have gone back to work due to the tremendous defense program.

WHAT OUR RULE SHOULD BE

I also know that America's rule and principle, if she really wants to be strong, must be this: No man's labor, no man's time, no man's talents must be wasted. We cannot afford any unemployment at all under the present circumstances.

The way to cut W. P. A., and the only fair and right way, is to let it cut itself—in other words, when the time comes that fewer people are certified and in need of work than there are jobs available on the program, then we should cut it down. Not until then. Not until all our people are employed and at work.

But the conservative National Industrial Conference Board estimates that the very least unemployment we can expect in the next fiscal year is 5,000,000. And at this moment there are as many people eligible and waiting for a chance to go to work as there are people employed.

And listen to this passage from an editorial in the United States News:

In the period just ahead * * *.

Many factories, without defense orders, will close for lack of steel or aluminum or rubber or copper or zinc or other defense materials.

Many workers with jobs in these factories will be out of jobs.

Many merchants selling goods that are made of materials useful for defense will find it more and more difficult to restock as shelves are emptied.

Many consumers, with dollars to spend, will find it harder to obtain the goods they want; will be limited in what they can buy.

It's just that the defense honeymoon is coming to an end.

This factor certainly must be considered.

WORK DONE AND VALUE OF PROGRAM

About 500,000 W. P. A. workers are employed right now on direct national-defense projects. One Army officer has stated to a committee of Congress that if we are going to cut down on the W. P. A. we will have to increase the Army appropriation if we are to get the work done.

If airports are important for national defense then we should remember that most of them have been and are being built by W. P. A. Without W. P. A. workers we should have only a fraction of the airports we do have or they would have cost a great deal more money to build.

Nor is this by any means the only type of direct national-defense work done by W. P. A. At one Army camp 4,000 acres of ground has been cleared for maneuvers, 42 miles of supply roads have been built, a complete sewer system has been installed, a water system has been put in, and all of it by W. P. A. This record has been repeated all over the Nation.

The question is, Is it better to have these men employed in this manner or to have them on relief rolls?

TRAINING PROGRAM

But there are other features to the W. P. A. program which may in the long run be even more important. Very few people seem to know it, but all over the nation W. P. A. is training people to take jobs in various types of defense factories where there is a need for more labor of certain types. This clearly is not only rehabilitation for the individual but of paramount importance to the Nation.

And then there are the jobs for those groups of people—older men, mothers who, without much previous work experience, must support their families—who cannot possibly get jobs elsewhere. Here is where the sewing projects for women come in, and though there will be a strong urge to cut them down and increase other parts of the program, I hope earnestly that this will not be done, because I know what this work has meant to thousands of American women who had no other place to turn except to local relief.

No group has been hit so hard by unemployment and no group will be helped less by the defense program than white-collar and professional people. Broadly speaking, the type of work they have been doing on the W. P. A. has been what is called "community service." It has included serving school lunches to about 2,000,000 children a day, the distribution of surplus commodities, adult education, and housekeeping aid to poor mothers, especially at the time when their babies are coming.

Many a community finds itself in dire need of more recreational facilities and more trained recreation workers due to the influx of new families. W. P. A. can and has supplied such workers.

Nearly 70,000 people are now employed by W. P. A. preparing and serving school lunches to undernourished children.

Teachers working for W. P. A. wages have made possible many adult education classes that would otherwise have been impossible. In all these cases it is obvious how harmful it is if a person doing work of this kind must be removed from his playground work or from his teaching because he has been employed at it for 18 months.

The 18-month rule should be abolished in this bill. Whatever useful purpose it may have served in the past it can now only punish people who need this work because, indeed, they can get no other work or else destroy the effectiveness of one of the community-service programs I have just described.

Finally, at a time like this, one of the things most necessary is that we do not let the culture of our country suffer while we build its defenses. In many respects, I believe the art and music projects of W. P. A. have been one of the finest things any government ever undertook. They have developed and preserved the talents and the art of the common folk of this great Nation. They have said to all the world that here was one nation that valued these things and believed that not only those who were able to afford expensive training but also the common people had within them talents that were worth more to their fellow citizens than money could measure. I think the arts projects should be kept going for these reasons.

The W. P. A. is not perfect. It never has been. But it still has a place in our Nation today, for if there ever was a time when it was important for all groups, especially those who are most helpless, to be fairly treated, to be encouraged, to feel that they are doing useful and necessary tasks, that time is now.

W. P. A. has two great purposes: First, to make a most important direct contribution to national defense by its direct national-defense projects; second, to put to work at useful and important jobs in the communities of the Nation those groups of our people who otherwise will have no jobs at all.

This is not the time to be adding to the number of the unemployed. Rather it is a time to say there shall be no unemployment at all.

I am in favor of an amendment to the W. P. A. bill which will provide at least enough money to employ as many people as have been employed in this fiscal year. If we can ever do that, it will mean that such gains as do take place in employment will be real gains and not imaginary ones.

Cecil Rhodes, Not Streit, Was Author of Union Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ARTICLE FROM SCRIBNER'S COMMENTATOR

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an informative article by Mr. Albert Hall in the June issue of Scribner's Commentator, proving beyond a doubt that Cecil Rhodes, not Clarence Streit, was the father of Union Now. I am placing this article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because I believe every true American should have the facts contained.

The article follows:

[From Scribner's Commentator of June 1941]

CECIL RHODES, FATHER OF UNION NOW

(By Albert Hall)

"Union Now With Britain" is the startling title of a new book by Clarence K. Streit, who proposes that a federal union between the United States and England and the British Dominions be set up at once. Mr. Streit has a large and growing organization—Federal Union, Inc.—and many influential supporters. Echoes are heard across the Atlantic. Last August Leslie Hore-Belisha talked in the British House of Commons about the possibility of an eventual common citizenship of Britain and the United States.

As Cecil Rhodes, multimillionaire British imperialist, wrote 50 years ago, "We could hold the federal parliament 5 years at Washington and 5 years at London."

Hopes for a reunion of the United States with the mother country have lived here and in England since the days of Benedict Arnold, but the roots of the present agitation stem back to the plans and actions of Cecil Rhodes, who made federal union of the English-speaking peoples his life purpose. One of the means he adopted to bring the United States into closer association with the Empire was the establishment at Oxford University of the Rhodes scholarships for selected students from the British Empire and the United States. One of those students has been Clarence K. Streit.

It would be well for Americans to know some facts about Cecil Rhodes, who set on foot such vast enterprises for our benefit.

In 1877, at Kimberley, South Africa, in the "grand old days of the diamond fields," Rhodes, then only 24 years old, but already a man of effective action as well as a dreamer, drew up for the guidance of his life a draft of his ideas. As definite objectives, he proposed to himself: "The furtherance of the British Empire, for the bringing of the whole uncivilized world under British rule, for the recovery of the United States, for the making the Anglo-Saxon race but one empire." What a dream. But yet it is probable. It is possible.

When Rhodes was making these amazing plans, he and a partner already held big concessions in the diamond fields. Rhodes' financial genius caused people to speak of his golden touch. But wealth, to him, was primarily a means for actualizing what he called his thoughts—political thoughts, racial thoughts, imperial thoughts.

William T. Stead, for many years Rhodes' close friend, tells that in that very year Rhodes drew up the first of his famous wills, bequeathing his property to the British Secretary of State for the Colonies and one Mr. Shippard, "giving them full authority to use the same for the purpose of extending British rule * * * the consolidation of the Empire, the restoration of the Anglo-Saxon unity destroyed by the schism of the eighteenth century."

Rhodes threw himself into the commercial and political life of South Africa, but kept his Anglo-Saxon ideas to himself and a small circle of friends. In the diamond industry, he was at the forefront of the development of London-dominated combinations and monopolies. In 1888 he merged forces with Barney Barnato, the diamond king, his erstwhile rival, to form the De Beers Consolidated Mines. This was the end of the grand old days of the independent diamond producers.

In the meantime wars and politics were raging throughout South Africa. The whites fought the native blacks and more or less gently persuaded them of the dignity of labor. Among the whites, too, there was strife—between the English and the Dutch. Cape Colony, where Rhodes flourished, had been taken by the English from their ally, Holland, in 1814 in order to "prevent its seizure by the common enemy, France." The English had come as allies and stayed as rulers.

Not all the African Dutch were reconciled to this new order and many of them trekked out of Cape Colony, fighting wars with the natives and with the English, finally winning recognition for the Transvaal and the Orange Free State as independent Boer republics. In Cape Colony itself the dominant English were opposed by a Dutch party known as the Afrikander Bond.

North of the Transvaal and approachable from the cape via Bechuanaland lay a vast territory nominally ruled by the Matabele chief Lo Bengula and known as Mashonaland and Matabeleland. This territory, rich in minerals and very suitable for white habitation, was naturally coveted by the English of the cape and by the Boers of the Transvaal.

Such was the state of affairs when Cecil Rhodes entered politics by taking his seat in the Cape Assembly in 1881. He had just been graduated from Oriel College, Oxford, having attended irregularly since 1873, alternating South African ventures with cloistered studies in his native England.

Rhodes was not above trickery and deceit if the purpose were grandiose enough. Thus he flattered the cape Dutchmen in every possible way. He cultivated the friendship of Mr. Hofmeyr, leader of the Afrikander Bond. He built a palatial residence, furnishing it in the Dutch style, and entertained the back-veldt farmers en masse on every possible occasion. The Boers regarded him with affection and called him the Englishman with the Afrikander heart. He became Prime Minister of Cape Colony in 1890.

Shortly before this, he had begun preparations for taking Lo Bengula's territory. His agents got a mining concession from Lo Bengula. Quickly forming a chartered company by grace of London, Rhodes sent his friend, Dr. Jameson, with company soldiers into Mashonaland to keep out the trekking Transvaalers.

Rhodes was now approaching the summit of his career. As chairman of De Beers Consolidated (with a vast income), as managing director of the chartered company, and as prime minister of Cape Colony, all at the same time, he was virtually dictator of British South Africa. His agents were ubiquitous.

Now, at last, he was able to begin the extension of British rule in Africa. Rhodes' agents fomented a war with Lo Bengula, seized his territory and renamed it Rhodesia.

All this while Rhodes aided in public enterprises, building railroads, schools, telegraph lines, courthouses, and so on. As time went on, he was particularly anxious to populate Rhodesia, and news of marriages or births often caused him to remark, "Good, it will help populate the country" or "So-and-so is a good citizen."

But his mind was not completely occupied with South Africa. He made one will after another, leaving his property now to this friend and now to that, with secret instructions to use the money in building up the British Empire and winning back the United States. He also desired to found a secret society of millionaires to accomplish his purpose. He wrote to William T. Stead in 1891, recalling some discussions:

"Please remember the key of my idea discussed with you is a society, copied from the Jesuits as to organization, the practical solution a differential rate (tariff war), and a copy of the United States Constitution, for that is home rule or federation, and an organization to work this out, working in the House of Commons, for decentralization."

As a step toward union, he advocated a tariff war against the United States. His letter says, "The world, with America in the forefront, is devising tariffs to boycott your manufactures, and that is the supreme question, for I believe that England, with fair play, should manufacture for the world * * * a commercial war * * * that is my program. You might finish the war by union with America."

In the same letter Rhodes reveals his vanity: "They are calling the country Rhodesia. * * * I find I am human and should like to be living after my death; still, perhaps, if that name is coupled with the object of England everywhere, and united, the name may convey the discovery of an idea which ultimately led to the cessation of all wars and to one language throughout the world."

His big objective was America. The letter goes on: "What an awful thought it is that if we had not lost America, or if even now we could arrange with the present Members of the United States Assembly and our House of Commons * * * we could hold the federal parliament 5 years at Washington and 5 years at London. The only thing feasible to carry this idea out is a secret one (society). * * * Fancy the charm to young America, just coming on and dissatisfied * * * to share in a scheme to take the government of the whole world."

Cecil Rhodes, whether dealing with the African Cape Dutchmen and affecting an "Afrikander heart," or planning his secret society for bringing the world under British rule, or setting up his scholarships, always felt himself to be a man destined to do good to humankind, in the English manner.

William T. Stead quotes Rhodes's religious conclusions as follows:

"If there be a God, I think that what He would like me to do is to paint as much of the map of Africa British red as possible, and to do what I can to promote the unity and extend the influence of the English-speaking race."

While laying plans for the government of the world, Rhodes was scheming secretly to seize the territory of the independent Boer republics. He plotted revolution in the Transvaal and posted Dr. Jameson on the frontier with a force of Chartered Co. soldiers. Jameson was to march on Johannesburg while the revolutionists rose and seized the Pretoria arsenal, after which the country would be brought under the British flag.

Rhodes and the revolutionary committee got tangled in arguments, for many of the revolutionists wished to remain independent and retain the Transvaal flag. Jameson became impatient, started his famous raid into the Transvaal and was outmaneuvered and captured by the Boer General Cronje (January 1, 1896). There was no uprising. The affair was a fiasco.

Instantly the whole world knew that Cecil John Rhodes, Prime Minister of Cape Colony, chairman of De Beers Consolidated, and managing director of the British South Africa Co. had connived at and financed attempted revolution within a neighboring independent state and had backed an absolutely unprovoked, illegal attack on the same.

Thus was British imperialism exposed to the world so starkly naked that the London government had to disown Rhodes. He was forced to resign as head of the chartered company and as Prime Minister of Cape Colony.

His position was disgraceful, and he was extremely embarrassed. His Dutch friends were heartbroken. He was no longer "the Englishman with the Afrikander heart."

Dr. Jameson went to jail for 15 months, but some years later became Sir Leander Starr Jameson. Bart Rhodes himself expected to be jailed, but was spared that final humiliation.

In extenuation of his conduct, Rhodes discussed the argument over the Transvaal flag, trotting out the idea of federal union. Rhodes said: "My whole idea was federal union, and I thought it was quite possible the Republic would remain a republic, so far as local matters were concerned, but that the federal union, dealing with railways, tariff systems, and defense, and those questions that are called federal, would be in an assembly that must be under the British flag."

In London, Vindex, one of his apologists, put the matter thus: "The question of the flag he did not look on as immediate, and he did not expect the republics to surrender their flags at once."

The aftermath of the Jameson raid was the South African War (1899–1902), ending in the extinguishment of the Boer republics and their annexation to the British Empire.

In 1899 Rhodes drafted his final will, the famous will setting up the Rhodes scholarships. His ideas had ripened. The great plan of winning the United States was to be based on educational ties. The residue of his vast fortune, after specific bequests and setting up the scholarships, he left to a chosen committee for undisclosed purposes.

Here, in the public words of his noted will, are some of his reasons for setting up the scholarships at Oxford for students from the Empire and the United States:

"I consider that the education of young colonists at one of the universities in the United Kingdom is of great advantage * * * for instilling into their minds the advantage to the Colonies as well as to the United Kingdom of the retention of the unity of the Empire. * * * I also desire to encourage and foster an appreciation of the advantages which I implicitly believe will result from the union of the English-speaking peoples throughout the world and to encourage in the students from the United States * * * an attachment to the country from which they have sprung."

Rhodes has been dead 39 years, but his ideas are still with us. We cannot yet tell if any Rhodesian secret society has been operating, but the Rhodes scholarships seem already to be producing results.

It is intriguing to note the following Rhodes scholars officially connected with Federal Union, Inc., the organization back of "Union Now": Clarence K. Streit, Frank Aydelotte, Stringfellow Barr, O. C. Carmichael, George H. Curtis, Clyde Eagleton,

S. E. Eliot, Edwin P. Hubble, W. P. Maddox, Felix Morley, L. A. Post.

On the outskirts of the Union-Now movement, we find Oxford-educated Anglophiles, like Henry R. Luce, editor of Life, who, in a recent editorial, speaks of "that inspiring proposal called Union Now" and derides as "an ignorant and foolish conception" any idea that collaboration with Britain means playing Britain's game.

Is it possible that the "vision of Clarence Streit" came to him by apostolic succession from Cecil Rhodes, whose estate paid the bill for Streit's sojourn within the storied walls of dreamy Oxford?

Truly it seems that Rhodes' "thoughts" are far reaching. Rhodes, as well as Streit, thought the United States Constitution would be a good basis for federal union; Rhodes, too, hoped that in time this federal union would encompass the whole earth, for the good of mankind, of course, but also for the fame of Cecil Rhodes.

"Rhodesia," he had mused, "still • • • the name may convey the discovery of an idea."

Why rob the man of credit due? What could be more fitting for the new sovereignty emerging from the "vision of Clarence Streit" than the name "Rhodesia"?

Our Republic is not expected to surrender its flag at once.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the retirement of Charles Evans Hughes "leaves a lonesome place against the sky."

Lou Gehrig made the world more wholesome—Kaiser Wilhelm left it more Hitler hateful.

The end of all foreign wars—an eye for an eye—a Bismarck for a Hood—a wicked waste.

A new plan is to extend our war zone 180° to the east and 180° to the west and then patrol it.

We are kicking ourselves for worrying about the national credit when the legal limit was $45,000,000,000.

If Hiram and Hughes had talked to each other one certain time, two Democratic war Presidents would have talked less.

As dictators go, we have a natural—he declared an unlimited emergency by himself, with Congress in session.

England admits that she lost Crete because of opposition air superiority—the thing Lindy warned Mr. Baldwin against.

Blessings on thee, little man, barefoot boy with cheeks of tan; you are the one and only bet to absorb the national debt.

Guess it will be a long war—the Boss asks for the St. Lawrence waterway for defense and says it will take 4 years to finish it.

Under the broad, general powers of the Economy Act the soldiers' throats were cut and under the powers of "lend-lease" their heads may be cut off.

While Congress is being shut out in the cold rain by Franklin, the action of the Chief Justice reminds us that the Supreme Court was bodily attacked once by this same coordinate third branch.

Construction of Interstate Petroleum Pipe Lines Related to National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, this measure—H. R. 4816—is presented as a national-defense measure. This country today is faced with the possibility of a very severe shortage of petroleum products along the Atlantic seaboard. This shortage is not due to any shortage of production, but is due to difficulties in transportation.

Approximately 95 percent of the petroleum products consumed by the States along the Atlantic coast is delivered there by tankers, either in the form of crude or refined products. About 82 percent of the total moved to the Atlantic seaboard moves from the Gulf coast. This 82 percent moving from the Gulf coast to the Atlantic seaboard amounts to about 1,250,000 barrels per day. To keep this movement going, a fleet of 260 domestic oil tankers are required.

Continuing pressing necessity of diverting oil tankers from our coastwise domestic trade to the use of our fleet and to help Great Britain under the lend-lease bill is causing a shortage of tankers. It is certain that more and more tankers will be used for national-defense purposes. In addition, we cannot overlook the possibility that, in the event of hostilities and naval warfare in the Atlantic, this method of supply will be open to enemy attack.

For this reason the United States Government is very much interested in the immediate construction of pipe lines that would enable petroleum to be transported from the sources of production and refining to the Atlantic seacoast. Evidence before the committee shows, as I have stated, that about 95 percent of all petroleum and its products now move by tanker. Only a very small percentage of the volume necessary is ever moved by rail. It is evident that the construction of such pipe lines would not be in competition with the railway transportation agencies, for the reason that they do not have the facilities for handling the great volume of petroleum products made necessary by the demands of national defense.

It is contemplated that these pipe lines will be constructed by private capital, and will be operated in accordance with requirements laid down by the President of the United States. The bill contemplates that upon expiration of the national emergency that any pipe line so constructed should become a common carrier, subject to the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all other requirements of law.

I wish to emphasize the fact that this situation along the Atlantic seaboard is a shortage of transportation facilities, and not a shortage of petroleum. It is a problem of transportation, not lack of production. Figures presented to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce show the overwhelming advantageous position that this country has in regard to petroleum products. For instance, it was stated that the entire military activities of Germany and Italy, plus the industrial and other activities of those countries and of the occupied areas of western Europe, are being carried on with an amount of petroleum plus synthetic products, which is only about 5 percent of our present domestic production. The United States has 63 percent of the world production of crude petroleum. Germany, Italy, Poland, Albania, northern France, and Hungary altogether have about 1 percent of the total world production. Of course in addition to this 1 percent, Germany now has access to synthetic gasoline manufactured regardless of cost, and to a certain amount of Russian oil as well as the Rumanian oil fields. Incidentally, it might be of interest to the Members of the House to know that the production of refined oil produced in my home city of Baton Rouge alone exceeds the entire production from the Rumanian oil fields.

When we study these figures and realize their importance, we must recognize the importance of solving speedily this problem of transportation. We have an overwhelming preponderance in petroleum products. We must make that strength immediately available where it will count the most for our national defense.

This bill is in line with the principle advocated by the President of the United States, and the measure itself has the enthusiastic endorsement of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Office of Production Management. This measure is as important in our program of national defense as any measure that will be presented to this body.

The Rules Committee—Its Operation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE JOHN O'CONNOR, FORMER CHAIRMAN OF THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include an address delivered by Hon. John O'Connor, former chairman of the Rules Committee, at Columbia University, April 18, 1941:

An innovation in the method of teaching matters pertaining to public affairs is being tried out at Columbia University, New York City.

In the department of public law and government, under Dr. Kenneth W. Hechler, the class of about 60 seniors is just now studying legislative procedure.

By arrangement with the telephone company, an amplifier is connected with the telephone on the professor's desk. A telephone connection is then made between the professor and some person who is considered an authority on the subject.

On April 18 the discussion pertained to the operation of the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives.

Former chairman of the Rules Committee, John O'Connor, of New York, talked to the class via telephone from Washington.

The following was the basis of Mr O'Connor's talk:

"The Rules Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States is one of the forty-odd standing or regular committees of that body, but differs from all the other committees in that it is not a legislative committee; that is, it does not originate legislation nor are any legislative matters referred to it for consideration and report.

"It is often referred to as the 'all-powerful Rules Committee' and has a long, historical background, often as a scapegoat, since its birth in 1789. It is considered by many as the most important committee of the House. Up to 1880 it was a select committee, with the Speaker becoming a member of it in 1858. For a long period up to 1910 the Speaker dominated the committee and named its membership, until the famous fight against the 'Czarism' of Speaker 'Uncle Joe' Cannon in 1910, when control of the committee was taken out of the hands of the Speaker and its members elected, as those of other standing committees, by the membership of the House. An individual becomes a member of the comittee in the same manner as applies to the other committees, but usually only members of considerable experience are appointed. As to the selection of the chairman, the seniority rule prevails, and no Executive has been able to set aside the practice, even though the Executive has effectively brought pressure to bear upon the election of the Speaker and majority leader of the House.

"Incidentally, the Rules Committee of the Senate is of minor importance and rarely functions.

"The Rules Committee is the smallest standing committee of the House, consisting in recent years of 14 members—10 Democrats and 4 Republicans from 12 States of the Union. The majority party of the House has always seen to it that the party in power controlled this most important committee by at least 2 to 1, a far greater proportion of control than exists in any other committee.

"Different from the rules committee in the assembly at Albany, which is under control of the speaker and only functions during the latter part of the session, the Rules Committee of the House functions through the entire congressional session.

"Under the rules of the House, there are referred to this committee all matters pertaining to rules and the order of business of the House (rule XI, par. 35). All resolutions for the creation of investigating committees, such as the Dies committee, are also referred to it.

"While it is the only committee that can sit during sessions of the House without special leave (rule XI, par. 46), and is one of the few committees that can report at any time (rule XI, par. 45), in recent years certain restrictions have been drawn around it, which we shall discuss later.

"Let us now take a typical example of how the Rules Committee operates.

"The recently passed lease-lend bill is an outstanding example. After lengthy hearings and consideration, that bill was reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. It then went on one of the calendars of the House, but it might not be reached for consideration in regular course for a year or two, except by unanimous consent of the House or by a two-thirds vote on one of the two Mondays in each month when a few bills are called up under suspension of the rules at the discretion of the Speaker.

"Because the lease-lend bill was considered important and its passage urgent, the Foreign Affairs Committee applied to the Rules Committee for a rule making the bill in order as special business of the House. The chairman of the Rules Committee then called a meeting of his committee. Unlike other committees, the Rules Committee has no set day for hearings, and there are some Members who feel that the least often that committee meets, the better it performs its functions.

"A hearing was held in the meeting room of the Rules Committee, which is adjacent to the House Chamber, for reasons of convenience and speedy action.

"At that hearing before the Rules Committee only members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and possibly other Members of Congress, were heard—for and against the bill. Unlike other committees, the Rules Committee does not hear representatives of the public, and it is only on rare occasions that it deviates from its rule of hearing only Members of Congress, by listening to the head of some department of the Government. The reason for this is that the committee reporting the bill has held hearings, lasting for months sometimes, and has heard the public and those interested in the measure, and it is not the function of the Rules Committee to pass upon the merits of the measure, but rather only to determine whether the bill is of such importance and its passage of such urgency, that it should be presented to the House for consideration and passage. Rarely does the Rules Committee report out a bill unless there is sufficient demand in the House to assure its passage.

"This method of procedure of the Rules Committee of not hearing outsiders has not been pleasing at times to leaders of groups and blocs, like William Green, John L. Lewis, Dr. Townsend, and veteran leaders who wanted to put on a second show before the Rules Committee. The public is admitted, however, to these hearings. But it should always be remembered that the Rules Committee never acts until the other committee which has the bill under consideration reports it to the House, usually after thorough hearings.

"After listening to the proponents and opponents of the lease-lend bill, the Rules Committee went into executive session and voted to report a rule for the consideration of the bill. Under a gentleman's agreement it is rarely disclosed how the individual members of the Rules Committee voted in any instance.

"The rule voted by the Rules Committee is in the form of a resolution providing, in effect, that when the resolution shall be passed by the House it shall be in order to take up for consideration the lease-lend bill. The resolution fixes the time for general debate—several days in the case of the lease-lend bill—and provides for the control of the time, almost invariably providing that the chairman of the committee which reported the bill and the ranking minority member of that committee shall parcel out the time equally.

"Despite any popular opinion to the contrary, it should always be borne in mind that no action of the Rules Committee is in any wise effective until it is approved by a majority vote of the House. Any popular opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, the Rules Committee cannot by itself pass a bill, and the recitation that this has been done, such as in the case of some Blue Ridge Parkway bill is without any foundation whatsoever.

"Likewise the cry of gag rule is usually the last recourse of the die-hard opposition. The true purpose of practically all rules is to serve the will of the majority of the House by expedition of the measure. It is only claimed to be a gag by an infinitesimal minority of unpersuadable opponents.

"The chairman of the Rules Committee or some member of that committee then presents the rule to the House. The rule is usually drawn in the Rules Committee, although sometimes it is introduced in advance by the chairman of the reporting committee and follows a brief and usual form.

"On the next day, or at some later time, the rule is called up in the House. There is 1 hour debate on the rule. When the rule is passed the lease-lend bill, for instance, is taken up for consideration under the terms of the rule.

"The 1-hour debate on the rule is equally divided between the proponents and opponents of the rule or the bill.

"Contrary to popular conception, the rule can be amended if the majority of the House votes against the motion for the previous question, which is submitted at the close of debate on the rule.

"Sometimes—but rarely—the Rules Committee meets in executive session and holds a hearing secretly in reference to some matter of national importance. For instance, some years ago there was consternation in the defense departments over the fact that following the first World War there had accumulated not far from the Capitol a mountain of high explosives, left over from that war, which, if touched off deliberately, accidentally, or by spontaneous combustion, would blow to smithereens everything on the Atlantic seaboard from Key West to Bar Harbor.

"The purpose of the secret meeting was to obtain a special appropriation of $5,000,000 to move this sleeping volcano to the wild lands of Nevada still owned, by the millions of acres, by the Government, and partly unexplored.

"The Rules Committee acted promptly, and one night hundreds of freight cars started the journey across the continent with its dangerous burden—and the public never knew the "close shave" it had.

"On other occasions the Rules Committee has met, secretly, to make preliminary investigations into charges of misfeasance, malfeasance, and graft in Government departments, such as the inability of some high-ranking generals and admirals to account for the expensive oriental rugs on the floors of their homes and other 'gifts,' or, more recently, the charges of favoritism, waste, and worse in the present huge expenditures for national defense.

"The Rules Committee has also considered what action to take in respect to Members of the House charged publicly with misconduct.

"These secret excursions are rare, however, and properly so, because the chief function of the Rules Committee is to serve as an arm of the majority organization of the House—to expedite the important business of the House. It is not subject to the present majority party's 'steering committee,' an informal group of little activity; nor is it subject to any other person or committee.

"Contrary to the opinion, or wish, existing in some places, the Rules Committee is not the 'arm' of the executive branch of the Government. Rather is it a bulwark against Executive interference with the legislative branch. The Rules Committee would be the first group dissolved by a Hitler, even before he prorogued the entire parliament.

"Even here, far from the confessedly totalitarian states, some complaint has been made in high places, such as, 'What's the use of a Rules Committee if it won't do what we want?' There are still some people old-fashioned enough to think that the Rules Committee is one, if not the last, bulwark between a dictating Executive and a 'rubber stamp' legislature.

"The Rules Committee can never finally obstruct legislation, but it can provide time for 'cooling off' until the impetuous provocateurs get their feet back on the ground or the public takes matters into its own hands and plants them there.

"The Rules Committee is no spot for a timid or a demagogic Representative. Such should never seek the assignment or continue on the committee. Nor is it the place for Representatives whose chief concern is for some group or bloc or interest. They should continue to gravitate to such committees as Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Agriculture, Public Lands, Indian Affairs, Labor, Irrigation and Reclamation, and World War Veterans' Legislation.

"Principally since the Democrats have been in control in the House, several restrictions have been placed on the power of the Rules Committee. Some of such restrictions are that it cannot report any rule or order, setting aside the regular business of Calendar Wednesday, or abrogating the privilege to any Member to offer one motion to recommit the matter before the House to the committee which reported it. Nor can a resolution reported from the Rules Committee be taken up in the House on the same day it is reported, without a two-thirds vote of the House (rule XI, par. 45).

"Calendar Wednesday is set aside each week for the purpose of calling the standing committees of the House in order, and giving them an opportunity to call up for consideration public bills which they have previously reported. Because of the number of committees and the hundreds of bills reported during each session, this method of reaching legislation is not expeditious and the necessity calls into play action by the Rules Committee to pick out the more important and emergency legislation for consideration out of its regular order. Even all the important public legislation reported would not be reached in years if dependence was had solely on the Calendar Wednesday call alone. At times, some committees have not been reached on the call in 2 years.

"The right to move to recommit a measure to the reporting committee is considered one of the highest privileges of the House and cannot be tampered with, even by the all-powerful Rules Committee.

"Up to 1924, some chairmen of the Rules Committee succeeded in defeating the action of their own committee by 'pocketing,' that is, failing to report the action of the committee. They carried the 'rules' around in their pocket and never filed them in the House. This situation was taken care of by an amendment to the rules, adopted in 1924, providing, in effect, that every report of the Rules Committee must be filed within 3 days, and further if it is not called up by the member of the Rules Committee presenting the report, any member of the Rules Committee may call it up. (Rule XI, par. 45.)

"It should also be mentioned, in passing, that the Rules Committee often reports a rule doing away with some dilatory or technical advantage which might be taken against a matter before the House. Such a rule often waives points of order or makes a conference report immediately in order for consideration, to avoid delay by the objection of just one Member.

"In the rules of the House, there is a provision which, as it pertains to the Rules Committee, is most anomalous. I refer to the discharge rule, rule XXVII, paragraph 4, which has attracted public attention because of its being called into use on such measures as the bonus bill, the Frazier-Lemke bill, the antilynching bill, the wage-and-hour bill, and so forth.

"This discharge rule was adopted in 1931 to meet the situation where a committee, to which legislation had been referred, neglected or refused to report the matter either favorably or adversely. The rule provides that when such recalcitrant inaction continues for 30 days, any Member may file a petition to discharge the particular committee and bring the matter before the House, after the petition to discharge has been signed by a majority of the 435 Members of the House.

"Although, to repeat, no bill proposing legislation is ever referred to the Rules Committee, this rule includes in its term the Rules Committee as one of the committees that can be discharged. Because of this extraordinary provision, the device used in most of the instances referred to above was to introduce a rule for the consideration of the legislation. This rule would be referred to the Rules Committee, and if, after 7 days, that committee failed to report out the rule to consider the legislation, a petition to discharge would be lodged against the Rules Committee for failure to bring to the floor legislation which was never before it, and in one instance, at least—the antilynching bill—legislation that had never been acted on by the Judiciary Committee in charge of the bill.

"Such a backhanded method of procedure has, on several occasions, brought the Rules Committee into popular disfavor, at least in the opinion of the particular groups favoring the legislation in question. In the opinion of many Members who have devoted study to the rules of procedure of the House, the Rules Committee should never have been included in the discharge rule, as it was originally presented by Representative Crisp, of Georgia, one of the recognized authorities on parliamentary procedure, who later admitted he had overreached, in providing for the discharge of the Rules Committee in reference to legislation which had never been before it and concerning which it had no legislative jurisdiction.

"It sometimes happens that a legislative committee 'passes the buck' to the Rules Committee by reporting a measure pursuant to some 'deal' in the reporting committee, with the hope that the Rules Committee will pigeonhole the measure. One instance of this was the reporting by the Agriculture Committee of the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage-inflation bill.

"Perhaps some day this anomaly in the rules will be done away with, but in the meantime the Rules Committee must keep its collective chins up and withstand the barbs and shafts of unfounded or misled public opinion, reconciled to the heroic stand it must continue to take, despite any consequences to the individual members. While it maintains that attitude, it will continue to be one of the few remaining bulwarks of a democracy."

Hon. JOHN O'CONNOR,
New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. O'CONNOR: It was grand of you to talk with my class over the telephone on Friday, and I want you to know how much we appreciated your clear, lucid description of the work of the Committee on Rules.

Your memorandum reached me this morning, and it is the most comprehensive discussion of the Rules Committee that I have ever seen. Why don't you have it published? It seems to me that it would be a valuable contribution.

I found the citation on the Blue Ridge Parkway matter to which I referred; it was H. R. 12455, considered in July 1936, and discussion of the special rule starts on page 10611 of the RECORD of that year. However, you will note that although the rule prohibited any debate, the bill had previously been debated.

Thank you again for a most enlightening experience.

Very truly yours,
DR. KENNETH W. HECHLER.

[From the Washington Post of June 6, 1941]

DRASTIC MEASURE

(By Mark Sullivan)

CONGRESS PONDERS AN EXTREME BILL

There is a bill in Congress. It provides that the Government can seize anything you have—your factory, your farm, your checkbook, your automobile, your safety razor—literally anything. In the language of the bill, "property of any kind or character, real or personal, tangible or intangible." Just seize it and take it—no court proceeding, no argument. In the language of the bill, "requisition and take over." The Government will pay you whatever it says the thing is worth. If you are not satisfied with the price the Government fixes, then the Government will pay you 75 percent of the price, and sometime later you can bring suit to determine how much you shall get.

As a war measure it is extreme; but there is, in a way, precedent for it. That is, there would be precedent—if we were actually at war. In a state of actual war, actual fighting, it has not been unusual for the head of an army to seize the goods of citizens, their horses, their cattle. In such case it has been the practice to give the citizen a receipt for what is taken, and then let him recover the price later in some kind of proceeding.

In the present situation a material factor is that we are not actually at war. This measure does, when we are not at war, what might be justified if we were at war. The difference between at war and not actually at war is a formal declaration of war by Congress.

What is the purpose of this bill? It is not enough to accept the purpose as set forth in general terms in the bill itself. What we need to know is: What specific purpose was in the minds of the persons who thought up the bill? What was it they wanted to do that they could not do unless this bill is enacted?

Since commotion arose over the bill, various purposes have been put forth. Apparently some private owner of an airplane, used for pleasure or convenience, was not willing to sell his plane to the Government. Also it has been said the purpose was to seize tool-making machinery. One feels the purpose may have been broader than these examples.

For the best answer about the purpose of the bill, the best authority is President Roosevelt. He, when questioned at a press conference, said the purpose was to get delivery of defense orders. As an example, he alluded to the Allis-Chalmers plant, at which defense orders were delayed for many weeks by a strike. Apparently the purpose of this bill is to give the Government power to seize such a plant as Allis-Chalmers when there is a strike.

This looks strange. When there is a strike, don't do anything about the strikers—the administration has been conspicuously reluctant to do anything against strikers. Just seize the plant and operate it as a Government plant. That way, the penalty is put on the owners of the plant; they are required to give up their plant. The strikers don't give up anything. (Except that later on the strikers, and all workers, will find they have lost something precious—this way of getting around strikes would turn out to be a long step toward the totalitarian form of society and government.)

Against this bill, Congress resists. One feature that disturbs Congress is that when property is taken there is no provision for later returning it to the owner. The property is taken absolutely, and, in the words of the bill, "temporarily or permanently." Congress wonders why. If the Government takes Allis-Chalmers, or any other plant, why not return it after the emergency is over?

Congress wonders if a purpose of this bill, or an effect whether consciously intended or not, is to take over industries and keep them—in short, to bring about a permanent system of Government ownership and operation of industry. As it happens, this bill was not drafted by new dealers. It was drafted and endorsed by conservative men who came into the War Department temporarily to help in the war. They may either have been infected by the atmosphere of the New Deal, or affected by the traditional point of view of the Army about what is expedient in time of actual war.

What really disturbs Congress is recollection of what the New Deal has attempted in the past, long before war came into the picture. Step after step taken by the New Deal has been in the direction of economic and governmental revolution. As much as 4 years ago, Miss Dorothy Thompson wrote about Mr. Roosevelt's court bill and other measures: "These bills * * * add up to a consistent picture. And the picture is of a tremendously centralized government, with a power and authority vested in the President, not far from equal to the power and authority vested in Mussolini and Stalin."

And as it was expressed by Mr. Walter Lippmann, June 26, 1937: "I feel, let us hope mistakenly, that he, President Roosevelt, really does have a plan and that he is determined to execute it. * * * It is a plan, as I see it, to gather together an irresistible power over the economic life of this country, and to consolidate that power in the hands of his own following * * * irresistible power personally directed. * * * These fears, I regret to say, are shared by men who have occupied high places in this very administration and in the confidence of Mr. Roosevelt himself."

Recollection of this past record of the New Deal is now a tragic impediment at a time when some centralization of power is desirable for the purpose of war.

Policy of the Government Toward Nutrition Outside the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. A. A. BERLE, JR., ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, given at the National Nutrition Conference for Defense, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., Tuesday, May 27, 1941:

Let me first congratulate you for assembling, in a particularly trying time, to consider methods of improving the health of the country. Never was work more useful; and never more necessary.

Your task is to consider the problems of nutrition in this country and how they must be met. That is really a problem of how effectively to distribute the huge stocks of supplies which are readily available. To me you assign a less happy subject of the policy of the Government toward nutrition outside the United States. There, due to the efforts of war, blockades, and counterblockades, the problem is vastly less happy.

It has been, and is, the consistent policy of the United States to make food resources available, so far as possible, to those countries which need them. In normal times we rely on commerce to take the surplus stocks of food which we have to the points where they are needed. But where normal commerce does not accomplish this result, this Government has historically supplemented the supply by sending food, at its own expense, or at the expense of American organizations.

In the years following the World War, as you know, this Government through various organizations financed and sent food to Russia, Poland, Germany, Austria, Belgium, France; and sent less amounts to other countries. This process started immediately after the armistice of 1918; and it continued for several years. Only when the normal processes of reopened trade made it possible for the populations of these countries to obtain adequate food through normal channels did we cease to send relief. We did it without drawing political distinctions; and we did it on the straightforward theory that a land of plenty had a duty to humanity.

During the present war the Government has followed, so far as possible, the same policy. Naturally it has had to be modified by changed conditions, and by the exigencies of military situations which we did not create.

The chief agency which acts in conjunction with the Government in its relief policy is, as you all know, the American Red Cross.

To the extent possible, we have endeavored to send food and supplies into those countries not under actual military occupation, which were in need. We took the view that two assurances are required: First, arrangements which make sure that the supplies actually reach the people who need them and preferably by distribution through the American Red Cross or agencies designated by it; and second, that the effect of such supplies will not increase hunger and want elsewhere; for, of course, nothing is accomplished by shipping food and relief into an area if the only effect is to stimulate military seizures of other food and supplies within that area.

Relief of this sort has taken various forms, depending on circumstances. In some cases—Finland, for instance—loans have been made permitting purchases of food here and its shipment abroad. Shiploads of relief have been sent to unoccupied France. Other shiploads of food have been sent to Spain. Certain movements of food have been facilitated to certain of the unoccupied French colonies. Supplies were actually on the way to Greece when she was invaded.

In many cases, unhappily, the possibility of sending relief has been severely limited. The difficulties of transport and distribution have frequently been extreme. Where we have to choose, the first concern has been the sending of supplies for children, especially milk and vitamins.

Only recently, arrangements were made to send two shiploads of food to Ireland.

We have not felt that the policy of relief could be determined wholly by arguments over the question who is responsible for the distress. We realize perfectly that the forces of invasion and aggression are the direct cause of the want and hunger and starvation of great populations. It would be very easy to say that we ought simply to leave the problem to the people who are responsible for creating it. But that is not a complete answer. The populations of these countries still have to live; and in their children may very well lie the hope for a free and civilized Europe.

Instead, therefore, of asking "Who is responsible for this?", we have asked "Will the relief actually do any good? Or will it merely feed one group in one place and increase misery elsewhere by encouraging or assisting invaders or aggressors to requisition, or seize, or buy with worthless currency, or otherwise take away for themselves, food which ought to go to the populations of these countries?" If the latter happens, plainly the relief given does not assist in the slightest.

The technique of modern economic warfare has developed endless ways for draining a country dry of its essential food supplies. They can be seized to feed armies of occupation; or they can be bought with currency which the occupied country is forced to print and turn over to its invaders; or its export can be required to fulfill some barter trade agreement which has been forced on the country. In such cases, shipments of relief to the population do not assist that population unless it were possible to establish virtually an economic control system in neutral hands within the country. This is extremely difficult in time of war within military lines.

There is a widespread misconception that the food difficulties in Europe are chiefly due to the blockade. Such information as we have indicates that the chief difficulty is due to the disturbance of crops and harvests and transport and local distribution, and to the requisitioning and economic policies pursued on the Continent itself. The German Government has stated authoritatively that it does not consider that an invader has any responsibility for feeding the population of the country which it has invaded; and that it will, as a matter of course, assure that Germany will receive the benefits of whatever supplies do exist in Europe to the extent that she needs them. In the light of this, the difficulty of carrying on any effective policy of feeding in territory occupied within military lines must be sufficiently obvious.

Let me pass, for a moment, from the very grim picture in Europe to one other subject which I hope may offer a happier aspect. It is commonly said that there are great food surpluses in the Americas; and this is true.

But most of these surpluses would promptly disappear if all of the Americas were fed according to the standards which the National Nutrition Conference for Defense is here to discuss. The farmers of Canada, of the United States, and of many of the South American republics would not be worried over overseas markets if every family on the American Continent had the food which it ought to have to improve the health of the Americans of the future. The Department of Agriculture has been giving careful thought to this problem, and has been working out plans for consideration, which I hope, within the not too distant future, may offer some fascinating possibilities.

Although the United States is the best-fed country in the world, there are millions of people who do not, and some who cannot, obtain the food that they really need. This is even more true in many of the other American republics. The problem is partly one of finance, but if it were only that I am confident we could solve it in a relatively short time. Still more, it is a problem of education. Let me say that whenever the problem of education is solved. I am confident that the economic relations between the Americas are close enough so that a solution will be found to the problem of payment. In the Americas, at least, we have passed that point. Whenever the resources are there, and the need is there, we can work out ways of getting the supply to the need.

In its international aspect, the problem of proper feeding combines three great elements. The first is the scientific element—the careful analysis by groups such as yourselves of what is really needed, and the expert education of the public to insist that the need be fulfilled.

The second is economic, the working out of ways and means by which the supplies, which we know do exist, can be put in the localities where they ought to be used.

The third is sentimental, or if you like, moral, the feeling which everyone ought to have that the providence of God put these supplies in the world to be used for the strengthening of life; and that it is the job of everyone to see that they are so used.

Stimson's War Whoop

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN, NEW YORK CITY, MAY 17, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American, New York City, which appeared in the issue of May 17, 1941, under the title "Stimson's War Whoop":

[From the Gaelic American, New York, May 17, 1941]

STIMSON'S WAR WHOOP

The dogs of war are in full cry. Stimson, Knox, Hull, Emory S. Land of the Maritime Commission, Admiral Harold Stark, Senator Guffey, Senator Pepper, and Claude R. Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, are all calling for war to save, not America, but England. This concerted blitzkrieg to jockey the United States into war came nearly on the same date and was calculated to stampede America into the imperialist war of Europe. In concert with the administration's official family Lord Halifax, Anthony Eden, Premier Churchill, and other English leaders made known the danger and difficulties of England and hoped to aid their Washington friends to stampede the United States into a foreign war to save England from defeat and destruction. It cannot be said that the blitzkrieg had the desired effect.

The key speech on behalf of the administration was that of Secretary Stimson. His address was not in the interest of America. It was an unqualified appeal to jockey the United States into the present imperialist war. Not America, but England, was the first concern of Stimson. In his eagerness to create war hysteria he referred to Dakar, Africa, which is over 1,800 miles from the nearest point in the Western Hemisphere, as a jumping-off point for Nazi forces. Is not 1,800 miles a very long jump? Is not the individual who refers to it as a mere jumping-off a very simple, naive, or questionable character?

Mr. Stimson also said that the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, instead of being a barrier to the invasion of America, would in the case of the capture of the English Fleet become easy channels for attack on the United States. When the English Channel, which can be crossed by good swimmers, can hold up the invading Army of Germany, is not the broad Atlantic a much more formidable barrier? Stimson must have a very poor opinion of the intelligence of his radio audience, and it cannot be said that he has greater respect for his own reputation as a man of common sense, judgment, and veracity.

Like all the alien propagandists, their dupes and agents, Secretary Stimson asserts that America has been protected for a hundred years by England's control of the Atlantic. He does not say from what power or powers that America has been protected. Americans who are not members of the present administration family are convinced that in the past 100 years England was our only potential invader. Was it not American strength, courage, and fighting qualities that have staved off any contemplated invasion? He further states that in 1922 Britain voluntarily consented to parity between the American and English Fleets. Who made the sacrifice for the parity? Balfour was England's representative at the Washington Conference. The other delegates were like schoolboys in the hands of that astute diplomat. He was surprised when the then Secretary of State Hughes proposed parity. After the World War the United States, in ships built and building, had the largest Navy in the world, not excluding the British Navy. No wonder that Balfour was taken by surprise when Hughes stated that the United States not only would cease building warships but also promised to sink ships in course of building or projected. The outcome was that America destroyed over 800,000 tons of shipping so as to make parity with England possible.

Though Mr. Stimson talked of such generalities as democracy, language, tradition, and other vague things, he did not enlarge on the Washington Conference or bring out the fact that Balfour trimmed Hughes. For his services he was soon afterward created Lord Balfour. He well deserved the honor conferred on him by his country. He had also much to do with dragging America into the World War.

Stimson more than once talked as if our safety depended on an English victory over her enemies. He said:

"Time is the essential factor and time cannot be had if sea power is lost. Today the wide-flung forces of the British Navy are threatened in the North Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and in Malaysia. Those thinly spread forces today alone are securing to us that precious time."

Does any red-blooded American believe that his liberty is dependent on the existence of the English Navy? Has the United States been for a hundred years or more a dependency of England? When and from what enemy has England safeguarded the United States? Is England really our protector and will we lose our liberty if she is defeated? Fortunately nearly every American, outside of the administration family circle, is of the opinion—in fact he firmly believes—that his country is strong and resourceful enough to overcome any power or combination of powers from the west or the east. He also believes that any American who credits the contrary is either a fool or a knave.

The dogs of war are in full cry. Patriotism, which has been too long sleeping, must assert itself, and there is no time to wait. A powerful effort is being made to jockey us into a foreign war where no American interest is at stake and which is not worth the life of one young American.

Write to your Senators and Representatives to vote against all measures that are calculated to stampede us into war. Let the Stimsons, the Knoxes, the Hulls, the Guffeys, and the Peppers understand that they are slavish British colonials rather than virile American citizens.

A Boost for the Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ARTICLE BY CHARLES MICHELSON

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, for some time the Director of Publicity for the Democratic National Committee, Mr. Charles Michelson, has contributed a column, Dispelling the Fog, in the newspapers in my district. It is always a pleasure to read Mr. Michelson's articles, as he has done a constructive work in molding opinions for worth-while legislation. His latest release on the St. Lawrence seaway is particularly fine and very timely.

Those of another political faith will find nothing objectionable in any of his releases. His efforts, like the seaway which he so ably discusses, far transcends mere partisan politics. I recommend this editorial to all of the Members of Congress, and in passing I want publicly to commend Mr. Michelson for a task well done.

The article follows:

DISPELLING THE FOG

(By Charles Michelson, Director of Publicity, Democratic National Committee)

There is no use repining over past neglect or error, but the fact remains that had we gone ahead with the lakes-to-ocean seaway, this country would now be in vastly better shape to meet the emergency that confronts it.

When President Roosevelt asked the Senate to ratify a treaty with Canada providing for the joint construction and equipment of a deep-water St. Lawrence canal, he probably had in mind particularly the upbuilding of the western section of our country by affording a direct outlet to the sea.

As Governor of New York, he had studied that problem. He had been given the figures to show that the difference in freight rates that would result if the wheat from the Northwest could go to the world market direct, with no transshipment, would save the western farmers millions of dollars a year. In fact, it was adduced that the saving of transportation costs alone would pay what we would spend in establishing the canal in 3 years. Added to the benefit to the western farmers was the lowering of power costs to the consumers of electric power, the up-building of industries on the Great Lakes, and the increase in population of various thinly peopled States.

Administrations previous to the advent of Roosevelt to the White House had advocated the canal; party platforms, Republican as well as Democratic, had endorsed the project. Nevertheless, the Senate refused to ratify the treaty. The project had a majority, but fell short of the two-thirds vote requisite for treaty making.

Perhaps more important than any of the advantages discussed at the time, is one that comes from the present world crisis. So it is as a defense measure that the matter is now before Congress, not as a treaty but as a law, requiring the concurrence of both Houses, authorizing the project. The specific purpose is to enable the building of oceangoing ships in the lake shipyards.

"OF ALL SAD WORDS," ETC.

It is estimated that the canal could be put in operation in 3 years. Had we been in shape in 1936 to construct vessels so direfully needed, today we could have a big fleet afloat to help meet the deficit resulting from the wholesale destruction of ocean carriers by the German raiders, submarines, and bombing planes, which are taking more than half a million tons of shipping a year.

It is estimated that by this time the Navy would have been richer by approximately 100 craft—cruisers, tankers, and smaller vessels—if a few Senators had voted the other way 7 years ago.

That the vote stood 46 to 42 was due to a variety of counterarguments and a lot of influence emanating from the railroad and power lobbies. Some of the arguments had a plausible appeal. For example, it was easy to understand that the big seaport communities did not wish to lose the business of transferring the great cargoes of Western products from freight trains to ships. Likewise, the points on the Mississippi, clear down to New Orleans, feared that the diversion of the traffic via the Great Lakes would take away some of their business—barges and the like.

It was in vain that the supporters of the St. Lawrence treaty insisted that the growth of the West—the new industries that would be established and the increase in population out there—would more than make up for the trade losses to the seaports that were suggested.

It was the same sort of thing that held up the Panama Canal for decades. The railroads said that the competing traffic through the Canal would destroy them, whereas it turned out that they did more business because of the Canal, on account of the general increase in commerce and industry, than they did before.

Naturally the St. Lawrence project is meeting the same opposition that greeted the various huge power enterprises fathered by the Government—Tennessee Valley, Boulder Dam, and the rest of them. This was all brought out in the sessions precedent to the treaty vote long ago. There were, in addition, some weird suggestions, as, for example, that the St. Lawrence waterway constituted a danger to America because British warships could penetrate to the heart of America and bombard Chicago.

THE WORLD IS BEGGING FOR SHIPS

The big advantage, as far as national defense is concerned, lies in the facilities for ship construction. If this country is ever beleaguered, the shipyards a thousand miles inland obviously would be in less danger of bombing than the establishments on the seashore. Moreover, it would take much of the pressure off the shipyards that are now crowded beyond capacity; and the demand for ships now is an acute element in the national emergency. Every friend we have among the nations is clamoring for transportation to make up for the vessels alienated from commerce by the demands of the war abroad. Our present shipbuilding establishments must be monopolized practically by the vast naval expansion, with its goal of a two-ocean Navy. We had to have that because the British Fleet on which we relied—consciously or unconsciously—to take care of the Atlantic in the event of a Pacific Ocean involvement, can't be on that job now. There is the possibility even that it may never get back on the job, for nobody can be sure of what may occur in a great war.

For our own protection—perhaps for our own salvation—we must not only be the arsenal of democracy but we must insure that the things we are sending out to the powers fighting against the Hitler scheme of world domination reach their destination. A dozen Senators made us muff the ball 7 years ago, because we, like the rest of the world, did not foresee the advent of Hitlerism. Now the St. Lawrence canal is up again and probably we are going to listen to weeks of debate before Congress has an opportunity to correct that old mistake.

The same lobbies are at work as compassed the defeat of the treaty; the same arguments will be brought out about the interests of certain cities or certain regions, and the same efforts will be made to influence Senators and Representatives to heed the pleas of their home interests, rather than the national need. The answer to all of this is, of course, that if national defense is not developed to the highest point the home places might suffer a great deal more than the possible loss of some trade.

Presumably, the advisability of getting out the ships, even though we are years behind in this particular field, will give us the canal ultimately, but every day squandered in restating all the arguments, pro and con, means an additional day without something we must have. True, nobody can prophesy for certain what the state of affairs will be 3 years hence, but whatever lies ahead we are going to want those ships, and, moreover, the peace advantages of saving transportation costs, developing the West and giving the East electricity at less than the private monopoly prices, will remain. So this defense measure, at least, will give priceless value when peace comes to the world.

The Cause of General Mitchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, there has been introduced into the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin a resolution memorializing Congress to clear the name of Brig. Gen. William L. Mitchell. I am including this resolution in full in my remarks:

Whereas the late Brig. Gen. William L. Mitchell enlisted in 1898 at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War as a private in the First Wisconsin Infantry and saw active service in Cuba and the Philippine Islands; then served on the Mexican border in 1912; and was repeatedly decorated during the World War by Congress and by several of our Allies for repeated gallantry and giving exceptional example to his fellow soldiers; and

Whereas he rose from the ranks during 28 years of spectacular achievement, having been the first American officer to fly over the trenches during the World War, the first American to scout troop movements by plane, commanded the largest concentration of airplanes in the then history of aviation; and

Whereas he continued to pioneer aviation progress by proving the feasibility of transcontinental flight, as a result of which our air-mail system was instituted; and

Whereas from 1920 to 1924 he served as Assistant to the Chief of the Army Air Service, in charge of operations and technical development, in which position he contributed invaluably to the development of military and civil aeronautics; and

Whereas he strove to impress his superior officers with the shortcomings and deficiencies in the Army and Navy flying units, only to be rebuffed and demoted; and thereafter the crash of the dirigible Shenandoah and failure of Navy's flight by plane to Hawaii prompted him to charge incompetency on the part of his superiors and criminal neglect of national defense; and

Whereas, although a separate inquiry substantiated the truth of his accusations, he was tried by a court martial for violating the ninety-sixth article of war, found guilty of a breach of discipline, and suspended from the service for 5 years without pay, but still subject to call; and

Whereas the practical effect of this decision was that the pride and dignity of military officials must be protected at all costs, even at the risk of jeopardizing the effectiveness of national defense; and

Whereas General Mitchell's fearless adherence to principle resulted in his sacrificing his personal ambitions in an effort to arouse the Nation to a knowledge of its military helplessness; and

Whereas developments arising from the present European conflict demonstrate incontrovertibly that General Mitchell was possessed of prescience which placed him many years ahead of his colleagues; and

Whereas the stigma upon his memory should be officially eradicated: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to take such official action as may be necessary to clear the name of this soldier and patriot to the end that he who stood his ground, though persecuted, may be completely and forever cleared; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced by the Honorable Edward F. Hilker, of Racine, Wis., the largest city in my district. Mr. Hilker and Gen. William Mitchell were the closest of friends. They were mustered into the Army together as volunteers in the Spanish-American War in 1898, at Camp Harvey, Milwaukee, Wis. Privates Mitchell and Hilker were tentmates at the Spanish-American War camp at Jacksonville, Fla. There may be a few who knew Brig. Gen. William Mitchell better than Mr. Hilker, but I doubt it. True to the spirit of real soldiers, Assemblyman Hilker has come to the defense of his war buddy by sponsoring the resolution asking that the Congress of the United States take such action as might be necessary to clear the name of Brig. Gen. William L. Mitchell, who was a true soldier and patriot.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW ORLEANS TIMES-PICAYUNE

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Orleans Times-Picayune of June 4, 1941:

[From the Times-Picayune of June 4, 1941]

"HOBBY DAY" IN THE HOUSE

The long-buried St. Lawrence seaway scheme was formally resurrected Monday by a bill authorizing the President to negotiate with Canada to put it over. Long the favorite hobby of Mr. Roosevelt, it was beaten by the Senate in 1934 for reasons an American majority considered sound. Then, it was generally agreed that such a deal between this country and Canada must be effected by formal treaty subject to Senate ratification. Now, it is contended that the deal can be put over by simple congressional authorization. Treaty ratification requires a two-thirds majority in the Senate. Congressional authorization requires ordinary majorities. Denied senatorial ratification of its treaty form, the measure's promoter now seeks the easiest way of a simple congressional majority—though that was not considered a valid method 7 years ago.

Originally touted as a power enterprise in quarters where power is popular—and as a navigation project in circles where navigation is a political conjure word—the scheme now is dressed up and decorated as a national-defense undertaking, though it will take 5 or 6 years to complete. Under the pending dicker with Canada, there is, according to a recent report, "no obligation to complete the undertaking before December 1, 1948." The cost according to most estimates would range about or above a half billion dollars. Great numbers of laborers and vast amounts of material would have to be diverted from genuine and much more urgent defense projects if this thing were adopted as a wholly unnecessary addition to the enormous financial and physical burdens imposed upon the American people in this crisis.

Canada's people show no enthusiasm for the scheme even though the United States would pay most of the bill. For all Canada's manpower and material resources are needed in the vital war tasks; the Canadian Government yielded to President Roosevelt's insistence and acquiesced in the current dicker over the objections of many Canadian folks. The American people are showing even less enthusiasm than their Canadian neighbors do. Of the congressmen "lined up" for its support, we venture to say that few really believe the St. Lawrence seaway hobby should be put over at this time, while fewer still consider it a defense project.

In brief, the reintroduction of the St. Lawrence seaway business at this singularly inopportune time—and camouflaged as a "national defense" undertaking—impresses us as fresh evidence of the President's determination to have his own way in everything. We trust that majorities in both houses will have the courage to express the judgment and will of the American people by rejecting the costly hobby project again regardless of administration pressure.

Another High-Powered Propagandist

OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN, NEW YORK CITY, MAY 24, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Gaelic American, New York City, published May 24, 1941, and entitled "Another High-Powered Propagandist":

[From the Gaelic American, New York, May 24, 1941]

ANOTHER HIGH-POWERED PROPAGANDIST

Prime Minister Menzies, of Australia, is another high-powered propagandist who is trying to convince the American people that England's war is our war and that we should be as much interested in it as the populations of the British Empire. No longer do men like Menzies try to cloak the purpose of their insidious mission and they are coming out barefacedly for American men, money, ships, airplanes, tanks, and food. There is no limit to their needs. Prime Minister Menzies, speaking on May 13 at a dinner of the Foreign Relations Committee, at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, New York, said, in part:

"It is most unlikely that there could be any quick victory without you. That does not mean that we are asking you to send armies to fight in a war in which for many months no great army has been engaged. But it does mean that we need your help, your single-minded effort in the production of materials of war, and in the delivery of those materials to those places in which they can be most effectively used.

"But it may be that there are still many of you who believe that some decent fraction of your effort will suffice. I beg of you to understand that it will not. Whether you are neutral or belligerent—and that is for you and nobody else to decide—our cause, which is your cause, cannot be made victorious by half measures."

No Trojan horse or "fifth columnist" is half so dangerous to the peace and welfare of this country than Premier Menzies, Lord Halifax, and the scores of English propagandists who are feted and flattered by the forces of high finance. Perhaps the most outlandish claim that these foreign visitors are making is that their country is fighting for the safety of the United States. Is not the United States amply competent to safeguard its own independence from any old country enemy or combination of enemies? At present there is no enemy on the horizon and there is no likelihood of any enemy at least in the near future. It would be a poor dependence for this country to rely on England, who is not able to protect herself in her beleaguered island. Besides, in spite of the assertions of the foreign propagandists, and their native agents and aides, England is entirely concerned with her own safety and she has entered into a conflict which may be long and the result doubtful. The American who will gulp down England's statements that she is fighting our battles cannot be commended for intelligence or common sense. At least 90 percent of the American people are aware that they are able to meet any enemy or invader from the west or the east.

In this intensive appeal for American aid on the pretense that it is for our own safety the advice of George Washington in his Farewell Address against foreign entanglements should not be ignored or forgotten. We have no concern in the never-ending wars and jealousies of the Old World and the present imperialist war is not worth the life of one young American. Our frontiers are not on the English Channel, the Rhine, or Dakar. We have well-defined frontiers which are protected by the great natural barriers of the broad Atlantic and the broader Pacific. We have a large population, immense resources, and there is no reason why we should not have an army, navy, and air force strong enough to deter any would-be conqueror from even contemplating an invasion of the United States or any of the South American republics. The American who fears invasion or who believes the fantastic claim that we are now or have been in the past protected by the English Navy is not worthy of his great heritage.

Our blood and treasure must not be wasted or dissipated in an attempt to safeguard the doomed British Empire. We have a great country, almost a continent in itself, and we could thrive and prosper even if we were cut off from the rest of the world.

Let us mind our own business, develop our own great natural resources, and let the warring nations fight their own battles and settle their never-ending disputes. Never forget that our involvement in the World War was a gigantic blunder which piled up our national debt to astronomical figures. Also do not forget the ingratitude of the nations that we saved from defeat and disaster. One such blunder is enough in one generation.

Are We Going To Allow Foreign-Born Un-American Racketeers To Defy Our Government?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, since the first of this year, strikes have cost 2,253,216 man-days of production on Army contracts according to the War Department. More men were on strike yesterday, June 5, 1941, in plants trying to fill

Army orders than at any other time this year.

Time lost on naval-defense orders would have been sufficient to build 8 to 10 submarines, or 6 to 8 destroyers, or 2 cruisers, according to the Navy Department.

The situation caused by these strikes has grown steadily worse in the 10 days since President Roosevelt proclaimed an unlimited national emergency, told labor and capital that the emergency machinery set up for conciliation and mediation of industrial disputes "must be used promptly—and without stoppage of work."

And it will continue to grow still worse unless there is a firm, decisive action to make it plain that the Government is running the national-defense program and that strikes will not be permitted to wreck it.

The President's appeal has now been flouted directly by union officials in two outstanding cases. My people approved the President's message; therefore, we feel that these strikes should be stopped at once.

The North American Aviation plant at Inglewood, Calif., source of one-fifth of the country's military-plane production, was closed yesterday by the United Automobile Workers—C. I. O.—in violation of an agreement, ratified by the union membership, not to strike until the National Defense Mediation Board had been given opportunity to settle the controversy. I ask you, Are we going to continue to permit such open defiance?

The Mediation Board's recommendations for ending the Pacific Northwest lumber strike were flatly rejected by O. M. Orton, president of the International Woodworkers of America, who charged that this presidentially appointed Board was "an all-out labor-busting and strike-breaking device."

Two national officials of the C. I. O. served on the Board panel that was unanimous in making these recommendations, and Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., insisted that Orton accept them. That is evidence enough, is it not, of fairness? But Orton proclaimed his intention of following "the course adopted by John L. Lewis, of the United Mine Workers."

Lewis has publicly warned Mr. Roosevelt not to "expect too much cooperation" from labor in the defense program unless "labor"—meaning Lewis—is given more power in the Government.

As a Representative of the Seventh Congressional District of Oklahoma, I ask you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, who is running this Government—the President and Congress or John L. Lewis?

Recently an outstanding public official, while addressing a representative body in Oklahoma, said that not a Member of this House had raised his voice against John L. Lewis. I want to inform the good citizens that here is one, and I want to state further that several others, including most of the Oklahoma delegation, have raised their voices on the floor several times. I am not afraid of the C. I. O. or John L. Lewis. I was hired to represent my district, and I am going to represent the good people of my district. My people rightfully expect me to do my best to stop these strikes, which hold up our defense projects, and I shall do so.

Well, there it is. Clearly there are elements within organized labor which are determined that there shall be stoppages of work, regardless of the damage done to the defense program. Clearly Mr. Roosevelt cannot expect voluntary cooperation from these elements.

This Government—

Said the President 10 days ago—

is determined to use all of its power to express the will of its people and to prevent interference with production of materials essential to our Nation's security.

The time has come for Government to use its power or confess that the national defense is at the mercy of stubborn and defiant union bosses.

I repeat again, as I have so definitely stated in the past, that I am for 100-percent American unions, but that I am against those foreign-born, un-American racketeers who foster discontent among our laborers, holding up vital defense projects when minutes now mean days later. I am against communism, Hitlerism, or those in sympathy with such movements.

H. R. 4886 Would Escheat Dormant Funds in Banks to United States Treasury—Rightful Owners Provided Way To Ascertain Their Legal Rights to Dormant Accounts and Procedure Set Up for Them To Obtain Possession of Their Property—$100,000,000 Involved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the 27th day of May 1941 I introduced a bill providing for the disposition of unclaimed deposits in national banks. It is H. R. 4886 and has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency for consideration.

This bill was carefully drawn by the Treasury Department, and I believe that I am safe in saying that it will have the support of the Treasury. Some States now have State laws requiring publication of the names of those who have deposits that have remained dormant over a certain period of years and also the publication of the amounts of these deposits. These laws, however, affect a comparatively small number of States.

Although the bill, H. R. 4886, applies only to national banks, it is my purpose, when hearings are held before the Committee on Banking and Currency, to ascertain if it is possible to include other banks, whose deposits are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It is my personal opinion that these banks can be legally included, and it is my purpose to ask that they be included.

The American Banker, a daily banking publication, June 5, 1941, carried the following article relative to this bill:

WASHINGTON, June 4.—A bill, having important Treasury support, has been introduced by Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Texas, to provide for the disposition of unclaimed deposits in national banks.

While no official figures are available as to the amount of such deposits in national banks, Representative PATMAN estimates that approximately $100,000,000, at least, would be recovered by the Treasury under the terms of the bill.

The Patman bill has been through the Legal Division of the Treasury Department and, it is indicated, is an improvement over all previous bills which have been offered during recent years.

WOULD BEGIN IN 1942

In brief, the measure provides that on January 30 of each year, beginning with 1942, each national bank shall attempt to reach all depositors of dormant accounts, calling attention to the provisions of the law.

During March of each year, newspapers will carry at least once a week for 3 weeks a notice calling attention to the provisions of this act, in a form which is to be prescribed.

Between June 30 and July 30 of each year every national bank shall deposit with the Treasury "an amount equal to the amount of each unclaimed deposit which appeared on the books of the bank on January 1 of such year, together with an amount equal to the amount of accrued interest on such deposit to such June 30."

National banks are required to file with the Secretary the number of new unclaimed deposits which the bank has on each January 1 and those for which valid claims were filed between January 1 and June 30, with names of individuals filing these claims.

The banks are absolved from paying interest on June 30 of the year in which funds have been transferred to the Treasury. Further, the amount placed with the Treasury as unclaimed funds "shall not be included in arriving at the assessment base of such bank for insurance purposes." Also, such funds are not to be included in the aggregate amount of demand and time deposits for determining reserve balances.

TREASURY WOULD ISSUE LIST

With the funds placed with the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury would be required to prepare a list of unclaimed deposits, showing the name and location of the bank and amount and last known address of the depositor. Such lists will be published and will be available for inspection and may be cumulative from year to year under Treasury regulations.

It is provided that banks and individuals may make application, or through proper courts, to satisfy claims, but the Secretary is not obligated to pay costs, expenses, or fees to establish such claims.

It is specifically provided that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall have the privilege of recovering "an amount sufficient to reimburse" it for the total amount paid by the F. D. I. C. on account of old unclaimed deposits in any national banks.

Other rules and regulations may be issued by the Treasury to carry out the necessary purposes of the law, and annual reports are required by the Secretary.

"DEPOSIT" DEFINED

An interesting feature of this bill is the definition of what constitutes a "deposit." It states that the term "deposit" means "the unpaid balance of money or its equivalent received by a bank in the usual course of business and for which it has given or is obligated to give credit to a commercial, checking, savings, time, or thrift account, or which is evidenced by its certificate of deposit, together with such other obligations of a bank as the board of directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall find and shall prescribe by its regulations to be deposit liabilities by general usage."

Is It Necessary?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE LOS ANGELES TIMES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of inserting in today's RECORD an editorial from the Los Angeles Times, under date of May 31, 1941, on the subject Is It Necessary?

This pertains to gasless Sundays, and so forth, advocated by Mr. Ickes.

This kind of a program does not sit very well with my people in California, and I believe with those in Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, and other oil-producing States. For the last 10 years, owners of producing wells have not been able to operate these wells to their capacity because they have been operating under the curtailment program based upon the theory that there was too much production. They feel that they were wrongly advised then or are wrongly advised now, and that, further, Mr. Ickes is only using this situation politically to obtain that position which he has so long coveted, as czar over oil production.

The editorial follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times of May 31, 1941]

IS IT NECESSARY?

Gasless Sundays, daylight saving, darkened places of night entertainment are all right with the patriotic citizens of this country if actual need for such recourse should appear. Thinking people, however, will want more than the word of Secretary Ickes that the need exists. They will at least want to know that this particular Cabinet member is speaking with Presidential authority and not merely for the enjoyment of hearing himself talk, as he has done so often in the past.

Gas rationing would seem to be something that might be postponed until the present shipments of this fuel to Japan and Russia have been stopped; there is certainly no justification for defense curtailment of domestic supplies while oil products are going to doubtful nations and indirectly helping the very powers suspected of aggressive designs against our hemisphere. With regard to the Ickes argument that tanker transportation facilities may be lacking to take oil to the Atlantic seaboard, it need only be pointed out that the railroads have shown no sign of bogging down.

Daylight saving is old stuff in the East, has ere this been resorted to in that part of the country as an economic measure. It has yet to be demonstrated that it would serve any useful purpose in our part of the Nation. We tried it in another critical period and found it wanting in effectiveness for desired results. Our western days will serve for whatever accomplishment without any clock tinkering.

We also have an abundance of water for generating electricity and the hydroelectric plants for making use of it; we can supply industry and homes and have plenty of "juice" left for the night baseball Mr. Ickes objects to. We would be as willing as anybody to sit in the dark if it should come to a pass where defense consumption was even remotely threatened, but we would prefer light in the meantime.

There is such a thing as carrying the grandstand plays too far. Common sense shows that the real approach to defense efficiency at this time is the prompt elimination of the strikes that are hampering production. It's the manpower, rather than the electric power, that is facing serious shortage right now in most defense-industry centers.

Catholic Laymen in the Present Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY, OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by me on Catholic Laymen in the Present Crisis delivered May 25, 1941, before Newman Club of Pennsylvania College of Optometry, at Oaklawn Review Club, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Just a month ago today I returned from my home in Rhode Island to the Capitol, and, because it was necessary that I get back in a hurry, I went by plane. The ride was very bumpy, and, as it was my first experience, I inquired of the copilot the reason for such a performance. He explained that it was caused by air currents forced up from the earth, some hot and some cold.

As I gazed over the countryside of Jersey and Pennsylvania, I could not help but think how much similar to that situation was the state of mind of most men throughout the country.

Today, perhaps more than at any time in the history of our Nation, our minds are confused by the constant parade of hot exclamations and cold threats of doom. On one hand we are reminded of the glorious history of our Nation, a history having its full share of heartaches, blood, and tears, and, on the other hand, we are threatened with dire consequences if we hesitate to put that history and all the accomplishments of 165 years in pawn in order to change existing conditions on a foreign continent which has been steeped in the blood of warring armies since the dawn of time.

That we face a very serious crisis there can be no question; that we are facing that crisis with the proper frame of mind and viewing it in the proper perspective can be seriously questioned.

A sick man, if he desires recovery, will follow the advice of his physician and take the medicine prescribed for the cure of his ailment. We, as a group of Catholic laymen, should bend our every effort to encourage the willing reception of the advice prescribed by the greatest of all physicians to the social order—our Holy Mother Church. For the establishment of fair play among all men, for the founding and maintenance of peace throughout the world, the saintly Leo XIII, in his justly famous encyclical, Rerum Novarum, laid down the formula, 50 years ago this month, when he said, "Since religion alone can destroy the evil at its root, all men must be persuaded that the primary thing needful is to return to real Christianity, in the absence of which all the plans and devices of the wisest will be of little avail."

There are those men in the world who attach very little importance to the teaching of that great work and by their slander of the doctrine it propounded, display ignorance of its true import. It is toward the enlightenment of such men that our efforts must be directed if we are to prove ourselves worthy of our Catholic heritage and if we are to contribute any share, though but a small one, to the eradication of that confusion of mind which now hampers our great Nation in the work of fulfilling its mightiest effort.

We have today, in this Nation of which we are so proud, a malignant growth which threatens to destroy every sinew and fiber of our country's greatness; a menace, which by holding out the false promise of a Utopia, dupes men's minds and hopes, in the confusion and destruction of manhood which it leaves in its wake, to bring about a so-called social order, which would be the direct antithesis of everything which America represents to you and to me.

Shunning the light of day; skulking behind false promises of equality, fraternity, and a redistribution of wealth, this growth robs men of liberty, steals from human nature the cloak of dignity and binds men's souls with chains of bondage.

The home, family, and Christian morals are things to be scorned while hysterical rantings of civil liberties are depended on to lull the people of the Nation into a false sense of security; prompting them to rest on their questionable laurels and do nothing to prevent the growth of this corrupt monster, communism.

This symbol of treachery and deceit, together with nazi-ism and fascism, if allowed to exist and grow in America, will some day bring us all to our knees without the need of any invasion by a foreign power. Communism, nazi-ism, and fascism are all evils born of the same spew. They have but one reason for being and one purpose of continuing. Their goal is atheism and their motivating force is a hatred of God.

We should put first things first—and our primary concern should be the destruction of this evil influence which is beyond doubt far more menacing than any enemy America faces from beyond the seas. It would profit us nothing if we were to embark upon a war of conquest and bring to their knees every nation on God's green footstool, if we were so blind as to pass by the vultures at home who only stand by, hoping to seize upon the opportune moment, when a war-weary world sinks into the slumbers of a false feeling of peace, and gobble up the last semblance of freedom and liberty and reduce this Nation, the real bulwark of democracy, to a land of slaves.

The real battle we must wage, until there is no shadow of doubt concerning our victory, is the one against subversive influences who are determined to undermine our homes and set brother against brother; the battleground is the streets of our cities and the doorways of our homes. Our shibboleth is Christ, and the sustaining force which will guide us to ultimate victory is the soul of a free Christian man.

Charity, it is true, is a noble virtue. Our expressions of sympathy are not subject to criticism, and we cannot be blamed for doing and sacrificing in order to help suffering people wherever they may be found. But when charity or sympathy loses its sight and common sense ceases to prevail, then we must pause; for the cause must indeed be great to justify the sacrifice of our home, our men, and our freedom.

In this hour of great concern to the future of our Nation, I say to you men, it is our duty to inquire, "Whither are we led?" We have not only a right, but a duty, to determine, before we take any further steps to plunge this Republic into the maelstrom of European war, what manner of peace is offered us in return for sending the cream of our youth to fight and die in lands beyond the seas. If we are not to know what those terms are to be, then to ask us to go is to ask America to underwrite every future European conflict, and, if that is the plan, then we should be aware of it in advance. Our only alternative is to establish in Europe, after hostilities have ceased, a peace of our own making, and maintain an army there to enforce it.

I ask you to go to those who would have us send our men across the ocean, if they satisfy you that we need never again go to Europe, that we need not join any European confederacy of nations, that we need not forever maintain a great army of men and machines, ever ready to police the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, then, I say, they have a just cause.

We have no craving for empire; we have only a determination to preserve intact this great Republic, earth's noblest monument to God's handiwork. In that determination we have justice and wisdom on our side. To depart from that plan of justice and wisdom to go chasing bogeymen all over the world is to invite the destruction of the institutions which we pride as freemen—freedom of speech and the right to worship our God according to the dictates of our conscience. Our civil liberties, our progress, our democracy, in short, America as we know it, will live or die, according to how we act here in America, and not as we or others may act on any foreign soil.

Tyrants and militarists have walked the stage of Europe since the beginning of time. Tamerlaine, Alexander, Frederick the Great, and their spawn have come and gone, and the teachings of the Catholic Church still stand in their original brilliance as the lodestar for men's actions. The numbers who rally to membership in the church grow greater day by day, and we see no sign on the horizon which indicates that her term of life is waning. To quote the great Macaulay, "She saw the commencement of all governments and of all the ecclesiastical establishments that now exist in the world; and we feel no assurance that she is not destined to see the end of them all. She was great and respected before the Saxon set foot on Britain, before the Frank had passed the Rhine, when Grecian eloquence still flourished in Antioch, when idols were still worshiped in the temple of Mecca. And she may still exist in undiminished vigor when some traveler from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a great solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of the London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

You men have educated minds; your task is the greater therefor. You men by your association here as a Newman Club, by your reception of the Blessed Sacrament, not in some furtive fashion but in a body, as a boast of your pride in your priceless heritage, are demonstrating your sincere endeavor to be worthy of the teachings of your great patron, and your purpose to travel life's causeway with a humble and contrite heart, secure in the knowledge that the doctrine set forth by our Holy Mother Church is right, fortified by the grace of God as a reward for a clean life; and determined to teach other men, by the example which you shall set, the value of charity—the mistress and queen of all virtues.

As Catholics we can be of real help to the people of the country who have been presented with an opportunity to show their capacity for self-government. We can help prove that the people of this Nation who have led the way on the road of progress will be the jealous guardians of freedom. They will not be misled by appeals to their cupidity or frightened by threats of injury. They will jealously guard and keep trimmed the lamp of enlightenment and progress. They will relentlessly work to stamp out these accursed "isms" which sap our strength; and when this wave of hysteria will have passed the foundations of this Republic will remain undisturbed.

This Nation, pray God, will still shelter a people indissolubly welded to liberty and honor, determined to forbid any distinction of burden or privilege, maintaining morality, turning its face in prayer for the aid of its creator, and pledging, in all humility, its fealty to Almighty God.

The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart,
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget.

What Would a Hitler Victory Mean to Americans, and What Should We Do?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

EDITORIAL BY DR. CLARENCE POE, EDITOR OF THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am placing in the RECORD a very able editorial appearing in the June issue of the Progressive Farmer, one of the outstanding farm journals of America, by its editor, Dr. Clarence Poe:

[From the Progressive Farmer of June 1941]

The first young man from Longview Farm called to service by our Federal Government has now gone off to camp. How many more will go before the emergency ends, or how far-reaching will be the demands upon them, no one can now forecast. And on hundreds of thousands of other farms from the Potomac to the Rio Grande a similar situation exists.

It had not been my intention, however, to make this the subject of my June talk to Progressive Farmer families. I had another topic in mind and had begun work on it when a letter came to me, a letter from an 18-year-old boy in Runnels County, Tex., so poignant in its appeal for action to keep America from going to war that no one could fail to be touched by it, and least of all a father of two sons both within the ages officially specified for military service. And how I would to God the issues were simple enough for me just to answer as flatfootedly as I did when I wrote that title for Otis Clark's war diary, "War Is Hell; Let's Stay Out of It."

WAR SHOULD HAVE BEEN PREVENTED

No one has dreaded this war more than I or prayed more earnestly that America might justifiably keep out. Repeatedly, year after year, I have sounded the warning given in the title I wrote for this page 4 years ago, "The World Drifts Toward Disaster; Patriotism Not Enough:"

"The sublimest sentence that came out of the World War was probably the declaration of Edith Cavell, the English nurse, just before she was shot as a spy: 'Patriotism is not enough.' She saw the whole world become a slaughterhouse simply because citizens of every nation had been taught to think only of that nation's own selfish interests. * * * America's selfish isolation, our unwillingness to help other nations establish a World Court and a League of Nations for adjusting international disputes, may engulf us in another world conflict. * * * We can never have enduring peace and security in our own country—and perhaps in the view of the Almighty God we simply never ought to have—until we are willing to cooperate with other nations to help insure peace and security the world over."

And not only have I criticized America for 20 years for failing to take steps to preserve international peace, but I have criticized England and France also—so much so that when war came I felt they deserved mighty little sympathy from America. This war was unnecessary. It should have been prevented. Nevertheless it is here, and our only practical question is "What should America do about it?"

IS WORLD DOMINATION POSSIBLE?

It would be a great comfort to me now if candor and courage would permit me to look at both sides and say they are so much alike it doesn't matter which wins, or that no matter which wins, the peace and safety of the United States will not be endangered, or that if Hitler and his allies win, it will at least be a short-lived triumph.

Unfortunately I cannot now believe any of these things. Since the present war began, some of the most amazing and stupendous events in human history have occurred, and no man in his senses can fail to have learned from them.

I thought at first that Hitlerism might be kept fairly well within Germany itself and that soon the German people might reform it or abandon it; at any rate, that they had a right to make their own experiments with it and that we might safely let them do so. That is no longer the situation. Not only have I seen Hitler bluff, bully or butcher practically all Europe into submission, but make a league with Japan—Japan, bitterly anti-American, and with the most powerful army and navy in Asia—and there seems every reason to believe that Hitler, Japan, and Mussolini hope first to conquer and divide the British Empire, and then to dominate the world. Talk of such domination when this war began I confess sounded fantastic. Now it is no longer fantastic. Such domination was not possible before the machine age. But the machine age has made it possible. And without powerful and immediate American aid to Britain, such domination becomes not only a possibility but perhaps a probability.

WOULD HITLER MENACE AMERICAN PEACE?

I also thought at first that, even with Hitler victorious, the United States might be spared from his defiance, in view of the separating oceans and our economic and military strength. I can no longer comfort myself with this belief. No conqueror ever lets up while riding any tide of victory. When Alexander's triumph brought him to the end of the known world, he merely "wept that there were no more worlds to conquer." Hitler would not need to attack New York or Boston or New Orleans. For a hundred years, the very cornerstone of America's foreign policy has been the Monroe Doctrine, prohibiting foreign conquest of South America. A victorious tiger tribe, Germany, Italy, Japan, gorging on the spoils of the British Empire, might next challenge us in the Philippines, Hawaii, or Alaska, and would inevitably defy the Monroe Doctrine in South America.

Much against my will and desire, the facing of all these facts has convinced me that we cannot keep peace with a victorious Hitlerism; that we must either help conquer it or submit to it. And because I hate war with all my soul, I prefer to help conquer Hitlerism rather than submit. For with Hitler's glorification of war and of Germany's warriors as the only "master race" fit to subdue and rule all other peoples, his victory might entrench the war system on this earth for a thousand years. Only in the triumph of England, Canada, Australia, America—democracies in which the people themselves blunderingly but progressively struggle toward the good and whose Governments must now at last see the inescapable necessity for some supreme court of nations with power to enforce its decrees—only in their triumph do I see any hope for peace or justice on the earth. For all the democracies, including America, I believe, have at last learned that they must cooperate to this end.

THE MACHINE AGE BRINGS NEW PERILS

Adolf Hitler has done this one thing no one else has ever been able to do—he has fully brought the machine age to warfare. While other warriors have had armies of men, Hitler has not only armies of men but also armies of machines—tanks, airplanes, bombers, submarines, flame-throwers, etc. No other warrior has ever had machines in such colossal numbers, of such gigantic power, of such lightning-like speed. And let's remember this: His armies of machines have not only enabled him (1) to conquer unready nations more speedily than ever before, but also (2) to disarm every people he conquers and keep them in subjection perhaps for generations or centuries to come. "How?" do you ask. And again the answer must be, the machine age. In the days when war was made by clubs and swords and muskets, it was often possible for conquered peoples to hide or smuggle enough weapons to successfully revolt—but such weapons are as powerless as popguns against the monster tanks, bombers, and airplanes of today. With seeming accuracy Hitler is quoted as saying:

"For me there is only the physical and psychological extermination of the enemy. * * * Today science puts at our disposal the means to destroy a people physically and psychologically. * * * and we have the technical equipment to scatter whole peoples throughout the world and thereby distintegrate them."

TOO LITTLE AND TOO LATE

Many and many a God-given liberty we have heretofore enjoyed in America without even taking thought as to their preciousness—the liberty to think, to speak, to print, to vote, and to worship with no one to molest us or make us afraid. We must now not only prize these liberties, but be ready if necessary to fight for their preservation.

When this world struggle ends, it will find either Germany or America incomparably the most powerful nation on this planet. If that supreme nation is a Hitler-dominated Germany, then a war machine more powerful than humanity has ever known will hold the rest of the world in subjection, with the destruction of free speech, a free press, free courts, free churches, and free elections—the destruction of all these freedoms in every conquered nation (as Hitler has already destroyed these things for the German people themselves) * * * a condition so hellish as to make life intolerable for anyone who prizes liberty or the dignity of the individual human soul.

Perhaps the most stupendous question our generation in America will ever confront is the question as to whether we shall now do "too little and too late" (as so many once-free nations have done) whatever is necessary to save our Nation and our world from a new dark age which might keep the human spirit in bondage to force and terrorism for a thousand years.

I had a letter the other day from a woman who has only one son (in fact, only one child) and he may soon be called into service, and I had expected she would be grief-stricken if not actually bitter over the prospect. But instead she said:

"At first I went through a stage of frantic inner protest, but I have now come to see that every man must accept the conditions of his generation, and I should not, and do not, ask any more for my son than the common lot."

I have heard the calm and determined spirit of America speaking in similar tones on Longview Farm. And I believe this is fast becoming the mood of our Nation as a whole. The one supreme duty of every generation is to make the condition of life better or nobler for succeeding generations. Accepting this heroic test, the one way to have peace in our own hearts in an hour like this is to ask God where our duty lies, and then unflinchingly "follow the gleam."

Power and Aluminum Shortages in Relation to National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, the morning paper carries a headline—

O. P. M. disavows Kellogg's stand on power.

The article refers to a statement, recently made by the chief power adviser of the O. P. M., that no shortage was to be expected in electric power. Mr. Kellogg's carefully prepared and subtly calculated statement was certainly not intended to strengthen the national-defense program but very definitely framed to help the private-utility companies.

The Washington Post, on May 26, carried a headline—

Seventeen States act in defense-power crisis.

That article explains the actual power shortage in the Southeast, owing to an unprecedented drought. On June 4 a Washington paper carried a front-page news article about the happenings in the Senate Defense Investigating Committee in relation to the statement of Mr. Stacy May, Statistical Chief of O. P. M., who pointed out the delays and shortcomings in the defense program. One of the Senators heatedly demanded to know whether those responsible for these delays and shortcomings were still official advisers of the Government. Mr. Speaker, I can testify from my personal experience that those officials whose judgment has resulted in these grievous and serious delays are still official advisers of O. P. M. I refer to Mr. Gano Dunn, Mr. C. W. Kellogg, and Mr. Grenville Holden. I am not familiar with the steel situation and the dangerous shortage on which Mr. Dunn made a widely publicized revised report showing that the needs had been definitely underestimated. However, I do know definitely about the power and aluminum situation, and I desire to place in the RECORD a brief reference to my experience, which has convinced me that the advisory program in relation to these two matters is not in the best hands.

Those who accept technical responsibilities in this tragic hour should be competent and trustworthy. I have not found this to be true in connection with power and aluminum in several governmental offices.

POWER SHORTAGE APPARENT IN 1938

Bonneville project on the Columbia River has been in the process of construction for over 7 years. Early in 1938 a competent and trustworthy engineer, who is in official capacity in the Government, called my attention to the serious power shortage which would be felt in case of need of national defense. I immediately urged this upon Department officials and received no encouragement in regard to the necessary expansion, and found no interest whatsoever in connection with a possible power shortage under a defense program. I helped to secure the cooperation of my informed colleagues from the Pacific Northwest in obtaining funds for immediate installation of additional generators in the unfinished Bonneville project. I found the Army engineers informed and cooperative. They are building the project. Otherwise my importunities resembled only the proverbial voice crying in the wilderness.

POWER NECESSITIES FOR DEFENSE OUTLINED IN 1939

On March 3, 1939, I brought the matter to the attention of this House in a speech entitled "Pacific Northwest Power Resources in Relation to the National Defense Program." I discussed the power shortage during the World War; the necessity for the wide distribution of the defense supply of power, rather than concentration in a single area or in limited areas; emphasized the necessity for speeding construction at Bonneville; definitely stated that the present private power capacity is "obsolete," and that the new plant installations of private utilities had been negligible. I further explained the futility of depending upon steam capacity which would consume the nation's coal needed for other defense purposes. It was made clear that the deficiency of capacity was due to speculative and destructive methods of private utility holding companies. I quote briefly from the introduction to that speech:

The development of modern production methods has sharply inclined toward electrochemical processes. These processes are so dependent on abundant power that it can safely be said that power has become the indispensable base of wartime supply. This statement does not apply to any one group of necessary materials, but covers the entire field of such production.

In the speech of March 3, 1939, I pointed out that a minimum reserve pool of 250,000 kilowatts should be provided in the Northwest to take care of defense requirements, based on the experiences of the last World War.

Mr. Speaker, it is amazing and terrifying to me that the country is accepting at this time the advice and leadership of technical men who could not see or would not admit what was so clearly pointed out by me at that time.

ALUMINUM SHORTAGE AND ALCOA

On March 3, 1941, I again besought the Congress and public men to take some action on this matter, specifically in relation to the aluminum supply. I quote from my speech of that date:

The history of the Alcoa during this emergency and its acts in the name of defense will some day be written in full. Speaking briefly, I can truthfully say that it has sought to extend throughout the country its existing power monopolies. Quietly and efficiently it has gone about this project, working through its allies in the defense set-up. First, there was utter denial of any aluminum shortage. Only 6 months ago this was made to me personally when I sought to extend the use of Bonneville power for the defense program.

Because the whole country now senses the critical situation in regard to aluminum and magnesium, I desire to make a matter of record my experience in fruitlessly endeavoring to secure the cooperation of the present O. P. M. advisers in warding off this dangerous shortage, which so disastrously affects our important air program.

EFFORTS TO INCREASE LIGHT METAL PRODUCTION

On July 13, 1940, upon the advice of a competent and reliable engineer, a northwest group decided that the probable aluminum shortage must be called to the attention of O. P. M. Senators BONE and HOLMAN and Representatives LEAVY and myself called upon Chairman Stettinius to make the suggestion that the Columbia River power be immediately put to work on the production of light metals in the interest of defense. Mr. Stettinius stated that he thought that the needs were adequately cared for, so far as these metals were concerned. He promised to send his technical advisers for further conference. Accordingly, a meeting was called in Senator HOLMAN'S office on July 15, 1940. Attending this meeting were Senators MCNARY and HOLMAN, Representatives LEAVY and myself, a representative from Senator BONE'S office, and the Washington representative of the Bonneville project. Those appearing for O. P. M. as advisers of Mr. Stettinius were Mr. Gano Dunn, Mr. W. L. Batt, Mr. Grenville Holden, and Dr. C. K. Leith. It was understood by the group that Mr. C. W. Kellogg, of the Edison Electric Institute, was the official adviser on power who had so seriously misjudged the situation. The congressional delegation pressed for the immediate utilization of the Columbia River power for the production of light metals.

The O. P. M. representatives countered with the statement that there were sufficient supplies of these metals and that there was no justification of further utilization of Bonneville power in their production.

Mr. Speaker, I so resented the neglectful and careless attitude of O. P. M. advisers that I constantly brought it to the attention of the public and this House. In that connection I again quote briefly from my speech of March 3, 1941:

The managing director of the Edison Institute is, during the emergency, conveniently located in Washington, directing defense expenditures running into the billions and dictating policies favorable to monopoly. He might well be called and questioned as to the extent to which power policies formulated by Congress are being circumvented under the guise of national defense.

POWER AND LIGHT METALS—THE AXIS OUTSTRIPS US

Anyone who can use power statistics could figure out the relative light-metal productive capacity of the Axis Powers, as there is direct relationship between the available capacity of such water-power plants and aluminum or light-metal tonnage. To produce a ton of light metals, either aluminum or magnesium, it takes approximately 2 kilowatts of power working continuously for 1 year. Therefore, dividing the available capacity by 2 gives the equivalent tonnage.

At the time the delegation called on Mr. Stettinius in July 1940, the hydro capacity of the United States applied to aluminum production was on the order of 425,000 kilowatts. Japan and Germany each had approximately the same capacity. With the acquisition of the output of France, Switzerland, Norway, and Italy, the light-metal capacity of the Axis Powers became three times as great as that of the United States. Mr. Speaker, why has it been impossible, up to this time, to secure the attention of the departments and the O. P. M. to this vitally important fact?

Until the Vultee strike in December 1940, the Defense Commission, in press releases, contended that we had adequate supplies of aluminum. In the meantime, Alcoa had contracted for an additional 100,000 kilowatts of Bonneville capacity.

As late as the middle of January 1941, Admiral Towers, of the Naval Air Corps, testified before the House Naval Affairs Committee that the supply of aluminum was adequate. The only ones who have been correct in this very critical situation, in all the Government circles, are those who comprise the Oregon and Washington congressional delegations and their engineer advisor. In spite of the clearly apparent situation, the departments did not take the lead in pressing for additional generators at Bonneville. In March and April 1940 this delegation fully realized the situation and was responsible for congressional authorization of units 7 to 10, inclusive, at Bonneville and the acceleration of units 5 and 6.

It is indeed fortunate for the country that Congress followed the leadership of the Pacific Northwest and provided aluminum producing capacity equal to 65 percent of the total 1940 production. It now appears that the Defense Commission, as late as February 1941, was estimating on a basis of about 890,000 kilowatts, while the Axis Powers, in their own and conquered territory, had nearly doubled that amount. I also called attention to this situation when testifying before the House Interior Appropriations Committee in March 1941.

ALCOA DEFIES THE GOVERNMENT

The June 7, 1941, issue of The Nation contains an article by its correspondent, Mr. Jonathan Daniels, which cites the applications of the Aluminum Co. of America to the Federal Power Commission for various rights to develop hydro power in streams in the Southeast. Apparently this power was not developed because the Power Commission demanded that Alcoa should accept the provisions of Federal law. The F. P. C. definitely commented upon Alcoa's complete unwillingness to accept these provisions. I quote from that article:

But it is not very pleasant in the dark to contemplate the fact that the sacrifice is not made to serve Uncle Sam alone but to help Uncle Sam save the Aluminum Co. from the effects of its own declaration—before defense and in the midst of it—that it would produce no more power if, in producing it, it had to abide by Federal law.

Incidentally, this same issue of The Nation comments upon the errors of Mr. Gano Dunn, O. P. M. engineer, in estimating the steel production needs. It also relates the efforts to increase and pool power production in the Southeast in order to cope with the results of the drought. In the Pacific Northwest there is no drought, and there is continuous and ample water supply. Power is furnished by the greatest power stream on the North American Continent. It has an unfailing supply of water for power, and projects are operating and expanding at Bonneville and Grand Coulee. Consent of Congress is all that is needed to add Umatilla Dam on the Columbia, completing the Coulee program by providing navigation, and augmenting the Government's hydro capacity with a stable and strategically located additional supply of power.

I demand to be informed why it is necessary to use coal and to make the people sacrifice necessities of life in order to locate great defense industries in sections in which there is a definite power shortage.

I would like to be told why it was necessary to spend a million dollars of Government money to build a Bonneville transmission line in order to locate a pressingly needed aluminum plant with an eye to salvaging a real-estate investment rather than for the purpose of rescuing our air program which is definitely in jeopardy.

I also suggest that the O. P. M. secure more competent advisers on power and light metals. Our air-defense program is seriously menaced by the proven incompetence of its staff. I am convinced that a joint congressional committee should be appointed to keep in close touch with defense activities and to inform the Congress. I believe the Congress still has a function to perform in this Government.

Is America Flying Blind?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ARTICLE BY MAJ. ALEXANDER P. DE SEVERSKY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article taken from the current issue of Coronet, entitled "Is America Flying Blind?" The author, Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, is one of the most brilliant and authoritative in aviation. I agree with the opinion expressed in the article, and hope we shall set up a separate air force. Air power must be concentrated under one responsible head for an economical development of the proper hitting force we need.

The article follows:

IS AMERICA FLYING BLIND?

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky)

THERE IS NEITHER SENSE NOR SAFETY IN SUBORDINATING OUR AIR FORCE TO THE MORE OLD-FASHIONED METHODS OF WARFARE

The widespread popular delusion that the world was caught unawares by the terrific effectiveness of Nazi Germany's air force provides a conforming alibi for humiliating defeats. Only it happens to be wholly untrue. The fact is, Hitler has not thrown into action a single aircraft model or unfolded a single principle of aviation warfare which had not been thoroughly familiar to aeronautical experts of all other nations long before the outbreak of the war.

I had myself inspected Nazi aviation but a few months before Poland was attacked. The Germans showed me their Stuka dive bombers, their swiftest pursuits, and their horizontal bombers. The Nazis imposed no restrictions on us in conveying our observations to the outside world. They had no need to do so—all German types had been on display repeatedly at international aeronautical shows and had been fully described in the aviation press of all countries. Moreover, the progress of the Nazi Luftwaffe had been continuously reported to other governments by their military observers in Germany.

Why, then, were other nations so dismally unprepared to meet the German onslaught from the air? Certainly not because they lacked aviation brains equal to the challenge. The great strides made by the British aeronautical industry under stress of war, and the impressive progress being registered at long last by some American aircraft builders, prove that there was no dearth of designing talent.

The answer to the mystery must be sought in the mentality of nations. By this time it is clear that they were, each in its own fashion, afflicted by a species of psychological paralysis.

France had been hypnotized by a fatalistic reliance on its Maginot line and its faith in "the world's finest army." Even in that long interval after German aviation had demonstrated its power in the devastation of Poland, France continued to ignore the obvious.

England, similarly, had been leaning back complacently on faith in its glorious and impregnable navy. Hypnotized by tradition, she found it literally impossible even to imagine a crucial battle in which the navy would be little more than a helpless onlooker—the kind of all-air battle, that is to say, which has actually been under way now for almost 8 months.

And it is likewise in psychological factors that we discover the real explanation for the dismal backwardness of military aviation in America. The fact alone that our commercial aeronautics is the world's best indicates that the military lag cannot be blamed on lack of aviation talent. The simple truth is that America has been lulled into a complacent sense of safety by its two oceans. That has been—and unfortunately remains today—the American equivalent of the "Maginot mentality" in France. Unless overcome quickly, it holds the threat of the same kind of disaster.

There can be no reason in logic why, if we built warplanes at all, they should have been below the standards of performance technically possible at the time of their design and construction. The absence of immediate danger of war or foreign invasion might justify the maintenance of a skeleton air power rather than a full-sized one. But it decidedly did not justify the inferiority in the quality of aircraft. Even if we had only one airplane, it should have been at least the equal of any extant.

But while the public may have been startled by recent disclosures about the shortcomings of American aircraft under conditions of actual warfare, aviation people were not. They had known all along, for instance, that American pursuits had neither the armor nor the armament to match the British Hurricanes and Spitfires or the German Messerschmidts and Heinkels. They had known, to cite an even more striking example, that our so-called flying fortresses lacked the very essential of a fortress, which is adequate defensive ability.

The American people have a real cause for complaint. They had for years been lulled into thinking that our military aviation was not only on a par with others, but even better. In the face of reports by American observers about the obvious superiority of European air forces, a national magazine of millionfold circulation, for instance, continued to boast, parrotlike, that "Our own war birds are best."

It is about time we stopped bragging about our aeronautical superiority. Every champion who underestimates his challenger loses his crown. The more sensible course is to overestimate our potential opponents and to be ready to meet strength with greater strength. If we persist in continuing to live in a fool's paradise of self-congratulation, there is nothing ahead of us but humiliation at the hands of our enemies.

Hard-pressed Great Britain welcomed anything she could get. Desperate men trying to reach shore in a leaky boat are grateful for broomsticks and handkerchiefs, though they need oars and sails. The British are carrying on gamely without complaint and without quarreling over spilt milk. Until the night fighter, now in an experimental stage, becomes fully effective, the American flying fortresses may prove useful in nighttime bombing, when the shroud of darkness makes up for inadequate defensive equipment. Our pursuits have given a good account of themselves apparently in the Mediterranean area, as long as they were pitted against inferior Italian aviation. But the fact remains, all the same, that these planes were far below the standards of performance established by other nations.

Our failure, in short, was not technical but psychological. It can be traced to a basic refusal in high quarters to acknowledge the crucial role of aviation in modern warfare. That, in turn, has kept American military aviation tied into an organizational set-up that prevents its natural development. It is as though a fine-mettled race horse were yoked together with a pair of oxen and expected to compete against horses without such encumbrance.

The fact is that aviation designers have, for years, made specific and detailed proposals to our military authorities for increasing the fire power, the armor, and other elements in our fighting planes since demonstrated as indispensable. Such proposals were pigeonholed almost automatically, because they failed to touch the imagination of men conditioned to thinking only in terms of surface fighting. My own files, for instance, hold a series of such proposals, which were not only arbitrarily rejected but ridiculed by a high military authority.

Our military aircraft have also been seriously handicapped by what we might call our luxury complex. Because air defense seemed, to the naval and infantry people in control of it, an indulgence rather than a critical necessity, we have built into our fighting planes many comforts and super-safety provisions at the expense of combat efficiency. For instance, after an unfortunate freak accident, where a pilot was killed when his airplane turned over in landing, all our tactical airplanes were built with huge towers, like reinforced greenhouses, directly behind the pilot's head—at a cost of additional weight and reduction in speed. Our gallant military pilots, whose safety was directly concerned by this change, objected to these encumbrances. After all, under fighting conditions, the pilot's ultimate safety depends on the performance of his machine rather than the luxury of its construction and excessive margins of safety. Their judgment has been completely vindicated by the fact that a mere 25-mile speed edge of the British pursuits over the German Messerschmidts held off the numerical superiority of the Nazi air power.

The whole subject would not be worth discussing if it were merely a matter of history. But it isn't. The same brakes which have retarded the development of our air power are still in place. Airplanes are still treated as extensions of existing weapons rather than new weapons requiring new forms of organization, administration, and tactics.

Psychologically the American people, and even more so, our highest military leaders, are still leaning back on our own "Maginot Lines," the two oceans and their respective fleets. In the designing of tomorrow's aviation we are still only "catching up"—a fatal procedure when the need is to outdistance, outplan, and outthink the potential adversary. Despite the clear lessons of the tragic experience in Europe, we are still obsessed by problems of mass production, while the more crucial questions of range, greater fire power, defensive armor, and maneuverability are treated lightly if at all.

The most serious fault of all though, is that the fundamental defense scheme for our Nation is predicated on the assumption that the science of war remains the same as it was in the Argonne-Meuse battle of 1918. We have as yet failed to grasp the role of air power in the near future. The same assumption cost France its life and has endangered the British Isles. The shorter distances involved naturally made them vulnerable to air power sooner—but that is the only difference between their position and ours. And even that protection of distance is being narrowed with every passing month. National security plans which do not recognize this fact are doomed to disaster.

If our country is obliged to go to war—actively—the offensive will be possible only through the air. Our fleets will be unable to attack enemy shore lines or to land troops while the skies are under enemy control. If we come to actual grips with a foe, it will be first of all in the air. That phase must be determined before our naval and land strength can be brought into effective play.

One high-ranking Air Corps general, in a speech on February 28, stated that the United States "should have no fear of being outstripped in the race for air power," and added that the Nation's resources "insure our ultimate command of the air." Unfortunately, natural resources by themselves can insure nothing. Despite their abundance, our country has been devoid of genuine air power to date, because of the lack of proper leadership. Our military aircraft will not take their place way out front in the race for world superiority until aviation thinking and planning has been unshackled to enable us properly to exploit our natural resources.

That, I submit, will not happen until air power is independent and administered by aviation experts of proven experience, knowledge, and vision.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES A. FARLEY, FORMER POSTMASTER GENERAL, IN CONNECTION WITH THE GREATER NEW YORK FUND APPEAL

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a radio speech given by former Postmaster General James A. Farley over radio station WEAF on Wednesday, June 4, 1941, as the last appeal in connection with the Greater New York Fund:

Last week I went to the Kips Bay Boys' Club. It was rainy, so the boys were all inside instead of being on the play roof in the air and sunshine. A ball game was on, and I couldn't resist a few swings at the ball. I hit it twice, but missed when a photographer tried for a home-run picture.

But I know those kids were having fun and building their bodies. There was a gym, a swimming pool, reading room, and instruction rooms. It was all fine, but the glow in my heart was a little chilled when I was told the work was being slowed up by lack of money.

Then I went to Madonna House, a lower East Side settlement that has been operating 30 years on the same spot. Four or five flights of stairs to see the different rooms. Small children's sleeping bunks that fold back against the walls make room for other activities.

Yes; I saw for myself how children and their parents are trained, helped, educated, taught to play. I saw health and morale being built right before my eyes. I saw Chinese boys learning English and other Chinese boys learning Chinese, that they might better help their parents be good citizens.

Madonna House swarms with children by day, with parents by night.

But the Sisters told me there wasn't money enough to do all that they know should be done to help their people.

Coming from these visits, I went to my office firmly believing half our city doesn't know anything about the other half.

But I do believe the half which does not know must learn and must help do something about that other half.

In these hours and days of uncertainty we are asked for all-out effort to prepare this Nation. Everything gives way to national defense.

That's as it should be. And that's why I come with this personal plea. I speak tonight as Jim Farley, a private citizen you know pretty well, and also Jim Farley, chairman of the 1941 campaign of the Greater New York Fund.

I urge full preparedness, but I ask that you start with the boys and girls, the men and women of our city, their health and welfare, their morale, that great intangible which makes or breaks nations.

Pleading with you tonight, I represent 2,000,000 New Yorkers, some of whom you may know, most of whom you never see. Sometimes they need emergency care, sometimes help over long periods; they need advice; they need services which only highly skilled people can offer.

Yet, unless we men and women who are in business, we men and women who have jobs give a little more thought, a little more time, and more money to the problem, those 2,000,000 are not going to get the care they should have; their health and welfare is going to be neglected; morale building will go to smash.

Then you and I and the whole city will suffer.

That must not happen. That's why I urge tonight that you help us because the 400 health and welfare services associated in the Greater New York Fund are helping those 2,000,000 people, are dealing with every phase of human relations and human need. And it takes a lot of money.

I feel there is need for a more personalized campaign to bring the fund more money.

It is up to you people who hear my voice to give the task the same personal interest you would in caring for an ill or needy neighbor. For that's what the fund is doing—it is being the friendly neighbor to New York's 2,000,000 who need something more in life than they have, or can get for themselves.

We have thousands of volunteers in this battle for the health and welfare of New York. I am doing what I can to help, but after all, I am only one little fellow in a great big city.

We need more help, your help. The Greater New York fund makes no individual or personal appeal for money, but I can make a personal appeal for help.

You, and you, and you, out there on the air waves—in your homes, your cars, your clubs, or wherever this broadcast reaches you. You can help, and you must help, because it is your duty as a New Yorker, in business or in employment in this city. You must help those not so well off; not so fortunate; maybe down a little on their luck; maybe a family about to break up for want of just the right advice, or just the right word.

Here is what you can do: If you are in a business firm, you can see to it that the firm makes a contribution to the fund. If you are an employee, you can make sure that you and your fellow employees give to the fund.

If you are in business and have given, how about giving a little more? If you are an employee who already has given, how about adding to your gift? It is not too late. Our fund address is 52 Wall Street.

And if you are a housewife, or a school boy or girl, or an older person not working, you can help by urging friends and relatives who are employed to see that firms and employee groups contribute.

Right now we are proving to ourselves that firms and employees will give more if appealed to. We are mailing victory pledge cards urging nondonors to give and donors to give more. Our first victory pledge cards came back within 24 hours.

The fund must have $5,000,000 this year. That's the least sum of money with which the fund can do its share in maintaining our health and welfare activities. Less than that amount means some part of the necessary work such as I saw last week cannot go on.

Files at the fund office are full of reports that would wring your heart. They tell of things accomplished that make you feel a little joy at being a part of the effort; on the other hand, there are reports of works discontinued, work partly stopped, definite tasks that ought to be done but cannot be attempted—all because of lack of money.

This should make you uneasy, as it does me, for I have seen the heroic work a few dollars can do in the hands of our agencies.

Instead of being expanded, services that are urgently needed are being reduced. In one poverty-stricken section of Brooklyn, an important district office has been closed. Day nurseries have had to suspend. Employment service for young women has been stopped.

Lack of money is halting a thorough program aimed at health, character building, and morale.

And yet this country needs all three of these elements in the largest possible doses.

One great settlement house cut out practically all health work for children and adults. This took away from many boys and girls and men and women their only chance for physical exercise and health supervision. There may be dire consequences.

Another settlement cut out entirely its program for children between 5 and 8 years old.

And when lack of a few paltry dollars prevents necessary work to help children of these ages, it's time we all sat up and took notice.

Hot weather is here now. Most of us are figuring on vacations. How about the boy or girl or the father or mother who cannot have those few hours of sun and air and good food that put pounds and pounds and pounds on skinny kids and build health right into bones and flesh?

We certainly cannot sit by placidly and say, "It's none of our business" when one summer camp for kids is closed and when 187,000 who ought to go are kept home for lack of a few dollars.

Frankly, the whole picture has me worried. I want to get that $5,000,000 the fund needs this year.

I have had lots of help getting the money that's in. I want to thank every volunteer and the regular fund staff. But there's one man who ought to be thanked specifically. He has done a great job, and on top of it has pledged to me that when we reach four and a half million he will start fighting all over again for the last half million to our goal.

That man is Floyd Carlisle, busy and hard-headed chairman of the board of Consolidated Edison. He thinks enough of suffering kids that need camp, and fathers and mothers who get aid from our agencies, to help in a big-time way. And he is no word waster when he demands his business friends produce their share of money needed for the health, character, and morale buildings our agencies do.

Do not forget, we help 2,000,000 persons without regard to race or creed. That's 2 out of every 7 New Yorkers.

People of this democracy always help sufferers, the world over. But perhaps some have been a little blind to needs at home, due to overeagerness to help abroad.

That's why I say the Greater New York Fund appeal is not "just one more drive." It is 400 appeals in 1; appeals by 400 stabilized services.

So perhaps your firm will give more. Perhaps you as an employee will put up $2 instead of $1, or a day's pay if you gave less.

We all should be a little ashamed if we do not do our full part to raise this money so the health, welfare, and morale of New York City can be depended on in our national emergency.

That's why I make this appeal. This is a great human cause. It must be carried through.

I'll be watching the returns from you. Thanks and good night.

The Price of Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able and profound address delivered by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] at the commencement exercises at Wake Forest College on June 2 last, entitled "The Price of Peace." The address is indeed an outstanding one; in fact, I might well say it is a great address.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One has of late the impression of many voices, of too many voices, loud and diverse. The confusion at Babel was a confusion of tongues. The modern confusion is a confusion of counsel, of ideologies, of points of view, of rival interests, of power politics, and at bottom the confusion of a generation that has rejected the beacons and authorities of the past without having found new ones to guide it. A materialistic age is reaping the inevitable harvest of materialism—tears and blood and darkness. At Babel there was a tower to build. But we have a world, a new age, to construct—and our confusion for the present is worse than that of Babel, of itself and in its consequences. The completion of the Babylonian tower was of no importance; but the reconstruction of civilization is the most important task in all history.

THE MODERN CONFUSION

So many are speaking at once that none can be heard. There is incessant listening in, but all one gets is a sense of noise, of clamor. Labor speaks and capital speaks, politicians, statesmen, and philosophers are heard. National leaders—Roosevelt, Churchill, Hitler, Stalin, and Matsuoka and many a lesser voice; editors, columnists, and professors and authors and nuts. We do have freedom of speech, of the press, and of opinion—full tide of freedom—the radio and the press present hourly the events of all the world, and opinions more varied than those events. There is impression but it does not linger—before one takes root another comes in. There is no meditation. Long ago a poet declared "the world is too much with us." Little did that poet dream how much more it was destined to be with us in this day—if this we now hear is indeed the world that the poet had in mind.

There are indeed words that penetrate and rise above the general clamor: One hears the words "new order, totalitarian, democracy, dictator, liberty, security, revolution, aggression, defense, new age, transition," and again and again the word "war," and sometimes the word "peace." But while the words rise above the general volume of noise, the speakers with their differing opinions and data and aims leave us almost as much confused as though we had heard nothing but clamor in the night without knowing whence it had come.

Better for you now, I think, on the threshold of your careers and in the midst of so great confusion, is the suggestion that one may hear more and find surer direction, if he shall succeed in finding for himself a place of silence and hear and hearken to no voice save that which comes from the eternal realms of help.

For there is a voice that speaks to every generation, to every age, and to every man if he will; a voice that one may hear best alone and in silence, and that one may understand only in meditation. It is the voice that Moses and Elijah heard, that John the Baptist heard, that Jesus heard, that Paul heard—the voice in the desert and the wilderness, of fasting and prayer. And one may dare to add that Buddha, Confucius, Mahomet heard also—and even Joan of Arc under the trees of Domremy, and John Bunyan in his prison cell, and John Woolman on the highway alone. It is the voice of which the poet spoke when he said:

"Well roars the storm to him who hears
A greater voice across the storm."

It is the still small voice that never fails the ear that will hear, that always serves him who hearkens.

I bid you hear this Voice above them all, if you can—hear and hearken. For perhaps it may bring you peace whate'er betide, and vision in our present great darkness, and through you a way for millions now lost in vast confusion. I repeat, you may hear it, if you will, and you may hearken, if you will.

With such thoughts I come to my theme, The Price of Peace, trusting that you may hear above my words the higher call.

Peace is not to be had for the asking, and, I may add, the poet was uttering less truth than poetry when she said that only Heaven is given away. Over the doorpost of a room in this college town when I was a student here I read two legends from antiquity—"Nihil sine labore" (Nothing without labor); and over another, "Ex nihilo nihil fit" (From nothing, nothing)—and a swift half century has proved to me their truth. Neither Heaven nor peace, nor any other good thing, is given away.

Peace must be bought with a price—and it is always worth all it may cost in gold, or in toil and tears and blood, and patient endurance of want and pain, as occasion may demand, and not as anyone or any nation may choose. There is no escape from circumstances. They compel us, whether we choose or not. And there is, believe me, no substitute for intelligence or toil or character.

For my purpose here, it will serve to say that the subject of peace presents itself to me at first in two aspects—personal peace and national peace. Of the former, I shall speak but briefly; of the latter at more length.

PERSONAL PEACE

One may have peace notwithstanding all earthly events if only he be capable of sufficient faith. And it was of this peace that the Prince of Peace spoke: "Peace I give unto you; My peace I leave with you—not as the world gives give I unto you"; given only to those who had paid the price, who had rejected, denied themselves, taken up the cross, and were following Him. It is the peace even of Gethsemane and, saving a brief moment, of Golgotha. It is the peace of all those who are possessed by the faith which assures them in all circumstances that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to the called according to His purpose." The peace, I may say, of a certain good woman to whom I was talking about the current perplexities of our time, who quietly said to me, "I cannot understand all that is going on; it is all far beyond me; I do not know what will happen; but I know that all is well whether it seems so or not. God rules our world for His children in power and righteousness and love." It is the peace of Stephen under the blows of his persecutors, of Paul in prison, and in the arena with the beasts, of Savonarola at the stake, and of Obadiah Holmes here in our land under the lashes that drew his blood, but which he testified he never felt.

This peace of faith is probably the most precious gift of God, of faith that disregards and sees beyond all earthly consequences. For faith is not just believing that all is going to be well or that all will be well in a heaven to be; faith is believing, when all is not going well, and when one knows that nothing is going well here, nevertheless that all is well. It is not the consolation of heaven to come or of rewards to be received. It is its own reward and a present realization that all, even the worst things, are even now working together for good to them that love God. Faith is not the means of escape from the world but the means of present victory over it. One who is fully armed with faith may say even now, I have overcome the world; victory is achieved. Of such is that glorious company which in the presence of cell and cross, of ax and torch, serenely endured, saying to themselves, "We are more than conquerors."

Get this peace of faith, young men, if you can, and pay its price—the rejection of self for the greater personality.

And with this injunction and without attempting, what is so far beyond me, to tell you how to get this peace, let me now move on to the other division of my theme, national peace and its price, a subject in which doubtless you are more interested—unfortunately.

NATIONAL PEACE

The reason for the existence of organized society, that is, a state or commonwealth, republic or empire, city or town, is peace. The word for state, the word for city, and the word for citizen has its root in the word for peace. To be exact, the word civis, the original of citizen, predicates security, and security implies peace.

Our Federal Constitution sets out in its preamble the purposes of any government, amongst them, "to insure domestic tranquillity," "to provide the common defense." Peace—then security, safety, tranquillity—is the source of the state and also the justification of its existence—peace within and without.

This is no new thing. Tribes gathered about patriarchs and chiefs for security tens of thousands of years ago, and individuals have ever yielded up individual freedom and responsibility in order to obtain peace. They paid tribute, they submitted to government, and they fought in battle, for their own security. Such was the basis of the feudal system. The state is a defensive organization, its function is security, and its grand objective is peace. Its symbol is the policeman, the soldier, the warship. This is especially true of democracies.

The first installment of the price of peace is, therefore, the surrender of a portion of one's individual freedom, as he makes common cause for the domestic tranquillity, for the collective and individual security, for the common defense or the general welfare. There must be central authority and there must be loyalty—or obedience—else there is no security, no state, no peace. A government must govern. There can be no divided authority.

There has always been debate as to how much of one's freedom must thus be yielded up, but it has always been conceded that the surrender of a certain portion is necessary.

This is the meaning of liberty as contrasted with freedom. It is the explanation of ordered liberty.

This ordered liberty is the conception of liberty founded upon inalienable rights which even the state may not take away in the direst emergency. But of late this conception has been boldly challenged and upon a broad scale. After a century and a half of liberty, mighty nations are denying its value. They declare that the State is supreme, the individual nothing—and that there are no rights of man which may not be taken away by the State whenever it chooses. This is the supreme doctrine of the Soviet Union, of the Nazis, and the Fascists, and it is likewise the secret of their immediate successes. They think so well of it, it is so good for them they propose to give it to the whole of mankind—even by force, which is logical enough and entirely consistent with the fundamental theory.

Those nations do have a certain domestic tranquillity. And they hear only one voice each respectively. It is doubtful that the individual has security They do not have peace, and are not likely to have peace so long as there are in the earth men who love liberty or men who would have souls of their own. In fact I suspect that those nations preserve their domestic tranquillity only by making war abroad.

LIBERTY AND PEACE

There is no security, from our standpoint, where there is no liberty. The great Pax Romana was peaceful enough, but it was the peace of suppression. Slavery may be peaceful, but it is not peace, nor is it security. The price of that sort of peace has often been paid and is familiar—it is stated fully in one word "slavery"—the initial stage of which is suppression by force.

It is here that we come to the present world crisis. It is a conflict between nations that would establish their peace, foreign and domestic, by force and suppression, and nations that demand not only peace but also ordered liberty, individual and collective. You may make your choice and pay the price as it may be demanded.

It is our American task to secure peace with liberty and its blessings to ourselves and our posterity. If we defend with the sword in one hand, we carry in the other our bill of inalienable rights. This is one of our difficulties, but it is a difficulty worth the carrying. For with the Bill of Rights we may rebuild a civilization, howsoever devastated; but with the sword alone nothing whatever may be rebuilt. If and when called upon to sacrifice this Bill of Rights, we will decline. There is neither victory nor security in the loss of the inalienable rights of man. That is one price we will not pay. The United States must not go totalitarian.

The Constitution, declared our Supreme Court passing upon this very question, cannot be suspended for one moment or on account of any emergency howsoever dire. Whenever we defend under the flag, we defend under the Constitution for freedom of conscience, of opinion, of speech, of the press; for freedom to educate our children in schools under our control; for the right to hold our representatives in power accountable to ourselves in frequent and free elections; for due process of law and the rights of life, liberty, and property assessed in free and independent courts; for the right to pursue happiness; for the right of local self-government in matters local; for the preservation of the reign of laws approved by ourselves in a representative government of law and administered by officers under the law no less than we are. And this is no less the meaning of the flag than it is of our Constitution, our native land, the firesides of our fathers, and the altars of our God.

So, in assessing the price of peace, we reckon upon something more than mere security or quiet—we reckon upon ordered liberty, in full recognition of the dignity of man and the vast domain in which he is above the state. If we defend, we defend only for a peace in which these trophies of civilization are the greater stake; not as aggressors, not to impose them on others; not to gain territory or power; not to preserve or gain commerce; not in revenge nor in ambition; not for wealth or living room or glory; but to make sure and to preserve to ourselves and our posterity these, the blessings of liberty. The people of the United States do not make war, but defend they will to the uttermost against all, whether from within or without, who would invade their land or their inalienable rights. For they recognize in any threat to the security of those inalienable rights the jeopardy of their peace.

These trophies of civilization, I must not fail to say, are no small portion of the great spiritual and moral heritage of the human race. They spring from our religion and without them religion is of little value. For religion must be free. It rests also upon our security.

THE VALUE OF PEACE

Since peace is the primary objective of the state and the grand reason for its existence, it ought to be most highly prized by the state and its citizens; and so highly prizing it, they must maintain it so far as is possible. It is in peace that the people are happier, safer, more prosperous; it is in peace that political and social progress is made, the arts and sciences flourish and culture extends. Our periods of progress in this our land have been the long periods of peace.

One may safely say that the great period of peace from the Civil War until now, broken altogether by less than 3 years of war, has been the great golden age of the most prosperous of peoples, in which from every material standpoint, whether of invention and industry or benevolence, whether of education—the wealth of the mind—or in the accumulation of riches, the wealth material, the building of roads, the development of transportation, the extension of the use of electrical energy, the erection of churches and schools, the development of agriculture and commerce, the improvement of rural life, and the organization of cities, the erection of hospitals, universities, and colleges—in this 75 years we have made a progress in this our land that surpasses that of many centuries theretofore. It could not have been without peace. Nor could it have been, had our Republic not enjoyed a natural security which now no longer avails us. This progress has, I regret to say, been accompanied by a moral deterioration of grave magnitude, our people, overtempted and thoughtless, yielding up the spiritual and the moral to ambition and worldly success. In gaining prosperity we have lost righteousness. Materialism has overcome us to a greater extent, I fear, than we realize.

It now appears that our period of incomparable national progress approaches its end, and we know that to maintain our security, or to extend the period of our peace, we, one and all, must pay a great price, and not in money only, nor yet just in deprivation, but certainly in full and costly preparation for war and even possibly in all the sacrifices and horrors of war—of modern war, of mechanized war, of war on land and sea, in the heavens above and the water beneath the earth, of war in which populations and noncombatants, women and children, the sick and the old, are victims no less—indeed even more—than the skilled men who bear or are borne by modern arms; such a kind of war as the human race never hitherto has known. And it is a grave question whether we are morally or spiritually equipped for our ordeal.

It is not to be denied that engagement in such a war may in truth be the price of our security, our peace at length. It may be that we must destroy much of civilization in order to save a remnant upon which to rebuild, and that many of us may be required to live out the remainder of our days in sorrow and distress in order that the generations coming on may have security. It may be that we may escape the ultimate test or at least postpone it. At the moment, none may surely say.

In this view the price of security is peace itself. And it ought to be resolved that such a price shall not be paid unless it is realized to be necessary. Some of you may recall the victory of Caesar over Vercingetorix about 2,000 years ago; and of the offer of the conquered leader of the Gauls to die at once before his soldiers or to be delivered up to Caesar, because as he himself said he had made war not of necessity, but for the sake of the common liberty, by which he meant no such liberty as ours, but only the independence of his tribe. We may after 2,000 years of increasingly costly experience well agree with the leader of ancient Gaul that war may be justified only by necessity—that is, that it is essential to national security—and that those who make war for ambition or aggression or material gain deserve the fate which he invoked upon himself—delivered over to Caesar, imprisoned 6 years at Rome, and at last paraded before his conqueror's chariot through the streets of Rome in chains and publicly beheaded.

As peace is the object of the existence of the state, so war is a state's great enemy and to avoid it is a state's chief concern. For nothing may be said in behalf of war, no more than that a state is justified in making war only by sheer necessity. Men do rise to great heights of heroism in war, and the virtue of the soldier is always to be praised, howsoever deeply one condemns war. War is not only destructive of civil life and of all the arts of peace, of life and work and home and society, of school and church, of that pursuit of happiness which is one of the inalienable rights of man, of that welfare individual and social, which it is the duty of a state to conserve; but with the horsemen of war ride three other horsemen, the horseman of famine, the horseman of pestilence, and the horseman of death. They are now on their way over the whole world. War must be the last resort of a civilized state or of reasoning beings.

THE CHOICE

The choice is not by any means, however, between war and peace, but between war and the consequences of not defending a nation's security in due time to the uttermost, or of not being prepared adequately to defend—between war and that security without which there is no peace. War is all of horror that it is declared to be by those who most abhor it—and it is more. But between war and subjugation, a people must choose the former; between war and slavery the haters of war must choose war. Invaders must be repelled; enemies must be headed off in due season. For, worse than war is defeat in war, or subjugation without war. Above war and above peace, every citizen must place his nation's security.

Across the decades comes the challenge: "Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery?"

The people of the United States at this time solemnly ponder whether to defend their country with aid to other countries short of actual belligerency or to commit themselves to the fortunes of war east and west; whether they can hope for a satisfactory issue upon present policies or not; whether they should take the chance between our present course of preparation at home and aid abroad, and await the outcome, in the possibility of fighting alone, or proceed to join in now with other nations, especally Great Britain, whose armies and fleets are indispensable and are yet available; whether we are capable of the ordeal now or will be more so later. It is a question of wisdom rather than a mere choice, and a question demanding the utmost deliberation consistent with timely action, in which every factor and every potentiality must be weighed—and weighed by men who know the factors and their weights. The ultimate decision must be made by the people themselves, not by a mere majority, but practically by common consent—for a divided nation is beaten to begin with. Upon that decision at this moment the Government awaits, and prepares as it awaits.

THE CONDITION UNDERLYING PEACE

To preserve its security a nation must first of all be prepared. It must pay the price of adequate preparation; it must be strong not only physically, but also and in equal measure, morally and spiritually; for where liberty exists moral and spiritual armament are quite as essential as all the weapons of modern warfare. We cannot rely upon an imposed solidarity or unity; it must come from the spirit of the people—from their moral and religious qualities.

We currently have the picture of great haste in physical preparation, of huge undertakings, of incalculable expenditures imposing indescribable burdens and entailing difficulties and dangers of the greatest magnitude. Our land becomes an arsenal; and our sons soldiers in training to acquire the most ancient of skills, that of war, adjusted to the age of power and machinery.

We agree that it is necessary, for there is universal fear for our security. Our only question is, Can we in time array and equip a force equal to that or superior to that which threatens to be matched against us? Many do not like it, but few indeed are inclined to assume the risk of doing without it. This, we say, is also the price of peace, and such a price as a little while ago few suspected we would be required to pay.

But there is a not less essential preparation in our Republic of liberty. Our sons are ready for training; our industries are proceeding after a manner not altogether hopeless by any means, notwithstanding grave difficulties, touching the alleged right to strike against the security of the people, upon which I cannot now dwell. Our country requires more than trained soldiers and ships, more than planes and bombs, more than guns and explosives, more than production; there must be unity and its foundation must be secured. We now recall Rudyard Kipling's lines:

"For heathen heart that puts her trust
In reeking tube and iron shard,
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And guarding, calls not Thee to guard,
For frantic boast and foolish word—
Thy mercy on Thy people, Lord!"

The totalitarian may dispense with the moral dynamic, but the lands of liberty cannot, for they find their unity, their solidarity, their morale, their ultimate impetus not in orders handed down but in motives moving in unison from within.

MORAL PREPARATION

It is to this moral preparation or armament, if you please, that I direct your attention, because I deeply fear that we are most gravely wanting now in this respect. Our test has come after a long period of relative ease and softness, in which we have worshipped before the altar of the god success and bowed down to that mammon which Jesus most abhorred. We have yielded to self-indulgence. There has been prolonged moral lapse and luxurious living on one hand and neglect of the poor and weak on the other, of great selfishness and unblushing greed. While our country has been calling for sacrificial citizenship, so far only the young men of the armed service have made sacrifices. But the sacrifices must be made, and by one and all. It was an ancient captain who declared that he had found it easier to discover men willing to die in battle than people willing to undergo privation patiently for a little while; and modern captains are now confirming his experiences in our land. Well may the people of the United States look now to their moral fiber.

This is no hour for politics. We must suspend our ambitions and our rivalries; we must sink ourselves in the common necessity. And this also is a part of the price of peace.

There ought to be a return to and a recovery of ancient righteousness in the United States—that ancient righteousness of which the prophets spoke, which at once combines the spiritual and the moral, which is sacrificial as it is spiritual. There is no other morality sufficient for such a test as we must now undergo. This Republic might possibly fight through the ordeal of a new World War in the present state of mind of its people, but it could not hope in such a mind to sustain itself in the long aftermath of domestic readjustment. And to that also must we look even now.

THE NEED OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

It is of primary importance that we know at the outset what that righteousness was and is and ever must be. It was not and never can be mere conformity to rules and regulations, howsoever good. Jesus Himself declared to His contemporaries: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees (the best religious classes and most faithful observers of the law and the regulations) ye can in no wise enter the Kingdom" of mankind's redemption. And He demanded a righteousness within, a righteousness that fulfilled the law rather than kept it, a righteousness that was not merely just but that honored and protected the aged, that cared for the poor, and delivered the weak from oppression, even more than it conformed to any regularity whatsoever; a righteousness which rejected the material even to the degree of selling all one has, giving it to the poor, and sharing the common lot. And in this He but followed Moses and the prophets.

It is this sort of righteousness that exalteth a nation and serves as the breastplate of its soldiers and the girdle of its citizens. It is in this sort of righteousness only that a free republic can be strong and overmatch the organized, mechanized, skilled, and well-directed armies of the devotees of force and of the material—the apostles of the doctrine that might makes right. It is for us to show within ourselves that nothing less than the righteousness of God in the hearts of a people makes right; that, as our Chief Justice recently declared, the American way of life is the pathway of the just.

The Greeks had their ideal of the man in the word "kalos," a perfection of body and of mind, of behaviour and devotion to the state; the Romans had its counterpart in the word "virtus," a combination of courage, skill, just conduct, and patriotism. Our Christian civilization preserves the better meaning of both kalos and virtus and adds to them the spiritual and moral qualities of mercy, of kindness, of sacrifice, and faith, all combined in one word, "righteousness," the dynamic of which is a due relation to the most high God Himself. It is the standard of justice that imposes duty and restraint upon men who recognize their accountability to a just God, whom they worship and depend upon, rather than the standard that merely squares with the law.

Nor is this righteousness beyond us, nor are we wanting in examples of it—not only in Washington and Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson and Abraham Lincoln, but in every community even now there are men and women who illustrate it daily.

If we are to preserve our security and enjoy peace, or if war comes and we shall endure successfully the ordeal of war and its aftermath, we must prepare ourselves in this righteousness even more earnestly than in arms and fortresses, guns and munitions; and it must be a part not only of the skill itself of the fighting man, but of the character of the whole population. The hour is come for the preaching of righteousness in America. It is an hour for the return of Isaiah or Elijah.

This righteousness, let me say in passing, is the key no less to our domestic tranquility than to our defense against the invader from without. It is the antidote to low politics or selfish grasping for advantage no less than to the strife between capital and labor or class and class. It is the one sure preventive of revolution, the one guaranty of unity and the unfailing means of order.

This righteousness before God is also the price of peace.

And so I have laid before you my thoughts in this hour, addressed to our current crisis but founded in a far broader view. Let me now conclude on the abiding note of our faith—the light that never fails.

Fifty or sixty centuries ago Abraham went out from Ur of the Chaldees, not knowing whither he went, geographically a wanderer but morally and spiritually oriented and, therefore, knowing what he and all men needed and must have; for it is written of him that he looked for a city, a civilization, a security on earth, whose builder and maker is God, and whose foundation is righteous men and women. He was the explorer who sought the heavenly city, the divine order on earth, with only the inner voice for a compass. He was the father and founder of a great nation, out of which came the Book of the Ages, and the undying dream of the city for which he looked.

Again and again prophets appeared who called the wayward race of man back from the path of darkness and insecurity to the way of light and the City of Peace, rebuking them of sin and recalling them to the righteousness of God. At length came Jesus and made plain the way—the same, ancient pathway to which Abraham and Moses, Isaiah, Hosea, and Jeremiah had pointed. He proclaimed the Kingdom of God and His righteousness on earth—in the hearts of human beings. At last, His efforts apparently vain, He looked from a hill down upon the earthly city that He most loved and cried out His lament over that city and over all that have been and are, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that stoneth the prophets, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen doth cover her brood, and ye would not." Hard by on another hill soon thereafter Jerusalem put Him to death upon the instrument of the slave's torture.

But the quest of Abraham, the ideal of the prophets and the purpose of Jesus did not die. John, the beloved, exiled on Patmos, left the vision of a new Jerusalem in words of immortal beauty as the heritage of mankind to the last generation in the closing chapters of the Apocalypse—a new city enthroning this Jesus whom the old city had slain.

THE ULTIMATE CITY

Men continue to seek the city of Abraham, of Jesus, and of John, and 20 centuries bear us witness at this hour that they cannot be content nor may they be secure until it shall have come to be even as Jesus taught and as John saw it coming. It does not yet appear; we seem farther from it today than yesterday; farther away in the twentieth than in the nineteenth century. But not so. The leaven that the woman hid will yet leaven the lump. The light that Jesus kindled and that Golgotha could not put out, that shines more brightly from the Cross intended to extinguish it than from any other source, will yet light all the world. Other kingdoms may die; other orders may come and pass, but the Kingdom of God will come and it will come as young men like you go forth as Abraham went, looking, not knowing whither you go or what your lot may be, but looking for the city whose builder and maker is God, the abiding security of which is the righteousness of its citizens.

This is no time for pessimism but for that optimism that ever looks for the ultimate City of Peace. I recall the lines from William Tell:

"The old is crumbling down—the times are changing,
And from the ruins blooms a fairer life."

This is the order of the ages: The ruins always blossom. Be of good cheer: It is your task to see that they shall blossom!

Drawing his inspiration from Milton, the poet Blake, 150 years ago, addressed to the young men of his time a call to action—beginning,

"Rouse up, O young men of the new age!"

And with it he gave to them a marching song of the crusader's life-long battle:

"Bring me my bow of burning gold!
Bring me my arrows of desire!
Bring me my spear! O, clouds unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire!

"I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land."

For Blake and England and the young men of another century, for the United States and her young men at this hour, at all hours to come until we see the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven to this, our earth.

Hail and farewell. God be with you. God bless you.

The Problem of Financing Highways in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement, which I recently filed with the Ways and Means Committee for its study during consideration on the proposed tax bill:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this statement is made in my capacity as a member of another of the House's deliberative groups, the Committee on Roads.

All of us who have been privileged to serve the people of this great democracy in the present Congress naturally are concerned greatly for the future of the international situation. Under the circumstances, it is only human nature that thoughts of national defense and the devising of effective means for financing the defense program should be uppermost in our minds. But in our keen desire to provide sufficient sums for that purpose as speedily as possible it is conceivable that we may be inclined to overlook fundamental considerations to which serious attention should be devoted, and which certainly would be accorded such attention, except for the pressing nature of the current emergency.

The problem in this category to which I should like to direct your attention is the one involved in financing our extensive network of highways. The function of the Committee on Roads, as you gentlemen know, is determination of the Federal Government's proper role in financing a national system of highways.

PEACETIME HIGHWAYS AVAILABLE FOR WARTIME USE

Such facilities, of course, are indispensable to the country's growth and its continued prosperity and welfare in times of peace. As we learned at the time of the last war, and are coming to recognize even more clearly at the present time, activities to foster the national defense simply cannot function effectively in the absence of adequate facilities in the form of highways.

Too often, it seems to me, there is a tendency to overlook completely this direct relationship between the peacetime functions of highways and the way in which such functions automatically provide a system which is readily available for defense uses whenever the emergency develops.

Since the fee for registration of motor vehicles first was devised in New York State in 1901 the motorists have paid a total of some $18,000,000,000 in such special levies. This figure, of course, includes the State gasoline taxes, which were inaugurated in Oregon in 1919, and the Federal gasoline tax and automotive levies which have been collected by the Federal Government itself since 1932. Even prior to the present emergency the motorist taxpayers, through their routine peacetime payments of special levies, had created an incomparable investment in highway facilities which now will prove of the greatest practical value in facilitating progress of the national-defense program. It seems to me that we as a nation certainly owe a debt of gratitude to our motorist taxpayers for this contribution.

INVESTMENT MUST NOT BE IMPAIRED

The fact that we have had such a huge sum of money invested in highways naturally is of considerable significance. When one of us purchases a home or some other so-called permanent investment of that general character, we always exercise reasonable precautions to guarantee that the maintenance will be adequate so as to prevent serious impairment of the investment. So it is with our investment in highways. Now that we have invested eighteen billions in such facilities, we are obligated to make sufficient provision for maintenance of that investment so that the highway system may be handed down to our children in an unimpaired condition. The current investment in highways and its continued maintenance in an unimpaired condition are the twin problems which I discuss with you now.

HUGE DEBT OUTSTANDING

No discussion of the current investment in highways would be complete without some reference to the huge outstanding bonded indebtedness. Some of the States which happen to possess extensive economic and financial resources have been able to accomplish most of the financing of their highways through adherence to the commendable principle of "pay as you go." But many of the States which are less favorably situated in these respects have found it necessary either to spread the cost of the highways out over the years through the issuance of bonds or to forego the improvements altogether.

Although Chairman DOUGHTON'S home State of North Carolina enjoys the distinction of having issued $180,000 in State bonds for highway purposes in 1850, the money derived from those bonds was used for purchase of stock in a turnpike company which charged the traveling public tolls for the use of its plank roads. This procedure reminds one of somewhat similar schemes for financing highways which are being advocated in certain circles at the present time. To Majority Leader MCCORMACK'S home State of Massachusetts, however, goes the palm for having issued the first direct obligations for State highways—$300,000 in 1894. I am told that his State also enjoys the distinction of having issued the first "municipal bond," as that term is used customarily today, some two and a half centuries earlier.

For 10 years Massachusetts continued to enjoy the distinction of being the only State which had issued bonds for highways. But in 1905 another State joined the ranks; by 1910 the number had increased to 7; by 1920 to 21 States; and by 1930 to 33 States. Today no less than 41 States are making payments on bonds. These obligations either have been issued by the States themselves or they were issued originally by lesser governmental jurisdictions, but since have been taken over by the State because the money derived from their sale was spent in improvement of roads which now are a part of the primary State system.

The total sum in highway bonds outstanding increased from $300,000, the amount of the original Massachusetts issue in 1894, to $886,000 when the second State joined the ranks in 1905; by 1910 the figure had increased to $6,535,000; by 1920 to $38,900,000; and the all-time high of $2,001,000,000, significantly enough, was reached in 1932, when the country was in the deepest throes of the depression. Since that time a reduction has been effected, so that the most recent figures which are available—those for the calendar year 1939—indicate some $1,853,340,000 of highway debt outstanding at that time.

BINDING NATURE OF THESE OBLIGATIONS

We appreciate fully the sacred and inviolate character of "the obligation of contract" undertaken by a sovereign government with its creditor when such bonds are issued. It is fortunate that in this country repudiation and default upon one's obligations still are frowned upon. The possibility of any State's being unable to meet its just obligations, therefore, must be guarded against scrupulously.

CAUSE FOR SERIOUS CONCERN

This is one point which is of grave concern to the members of the Committee on Roads at the moment. From the testimony of some of the witnesses who have appeared at these hearings, we conclude that raising of revenue is only one of the objectives which is being borne in mind. Apparently there is in certain quarters in this country a well-defined attempt under way to restrict appreciably the everyday use of automobiles on the grounds that these vehicles are luxuries or at any rate nonessentials. While the so-called holiday in manufacture of automobiles can be understood quite readily, I am inclined to wonder whether there are equally valid grounds for restriction of operation of those needed automobiles already in operation. It is conceivable, of course, that the ultimate decision might be in the affirmative. But, in the event that it is, it seems only fair that we certainly should be fully aware of the consequences.

REDUCED INCOME TO STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENTS

In the event that any such curtailment of civilian use of automobiles and the accompanying restricted consumption of gasoline should be made effective, the income of State highway departments would be reduced accordingly.

Funding of the outstanding debt cited above now require approximately one quarter of the total revenues available to State highway departments—after deduction of costs of collection and administration, distribution of specified sums to counties and other lesser governmental jurisdictions, and authorized diversions to nonhighway purposes. In individual States, however, the ratio is much greater.

Arkansas might be cited as the extreme illustration. That State long has been a source of concern to Federal highway officials. After several years of acute financial distress, in 1934 the State succeeded in effecting a temporary refunding with its bondholders. So much money was pledged for this purpose, however, that relatively nothing was left for use in reconstruction of some of the pavements which were wearing out rapidly even then. After much deliberation the Federal authorities decided finally that the only equitable arrangement would be to permit Arkansas to qualify for its regular allotments of Federal aid without matching. This arrangement has been followed continuously ever since.

While Arkansas is the extreme illustration, as has been explained, it is not so much different than other States represented by some of the gentlemen who are present here. In Tennessee, for example, 56 percent of the money available to the State highway department is required for payments on outstanding debt. The percentage is almost nearly as high in Mississippi. Next in line comes my own State of West Virginia, with 48 percent. In Missouri 43 percent of the State highway income is spent for this purpose. Illinois and Texas are tied at 28 percent, and New Jersey ranks next, with 22 percent. Finally, in Michigan, the ratio is 19 percent.

REQUIREMENTS INCREASED BY MAINTENANCE CHARGES

In addition to these rigid requirements for retirement of outstanding debt, there also are, of course, the requirements for adequate maintenance of the existing sizable investment in highways, which has been cited above. Inclusion of this item brings the required minimum up to 89 percent of the available revenue in the case of West Virginia. Arkansas ranks close behind, with 88 percent. Mississippi is third with 78 percent of the revenue being required for debt service and maintenance. Tennessee is next with 73 percent. Then come in order Missouri, with 66 percent; Texas, with 52 percent; Michigan, with 48 percent; Illinois, with 44 percent; and New Jersey, with 40 percent. In such States an overwhelming proportion of the current revenue is required for service of outstanding debts and satisfactory upkeep of the existing highway system. It is obvious, therefore, that the financial security of the entire program might be jeopardized in the event that there should be any appreciable curtailment of operation of the automobile.

NECESSITY FOR MATCHING FEDERAL AID

But the requirements which have been outlined above represent only a portion of the story. Aside from their own obligations, these States also are confronted with the necessity of using most of the remaining funds for the matching of Federal funds which have been made available to them with that proviso.

Since 1916, as you know, the Federal Government has appropriated each year a sum of money for expenditure upon the so-called system of Federal-aid highways, which constitutes 7 percent of the total State mileage. This money has been available to States, however, only on the condition that it is matched on a 50–50 basis. An exception to this rule has been made, however, in the case of Arkansas, as explained previously. North Dakota and West Virginia also were permitted to obtain a portion of their Federal aid through a somewhat similar arrangement under the 1936 act. Aside from these minor exceptions in comparatively recent years, however, it might be said in general that the States have been required to match on a 50–50 basis.

Under the Federal Highway Act of 1940, which became effective on September 5, 1940, similar sums of regular Federal aid were appropriated for expenditure during the Federal fiscal years ending in June 1942 and June 1943. These sums, which likewise must be matched on a 50–50 basis, will amount to $114,563,000 annually during each of those 2 fiscal years. The necessity of matching these sums obviously imposes a further burden upon the States cited above, which already find it necessary to spend most of their current income for retirement of debt and maintenance. Particular States which have experienced serious difficulty in matching their regular Federal aid in recent years, in addition to Arkansas, of course, are Colorado, Maine, New Hampshire, North Dakota, and West Virginia.

Ever since it first became apparent that our everyday life would be affected directly by the current conflict across the seas, Federal authorities have been engaged in a survey to determine what improvements may be necessary in the Federal-aid highway program so as to facilitate the progress of defense activities. Certain bottlenecks have been discovered, but there is cause for rejoicing in the fact that nearly all of them are in the nature of minor details, such as widening of shoulders and strengthening and widening of certain bridges, which can be remedied economically and without serious disruption of the defense effort.

To provide funds for this work, $287,000,000 was appropriated recently in addition to the regular Federal aid cited above. Some $175,000,000 of this sum need not be matched by the States. The remaining $112,000,000, however, must be matched. In fact, a new departure has been inaugurated in the matching of by far the greater part of this sum—$100,000,000 of the total—matching on a 60–40 basis, i. e., the Federal Government being responsible for 60 percent of the total cost of the projects.

Even on this more favorable basis of matching, however, additional State funds will be required, for which in most cases no provision has been made in State highway budgets because of the impossibility of foreseeing even a short time ago the pressing nature of the current emergency. All of the States as a group will find it most difficult to reallocate their budgeted expenditures for highways so as to release sufficient funds for the matching of these additional Federal funds. But the States which I have cited, which even in the past have experienced difficulty in matching their regular Federal aid, the provision of such additional funds will constitute a problem worthy of the talents of the financial magicians.

It is requested respectfully, therefore, that the Ways and Means Committee devote its attention to these facts in the course of its deliberations as to the practicability of tapping certain sources from which, it might be believed, additional revenue could be derived for financing the defense program. It is suggested that the committee bear in mind, furthermore, that the contemplated highway improvments to facilitate the defense effort which are desired most keenly by the Federal authorities, are dependent wholly upon participation by the States. No great exercise of the imagination is required to lead one to the inevitable conclusion that the States will be in a much better position to undertake such participation if they can be sure of the continued yield of those sources of automotive taxation which even now are duplicated directly by the Federal Government.

SUMMARY

In conclusion, sight must not be lost of the fact that peacetime contributions in the form of special levies upon the motorists have created for us a system of highways unparalleled in the history of the world. The mere existence of this system is facilitating greatly the current defense effort. The $18,000,000,000 investment, which this system represents, must not be impaired through action which might affect the revenue yield of the State automotive levies depended upon to finance its maintenance.

Much of this investment has been financed through issue bonds, and there is currently more than a billion and a quarter of these obligations still outstanding. Payments of interest and principal on this indebtedness now requires one quarter of all the income available to State highway departments, but in individual States the ratio exceeds 50 percent and in one case amounts to 67 percent. Requirements for maintenance of existing highways also must be added. As a result, in at least three of the States represented on the membership of your honorable committee three-quarters or more of the current revenue available for State highways is pledged for such purposes, and in five more the proportion approximates 50 percent.

With so much of the current revenue already encumbered for unavoidable expenditures, certain of the States have been experiencing difficulty in recent years in matching their regular Federal aid. In the near future, however, they must undertake matching of special additional funds recommended recently for elimination of bottlenecks in the Federal-aid system.

The States, therefore, are dependent directly upon the continued yield of State sources of automotive taxation to provide adequate funds for retirement of the outstanding bonded debt for highways, adequate maintenance of the State system, and matching of Federal-aid funds. It seems obvious, therefore, that no action should be taken by the Federal Government toward heavier taxation of the same sources which might cause serious repercussions upon the whole system of financing State highways.

Some States which now have sizable debts outstanding conceivably might face the disrepudiation of their obligations. Other States might be confronted with the necessity of tasteful alternatives of default or outright curtailing rigidly necessary outlays for upkeep and maintenance, thereby impairing the continued usefulness of the State highway system and the many millions of dollars previously invested in that system. Finally, still other States might find it wholly impossible to match their regular Federal aid and undertake needed improvements in the highway system which are most desired by Federal authorities because of their possible effect in facilitating progress of the defense effort.

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 27, 1941

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, if the President and his advisers, in their efforts to appraise public opinion on the convoy issue and other intervention measures, place much reliance on the national polls they will be leaning on a very weak reed.

It seems to me to be a singular fact that whenever an intervention measure is being debated at white heat a national poll is taken and it invariably finds a strong public sentiment backing up the intervention proposal, when persons who are acquainted with the situation know that no such sentiment exists.

This peculiar phenomenon was again brought home to me the other day when one of the national polls announced the results of a survey of public opinion in my native State of Indiana on the convoy issue, the exact question being: "Should the United States Navy be used to guard ships carrying war materials to Britain?"

The announced result of this Indiana poll was—yes, 42 percent; no, 51 percent; no opinion, 7 percent.

Now, everybody in Indiana knows that a statement that 42 percent of our people are in favor of using our Navy vessels to convoy war materials to Britain is perfectly absurd. I represent the capital district of the State, a metropolitan area where it may reasonably be presumed that the sentiment in favor of convoys is stronger than in the rural districts. Nevertheless, a poll taken by the Indianapolis News—a real, honest-to-goodness poll in which over 14,000 ballots were cast—shows 92 percent of our people against convoys, and 95 percent against entering the war. On this basis, I doubt whether, considering the State as a whole, more than 3 or 4 percent of the people of Indiana favor convoys. Yet this national poll finds, right off the bat, that 42 percent are in favor of it.

As a matter of fact a national poll which purports to show that our Indiana people are in favor of convoys or any other legislative or administrative measure that leads toward our involvement in war is incorrect and undependable. Indiana and every other State in the Midwest is overwhelmingly opposed to convoys and is wedded to the doctrine that our best policy is to think of America first and keep out of foreign entanglements.

I do not like to criticize anyone, and I am not challenging the good faith and intentions of the managers of our national polls, but since those polls are the basis on which much of the war propaganda is built up, and are constantly being quoted by interventionists to try to show that public opinion is what it is not, I think it is only right to warn the officials of our Government that they cannot depend upon these polls. Whether their unreliability is due to faulty mechanism or what not, I do not know.

I was a Washington correspondent for 28 years, and it is my cherished privilege to have an enormous circle of acquaintances extending into all of the States and cities of the country, and I close with this statement of facts:

First. I was never polled by a national poll.

Second. No friend or acquaintance of mine was ever polled.

Third. I never heard of anyone who was ever polled.

Fourth. I never heard of anyone who had ever heard of anyone who was ever polled.

And yet you would think from the way these national polls are quoted that they are the supreme court of public opinion, whose findings are the last word.

Notwithstanding what any national poll may purport to show, the plain fact is that an overwhelming majority of the people of this country are opposed to mixing in any foreign wars. They are dead set in their opposition to the use of convoys and to all other measures, of whatsoever character, which they think would drag us in. They are for America first, last, and all the time, and they stand foursquare and steadfast for the perpetuation of our constitutional Government, which they are ready at all times to defend with their fortunes and their lives. They may not be very articulate as yet, but as time goes on they will let the war promoters know in no uncertain way that they are not going to see our freedom and our very existence as the world's greatest democracy jeopardized by plunging our country into the quarrels of foreign nations that have been fighting over boundary lines for a thousand years and that will still be fighting a thousand years after we are all dead and gone.

Agricultural Migration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., OF WISCONSIN

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address which I delivered before the Committee on Interstate Migration at the National Conference of Social Work held at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 2, 1941, may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGRICULTURAL MIGRATION—PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE

It is a privilege for me to participate in this conference. It is all too seldom that we have an occasion for seeking out ways of mutual helpfulness in this present world, largely given over to conflict. Yet it is particularly appropriate that we seize the present moment for calm and considerate deliberation concerning the kind of world we hope to see emerge from the present convulsion. National policy on many vital questions is at the crossroads. Observations and experiences of the last decade have brought a realization of the necessity for vital adjustments of national policy in new directions. Current economic, political, and military crises accentuate this demand for an ever-increasingly realistic social policy.

Perhaps nothing typifies better this insistent demand for adjustment than the migration of destitute human beings in search of better opportunities for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. For destitute migrants symbolize flight from something obnoxious to the human spirit, be it intolerance, religious persecution, political tyranny, poverty, an underprivileged economic status, or a mere lack of opportunity. So it has been with all the great migrations in history. At their roots are the cancer spots that demand treatment and eradication. In flight the destitute migrant is a deserving object of sympathy and assistance. Homeless, without the ties and privileges of community life, their flight is an indication that here are human spirits with sufficient energy and courage to brave an unknown world full of danger rather than to lapse into the lethargy of stolid misery. That is why the refugee instantly receives our sympathetic cooperation. That is why the destitute migrant of our own land should be the object of equal concern. Ahead of these migrating peoples there are delicate and difficult problems of adjustment. Some will naturally find their pot of gold at the end of the rainbow because of exceptional gifts, extraordinary persistence, or the happy turn of the wheel of fortune. But many are in grim danger of finding only a new environment for a disadvantaged existence. They may be destined to wander aimlessly for an indefinite period; they may find, at best, a limited opportunity to share their misery with others in a crowded labor market; they may find that to their previous unhappy situation they may have added only a strange environment and a hopelessness that comes from having tried valiantly and failed.

To me the most significant aspect of this spectacle of destitute migrants is the great need for a wise and vigorous social policy. The cornerstone of such a policy must be a national recognition that destitute migrants are an important and valuable asset. They cannot, in good conscience, be the object of discrimination. They are entitled to all the privileges that government, be it national or local, decides to allow to its disadvantaged groups; that the length of time a man and his family have lived in a community has nothing to do with the sharpness of hunger, the thinness of raiment, the need for healthy and comfortable lodging, and access to public health and educational advantages. The problems of these migrant peoples arise because they are normal human beings; they do not constitute in any sense a lower order of humanity that can be rightly condemned to a lower set of values and standards. They are simply Americans on the move. In this twentieth century world of movement in which we live, surely any conceptions of public policy that recognize vital distinctions between the need of Americans on the move and Americans at home are not tenable. Yet such outworn conceptions, encysted in much of our law and administrative policy, are the root of much of the unnecessary hardship that destitute migrants must bear. Hence to me this gathering has a very significant function. It is, in brief, to vitalize the concept of national citizenship.

I have been requested to introduce to this meeting the topic of agricultural migration. It is not my function at this stage of the meeting to discuss the platform on interstate migration which this group will consider here. It is not my role to advocate the adoption of any given policy, but rather to analyze the various problems that are implicit in the broad topic of agricultural migration.

In the decade just past, three concrete patterns of agricultural migration have emerged as a permanent part rather than a temporary phase of the American scene. First, there is the periodic movement of the so-called migratory farm worker who, often accompanied by his family, seeks employment as a hired laborer in agricultural industry. This migration is characterized by irregular, temporary, intermittent, and seasonal employment from a mobile labor pool of otherwise unemployed workers. This labor pool is composed of fellow migrants and local residents in the communities through which they travel. Second, there is the migration of large numbers of agricultural families who move from their post as farm operators, either owner, tenant, or sharecropper. Sometimes these displaced farm families crowd the shifting, moving agricultural labor market; sometimes they compete for the ever-decreasing opportunities to become independent farmers on financial terms and adequate land to provide a decent standard of living, sometimes they move into semiurban or urban communities seeking relief; mostly, they wander until some member of the family finds a job. Third, there is the constant migration of rural youth coming of age on the land but seeking a place in industrial society with an urban environment. Sometimes they are successful and stick; sometimes they hang on only temporarily; many of them are forced to secure relief or go back home to subsistence farming and a disguised rural unemployment.

These three movements of migratory farm workers, displaced farm families, and surplus rural youth often accompanied by the most shocking misery and deprivation, have become recognized in the last decade as symptomatic of a whole complex of problems which are related to destitute rural migration. What is the meaning of these migrating peoples for us here today? Upon close analysis and investigation, it has become evident that these various types of migration are not simply a function of a temporary disaster such as a dust storm or a severe drought; rather, they are responsive to underlying causes which, with monotonous regularity, impel members of rural communities to become needy migrants, either temporary or permanent. Far-reaching developments in the techniques and organization of American agriculture toward mechanized farming and industrialized or commercialized operation, excessive farm debt, the depletion of soil resources, an expanding rural population coupled with a marked reduction in the working force required for farm production, and a drastic reduction in opportunities for employment in urban centers, have been accounted as the principal causes of destitution in agricultural migration. Hence, we must conclude as a major premise for social action that agricultural migration with its by-product problems, is a definite, permanent, and complex reality for which definite and permanent and integrated social policy must be devised. Temporary palliatives and halfway relief measures will not suffice. We must meet the problem head-on.

Moreover, we must be careful to avoid taking a futile or constricted approach in building this social policy. We must not confuse agricultural migration with the destitution and disadvantaged economic, social, and political status that oftentimes stimulates, accompanies, or climaxes it. Migration is only a normal means for the adjustment of population to better economic opportunity; it must not be choked off; State and local barriers to this migration are not consonant with our national traditions of freedom. The real evils for many who are forced to move are unserved human needs, the lack of adequate protection in the harsh competition of a crowded and disorganized labor market, and the difficulty of any individual solution to the problem of personal security.

Agricultural migration is only the passing parade that reflects these disadvantaging factors in a rather dramatic and observable fashion. We must attack the substance, not the shadow, of destitution and underprivilege. That is the second principle which should ground the formulation of a wise and effective social policy on this subject.

Perhaps, some will wonder about the scope and magnitude of this complex of problems. Is it something peculiar and local to a given area or region, or a few isolated unfortunates? It was my privilege, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, to become intimately acquainted with these problems during the course of the committee's last field investigation which largely concerned the violation of labor's rights in California's mighty agricultural industry. What the committee saw and heard there in late 1939 and early 1940 persuaded us that back of the fictional story of agricultural migration, then popularized in book and motion picture, was a vast national problem that touched and concerned not a relatively small geographical region or population group, but the whole Nation. In May and June 1940, this was confirmed by the testimony of expert witnesses called by the committee to describe generally the various facets of a national farm-labor problem. Contemporaneously, the House of Representatives established the Select Committee to Investigate Interstate Migration of Destitute Citizens. Since that time, the invaluable results of the researches and inquiry of that committee of which our presiding officer today is a member, have made many parts of the Nation conscious of the fact that no single State or area had a monopoly of the destitution that is related to agricultural migration. Both before and since these inquiries of these legislative committees, farseeing students in various public agencies and universities in all parts of the country have paved the way for a fairly complete understanding of the scope of this problem which we were able to bring to our thinking in the year 1941.

Let me briefly indicate the magnitude of this problem of formulating a social policy responsive to an analysis of needy agricultural migrants. There are the people whom we call farmers but who play a relatively minor role in supplying our needs for foods and fibers. Most of them would not be on the land if there was other work for them to do. In 1929, nearly one-half of our 6,000,000-odd farm operators produced less than $1,000 worth of crops and livestock, and nearly one-third produced less than $600 worth. These farms producing less than $600 worth of products sold less than 4 percent of the crops going to market. For the most part these small farms were not very efficient. A substantial amount of this income had to be used for fertilizer, machinery, stock, and the other essentials for farming.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture has estimated that more than 600,000 farms today are located in areas where the soil is not suitable for cultivation. Hundreds of thousands of other farms are too small. This sort of agriculture is the spawning ground for destitute migrants. To condemn these people to a continued low level of existence by encouraging them to stay where they are, and discouraging them from moving, is to betray the great agricultural traditions of our Nation. Our agricultural civilization envisages a healthy, happy, independent life on a standard of living capable of producing a vigorous and independent citizenry. It has never envisaged as ideal a subsistence agriculture, maintained as a national poorhouse, peopled by millions of disadvantaged families.

Another great reservoir of destitution related to agricultural migration is the plight of the uncounted, unorganized, and inarticulate millions who depend upon seasonal and intermittent employment on the Nation's farms. They have been truly the forgotten men of our economic democracy. Not counted as farmers, they have been largely ignored in the formulation and administration of agricultural policy with minor exceptions in comparatively recent years. Not esteemed as laborers, they are left outside the protection of labor legislation, State and Federal. As a result of this rather complete relegation to the rock pile of relief, to the meager extent it is available, farm laborers are at the very bottom of our economic and social ladder. They epitomize underprivilege.

In recent years, their numbers have so far exceeded the numbers needed to produce the country's crops that desperate competition for the jobs which have been available has caused farm wage rates in the latter part of the 1930's to lag far behind as farm prices began to recover from depression lows. It has been reliably estimated that in 1940 there was a reserve of 5,000,000 unused or ineffectively used workers pressing upon the agricultural labor market. Unemployment and underemployment is common. Full employment is available only to a relatively small proportion. There is, in some quarters, a detestable exploitation of these workers who, generally, have been unable to offer effective resistance. Their very numbers, their racial and social heterogeneity, and their exclusion from protective social legislation have made them easy prey to vicious recruitment and employment practices. By various devices, including opposition to the operation of relief projects, attacks on relief and security wage rates, the circulation of false information concerning job opportunities, open recruiting activities, and often with the assistance of public-employment services, employers have striven successfully wherever necessary to maintain surplus reserves of farm labor, when and where needed to maintain sharp competition for available jobs.

Haphazard and disordered migration is the result of a completely disorganized labor market. Inadequate housing, insufficient public health and educational opportunities, and a lack of opportunity to participate fully in the benefits of community life are common. It has been estimated that there are upward of a million of these regular migratories, who, in addition to their disadvantaged place as farm laborers, suffer the handicaps of a disordered migratory existence for all or substantial periods of the year.

Also, there are the large numbers of additional rural residents who may encounter destitution, but have not yet suffered. About twice as many farm boys currently reach the age of 21 as have an opportunity through death and retirement of present farm operators. In round numbers that means approximately 200,000 annually must find jobs in urban industry, or crowd the agricultural labor market, or settle down to a subsistence level of existence, or crowd some other person out of his tenancy or sharecropper position. The same is true of the 350,000 to 500,000 agricultural workers who will be displaced as a result of technological changes during the next decade.

The appalling magnitude of this many-sided problem should not deter us from meeting it. In all its ramifications and complications, we may boil it down to several fundamental issues which, in my judgment, the researches of the past few years have tendered our democracy in fairly sharp and precise terms. The first question we must answer is this: What is the Nation going to do to provide a useful place in our society for surplus rural people who feel forced to move in order to live? Recognizing this problem of adjustment as necessarily involving a considerable movement of peoples from one area to another, one occupation to another, and, necessarily, one community or State to another, we have our second issue: What is the Nation going to do by way of organizing and conducting a determined and intelligent fight on the destitution that is bound to occur during this process of movement and adjustment, particularly that destitution which is too large for purely local groups to handle without national aid, leadership, and coordination? It is not necessary to dwell at length here on the sad fact that the year 1940 had not brought a solution or even the adoption of a plan or policy that promised a satisfactory answer to these two fundamental issues.

Yet the decade from 1930 to 1940 witnessed earnest and significant attempts to analyze the scope and character of the task; it witnessed the first few feeble, but nonetheless encouraging, efforts to build a democratic machinery for solution of the dilemma; it witnessed the stimulating recognition of the facts by an increasingly large and intelligent citizenry. The early work with transients, the first measure of farm relief, the development of the great program of the Farm Security Administration, and the splendid efforts of many private groups, local and State agencies, can be viewed as positive accomplishments. Yet these works, no matter how worthy or zealously furthered, are pale and insignificant beside the magnitude and scope of the problem that our research and investigations have clearly etched for the American people to see and understand.

But now, in the year 1941, this great giant, and sometimes sleeping America of ours is throwing off its lethargy and mobilizing its mighty resources in a huge effort to make our national defense secure. We here today will commit a grievous error in judgment if we fail to consider fully agricultural migration and its byproduct problems in the context of this mighty national-defense program and the eventual transition which must come when the crisis is past. For our program of national defense is activating forces that are beginning to answer in some fashion on a temporary emergency basis the broad issues I have described. If we can bring an understanding of the problems of agricultural migration to those who are in charge of formulating and administering our national-defense program, we will do a great service to both national defense and the victims of underlying economic problems that are a part of agricultural migration. Indeed, the way in which our defense program is shaped may have much to do with the ultimate destiny of uncounted millions of our rural population who face destitution.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of this phase of the current situation. Perhaps a few illustrations will clarify the full meaning of this emphasis. Stories of farm labor shortage in certain areas, stories of rural idleness in other areas, stories of the lack of trained skilled workers for our expanding defense program make us conscious that the absence of adequate techniques of utilizing our wasting manpower is a peril both to our defense effort and to the welfare of our rural population. Our Nation-wide system of public employment exchanges must be geared for an effective national effort that will decasualize the agricultural farm labor market and maintain a well-ordered system for fitting the available manpower into this great national effort. Now there is both a unique demand and opportunity to develop vigorously for vocational training and guidance for farm-reared people into nonfarm occupations. Such a program will assist in the mobilizing and training of our manpower for defense activities; it will facilitate the movement of surplus rural population into nonfarm occupations, thereby reducing the number of farm people to be supported by the farm income of any given size; it would greatly increase the flexibility and mobility of farm-reared youth and displaced farm families, and to that extent facilitate readjustments to a normal economy when we have accomplished our defense aims.

To protect and render effective this organization of manpower and to avoid needless suffering and hardship by those rural people who are moving now in search of a place to serve, we must regulate those private recruiting agencies to conform to the public interest. Unnecessary and disruptive labor recruiting, training for unnecessary surpluses at given points, and the stimulation of useless and harmful migration must be avoided.

It is reported that 40 percent of the young men examined have been found unfit to serve in their country's Army. Again, those who would defend their country in the years to come, and those who would relieve destitution of rural people, find a common aim and objective; namely, the provision of adequate health and educational facilities for our needy people in both rural and urban areas.

Many of the problems of caring for needy rural migrants encountered in the 1930's have now become part and parcel of our national effort to relieve destitution in so-called defense migration. The provisions of adequate housing facilities and additional educational and health facilities, the assistance to local communities in meeting large influxes of population have now become a vital part of our defense program. As such they are an answer to the same problems of agricultural migration, because many of those whose needs as migrants will now be met are the rural people whose plight was too often ignored in the 1930's.

Stories that some of our vital industries have productive capacities far below that necessary to produce the materials essential for defense and the normal pursuits of life reveal the unhappy fact that the vain and fruitless migration of our rural population during the thirties in search of a place in our industrial life was a tragedy not only for them but for the Nation. Now, there is a great opportunity, indeed, a necessity, for organizing our economy so that this hitherto wasting human resource can be usefully employed. Perhaps we are at the beginning of a permanent rehabilitation of these needy rural folk. Certainly no opportunity must be overlooked in the location and development of new industrial capacity that looks to a better life for them in the post-defense years. Stories of trailer life, based upon defense work, lived by those who view their employment as a temporary condition, make us conscious of the fact that many millions of our fellow Americans have come to look with skepticism upon the permanence of their place away from worn-out land or the subsistence farms. We must not allow them to plan for a future that is another dose of the bad medicine of the 1930's.

All of these points touching the defense program and the relief of the destitute rural peoples have a common thread. They indicate that the failure of a democratic society to solve the problems that are related to agricultural migration is a threat to the very survival of that society when confronted either by brute totalitarian economy or military force or subversive totalitarian philosophy. Hence, we must bend our every effort to develop plans and policies for our current defense program that are sufficiently broad, flexible, and integrated with other plans and policies that they will make a substantial contribution to agriculture and national welfare in the post defense period. The lessons taught in the 1930's, confirmed in 1940 and 1941 must be put into effective practice now and in the future. We cannot wait until tomorrow; we must begin today. The struggle for democracy in which we are now engaged will continue in a post war world. It will demand the same level of national attention to problems related to agricultural migration as we are freely and willingly giving to problems of military defense. I venture to assert that the lessons we are learning today in putting America to work show conclusively that those who said before, "It cannot be done," were guilty of a grievous error and a lack of confidence in the vitality of the democratic process.

In conclusion, let me express my appreciation for this opportunity to participate in the discussion by this group of a social policy to cope with the problems that are related to destitute migration. In summary, let us assume that this policy must look to a definite, permanent, and integrated solution; it must broadly attack the underlying causes of destitution and not cramp the healthy process of adjustment through migration; it must be broad and bold in scope; it must be initiated in high gear now as a part of and a worthy aid and accompaniment to our national-defense program; it must be carried through into the post-war period.

Moratorium in Industrial Strife

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY ALBERT W. HAWKES

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Albert W. Hawkes, president, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, delivered June 7, 1941, at Washington, D. C., over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co:

Tonight, as president of the Chambtr of Commerce of the United States I want to talk to the American people regarding the absolute necessity of a moratorium on all industrial strife in every business and industry which directly or indirectly affects our national defense preparation.

First things must come first. No subject before you could be more important than national defense against aggression. On it depends the question of success versus failure in defense of individual liberty—the sustaining of representative democracy versus dictatorship.

This great defense will not be created by good intentions—lip service—or through seeking for and insisting upon the immediate and complete solution of all ideals in the social and economic fields, during this time of national defense preparation. The questions of amount of profit—individual reward or advancement—under these desperate conditions, must take second place in our race for preparedness.

On May 1, 1941, at its annual meeting in Washington, D. C., the National Chamber of Commerce passed its moratorium resolution. This, in effect, urged capital and labor to declare a cessation in strikes, shut-downs, and lock-outs, during the entire time required for national defense preparation. This resolution declared that unless this moratorium in industrial strife can be brought about by voluntary agreement between the parties—compulsion by law is almost certain to result.

When a boy, I took a horse to water and once when he refused to drink, I forced his nose under water He not only refused to drink, but blew the water all over me. "You can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink." I believe this is the same with compulsion of individuals by law in a democracy.

In my opinion this Government should not attempt to control anything in the affairs of its citizens by indirect law that it is unwilling to control by direct law.

I call your attention to the fact that one compulsion leads to another compulsion—and the symptoms of dictatorship rapidly spread from group to group, and from one field of business and industry to another field. Such compulsion and embryonic dictatorship is seldom removed when the emergency is passed. This is particularly so if our social and economic system is disorganized or suffering from "high blood pressure." It is for this reason that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and I, as its president, plead so strongly for local activities in arousing cooperation between capital and labor, public officials, and the public itself, to establish this moratorium.

We urge full support of the American people right now for this moratorium in industrial strife.

Our purpose must be to eliminate antagonistic feelings and, through an aroused and expressed public opinion, call for the best there is in all of our people on the basis of fair regard by all for the rights of each. An aroused public opinion is the thermostatic regulator and control in a representative democracy.

After talking with hundreds of men in the ranks of labor throughout the country, I am convinced there is no fairer group of American citizens. I have every faith and confidence that when they recognize the need for this moratorium they will do their full share to accomplish it.

I am equally certain that practically all in the ranks of capital and management are determined to do—and will do—their full duty in this emergency. They are both vitally interested in establishing the safety of our people and themselves.

What we need is an awakening to a recognition that this is a reality on the stage of life—not a fiction or drama on the amusement stage or screen. When both capital and labor discover that this is a real tragedy in the life of the human family and that each and every one of us must act his own part on the stage of life, I am convinced they will satisfactorily answer the emergency call of our people.

Plans for this moratorium in industrial strife have already been inaugurated in a great many communities, large and small, throughout the United States. Many of these plans—all of which rest upon local direction by the proper people and organizations in each community—are working most effectively and have an almost perfect score in the accomplishment of the results we are seeking. Their success has depended upon two things: (1) The fact that the local organizations and people know their own community and institutions best and are qualified to handle the situation, and (2) a recognition of the fact that labor is as patriotic as capital and management.

The moratorium committee in these successful communities has been composed of the best local labor leaders, the best local industrial management, the best public-spirited, patriotic citizens, and the proper and interested local government officials. Such a committee, representing all phases of the local life and determined that this Government shall prepare for national defense, easily wins the wholehearted approval of public opinion.

The members of these moratorium committees recognize that full production requires this moratorium, and that the moratorium, to be effective, must be the result of the voluntary act of the parties involved.

Local chambers of commerce and organizations which do not normally touch labor problems can, nevertheless, as a patriotic duty, assist in establishing this representative committee in the various communities for service in this period when the Nation is confronted with the greatest danger in its history.

This plan is not an idealistic one. It is a most practical and effective plan for the accomplishment of our national-defense program, with the least delay.

This national defense is imperative, in order to protect the lives, liberties, and the American way of life for all of our people. Nothing now will satisfy the American people—except the most efficient and effective production of all things and parts of things required for full defense, without the slightest deliberate and unpatriotic interruption.

Some say a few strikes or lock-outs are to be expected in a democracy. I say—and I believe that 90 percent of the American people will agree with me—that one strike or lock-out, or the loss of 1 hour, from here on to final preparation—is 1 hour too much of interruption.

The foundation of a continuing representative democracy is a satisfied people. Let us remember that a representative democracy will survive only through voluntary cooperation in all things necessary for, and vital to, the welfare and protection of a given nation of people—with fair regard for all, and disregard for none.

It seems to me our representative democracy is challenged, right now, to prove that a free people can voluntarily cooperate and produce—on time—everything from instruments of defense to and including an army, a navy, and an air force—competent to defend itself successfully against any attack by an enslaved people driven to production and directed in aggression by a dictator.

With voluntary cooperation and the successful establishment of this moratorium in industrial strife—our democracy will successfully prepare and victoriously defend itself against any who may attack it. That successful defense will cause free men throughout the world to take new heart. They will then know that human individual freedom can survive. The lamp of liberty will continue to burn, because free men have, in a grave crisis, found a way to bury unsolved personal differences—have found a way to create a moratorium in industrial strife and thereby provide the protection needed for the safety of the people in the greatest hour of need and peril since our Nation was founded.

Voluntary cooperation cannot be legislated. It must result from the faith of the parties in one another and their determination to work together in a common cause. Let all in the ranks of capital and labor remember every hour of every day that public opinion is the only master in a representative democracy. He who fails to recognize the power of public opinion and to court its favor, will miss its support in his hour of need

If labor and capital would avoid the pressure that comes from an unfavorable public opinion, which leads to unsatisfactory and dangerous compulsory laws—they must now recognize the call for production by this strong majority public opinion.

I am just as much concerned about our situation within our country as outside of it. I would be more concerned about the conditions internally were they not still within the control of free men. I have faith in the American people—when they are aroused from indifference and brought to a realization of the danger that now confronts them. Indifference and lack of enlightenment are the two greatest enemies of a representative democracy. Lincoln said:

"As a Nation of free men, we must live through all time—or die by suicide."

I have always believed no one in his right mind commits suicide. I also believe the American people are still in their right minds. Therefore, I believe we are not going to commit "national suicide"—but rather, we, as a Nation of free people, are going to find a way to work together for our own protection and salvation.

If collective bargaining, in good faith between the parties, fails—then voluntary mediation should promptly follow.

Mediation by a board of our fair-minded fellow Americans, properly appointed with due consideration for the rights of each and all, will cure all apparent injustices. In the few cases where this human agency fails to effect a full and satisfactory settlement for all—then public opinion says this temporary failure must not stop vital defense production.

Our future depends upon our defense production—against war production of possible aggressors. We must not take the chance of defeat through delaying production while any of us holds out for his own way against the final judgment of a fair mediation group. If we allow such delay to occur, then indeed have we lost faith in our democratic processes.

France tried a violation of these democratic principles. Her people argued and wrangled and dissipated time. The nation lost its fight and went down in tragic defeat—a defeat worse than death to free men.

In 1776 our courageous forefathers established here the individual freedom of man and much of the world followed our example. In the 1940's, if we preserve this heritage for ourselves and those to follow, such an accomplishment will redound to the benefit of mankind throughout the world. The hour is late—but not too late.

Self-restraint is the first requirement for the successful government of ourselves or our Nation. Let us demonstrate we have self-restraint and know how to use it. Let us think things out, instead of fighting them out.

Perhaps today there are too many people preying on one another, and not enough people praying for one another.

Let us tonight voluntarily declare three moratoriums:

1. A moratorium in name-calling and all that creates and sustains class hatred and bitterness.

2. A moratorium on anything that partakes of sophistry in politics or business. Simple, direct, and honest statements of fact will lead the people into unity; and

3. Let us establish this most important moratorium in industrial strife in all national-defense plants and business throughout the Nation.

I appeal to every man and woman in the ranks of labor, management, and capital—to prove now that free men, without being compelled by law, can do the right thing in this great emergency. We are all still free to do the right and necessary thing. Let us do it, and thus preserve our individual freedoms.

This is not an ordinary situation. It is freemen's last call to defend themselves successfully. Will we all respond? I can hear your answer. It is, yes.

The National Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the able address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] over Station KGIR at Butte, Mont., on June 4 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have made this hurried trip to Montana because it offered me an opportunity to come before my constituents at a time of great national emergency.

First, let me express my sincere thanks to Mr. Craney and station KGIR for this opportunity to place on record in plain and simple language my views with regard to the important national problems confronting our country.

I regret that in these dangerous times there should appear to be the slightest variation in judgment on national problems of the country between myself and my colleagues on the Montana delegation to Congress. I have a very high regard for the Members of our delegation in Washington, and I do not wish to have it understood that anything I say here is intended to reflect in any degree on their views or opinions. We are all acting with sincere convictions to represent the best interests and welfare of our country.

We each have the manifest right to stand firmly by our convictions and publicly express our views and opinions with the fullest freedom and candor. This is democracy. It is important, under our system of government, that every citizen should be entitled to freely and fearlessly express his or her opinions on public issues. These debates are essential in order to arrive at safe and sound conclusions.

The whole Nation is striving to arrive at the truth; and, my friends, I feel very confident that eventually the people of the United States will stand united in a common policy to meet the dangerous threats which have been leveled at our safety and security. I feel certain, also, that the differences of judgment which may at present appear to exist among the members of the Montana delegation will soon be resolved in the best interests of our country. As these national questions become clarified and better understood, we will all be found standing stanchly back of the President, our lawfully elected leader and Commander in Chief of the armed forces.

As evidence of a gradual development of national unity and solidarity now in progress, I point to the action of the Detroit Free Press, a former uncomprising opponent of the President's foreign policies. The Detroit Free Press now pledges its complete support to the President in national policy as defined in his recent radio address declaring a national emergency. In a dramatic and patriotic appeal for unity, that outstanding American newspaper in its editorial column says:

"The Free Press pledges its complete support to President Roosevelt as our Commander in Chief. He will have our unlimited support in any measures designed to safeguard the Nation against foreign aggressors, enemies of the Republic within our borders, and all other termites who would destroy the priceless liberties and blessings handed down to us by our brave and sturdy ancestors."

Continuing its pledge, it says:

"The President has spoken. In his memorable address he has defined his foreign policy in unmistakable words. Mr. President, in this spirit of adherence to our finest tradition, we pledge to you our loyal support. May God be with you."

Of course, we are all devoted to our country and moved by a single motive—to protect and defend the United States, and strive, as far as we are humanly able, to deliver it from the perils which threaten it.

Unfortunately, some confusion seems to have arisen because of the storm of conflicting views which have been recklessly expressed. Nevertheless, we witness a striking unity when we come to analyze the situation carefully—we find ourselves in full accord on all the fundamental issues.

First. We are united in support of the national-defense program. We favor its rapid advancement as essential to the safety and security of our country in the face of the present world crisis.

Second. In accordance with national legislation, we are for the fullest possible aid to Britain and the other democracies ruthlessly attacked by Hitler.

Third. We stand absolutely together for the defense of the Western Hemisphere and the defense of our rights under the traditional American policy of freedom of seas.

Fourth. We are absolutely opposed to the entire Nazi political philosophy and its fanatical challenge to democracy and Christianity.

Fifth. We all fervently hope and pray that Hitler and his ruthless war machine may soon meet with ignominious defeat at the hands of Britain and the other European nations upon whom he has inflicted the most barbaric and inhuman warfare in all history.

Sixth. We all agree and are fully conscious of the fact that if Hitler wins and becomes master of the Atlantic, it will mean, under the tripartite agreement, Japanese domination on the Pacific. It will mean that our future national safety and security will be jeopardized, our way of life will be seriously altered, and our future existence as a democratic nation will be threatened.

Seventh. We are all opposed to war. We are all opposed to sending any expeditionary forces to Europe to fight and die on foreign battlefields. We all agree, also, that we will fight with all our might to defend the United States and repel any attack against its sovereignty.

Each one of my colleagues subscribes to the foregoing points. We stand shoulder to shoulder on these principles. It is only in regard to our faith and our confidence in the President of the United States and his alleged motives and designs that we appear to be in disagreement. On my part, I have a high faith and confidence in the integrity and the patriotism of President Roosevelt. I believe that he made a desperate effort to avert this world war, and I believe that all his policies have been designed with a view of preserving the peace of this country and avoiding the danger of involvement. In the President's recent fireside chat, he said:

"I have said on many occasions that the United States is mustering its men and its resources only for the purpose of defense—only to repel attack. I repeat that statement now. But we must be realistic when we use the word 'attack.' We have to relate it to the lightning speed of modern warfare. Some people seem to think that we are not attacked until bombs actually drop on New York or San Francisco; but they are simply shutting their eyes to the lesson we must learn from the fate of every nation that the Nazis have conquered."

I subscribe to that statement of the President's. If the Axis Powers take any step which, in the judgment of our naval and military experts, constitutes an attack on this hemisphere, that attack must certainly be repulsed. Every American must subscribe to that doctrine. No nation could long exist if it failed to assert the right of self-defense. This is a matter of scientific naval and military judgment and strategy. We must be alert and not sleep with an enemy at our gates.

I have complete confidence that the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, acting with his military and naval advisers, will abide by his promises to the people of this country. I have confidence that he will act only in the necessary defense of the Nation.

The great difficulty which is presented to the country in this crisis is due to the fact that there are some who profess to have no confidence in the President or in the officers and officials of the Army and the Navy. Such a stand, in my judgment, is an outright condemnation of our whole democratic system. That is the position of Colonel Lindbergh, who calls for the repudiation of the President and the establishment of a new leadership. Apparently, he wishes to shackle the President; he wishes to limit and circumscribe the judgment of the Army and the Navy in carrying out their functions in the national defense, upon the pretense that they cannot be trusted. This is simply a repudiation of our Constitution.

Colonel Lindbergh, in his speech at Philadelphia on May 29, was cheered to the echo by his sympathetic and unthinking followers when he asserted: "It is now time for us to turn to new policies and new leaders." What does that mean? It means the repudiation of President Roosevelt as the properly constituted leader of the Nation. That is freedom of speech with a vengeance. Lindbergh is preaching confusion and chaos. The only way I know of to take the leadership away from President Roosevelt and the National Government is by revolution.

All over the Nation efforts have been on foot, backed and encouraged by enemies of our country, intended to discredit the President and confuse and befuddle the minds of the people. They repudiate the Lend-Lease Act, although it is the law of the Nation. Some contend that we should discontinue our efforts to aid Britain and, like Lindbergh, even contend that we should prepare now to get along with Adolf Hitler because he is already the victor.

It seems obvious to me that the greatest danger that confronts our country is not so much the danger of being invaded by a foreign foe but the danger of being destroyed from within—the danger of encouraging sabotage and treason; the danger of undermining our National Government. Already sabotage is suspected in several sections of the country and, in all probability, widespread sabotage incidents will be increased as a result of this wild orgy of demagogery and wholesale condemnation and abuse of the President and his policies.

I am not one of those who agree with Lindbergh that Hitler has won the war. Notwithstanding his success in the battle of Crete, and the possibility that he may even win the struggle in the Near East and become the master of the Mediterranean, I am confident that he will be ultimately defeated. I believe it is possible that, if we stand firm in support of the President and his national policies, this country may find it unnecessary to become involved in actual warfare. The military experts who have been studying the war have formed the definite conclusion that this war will end when Britain arrives at the point where it can challenge Hitler's supremacy in the air. The strain at the present moment is severe and the threat of invasion of England continues. Nevertheless, there is definite information that the British air forces are daily expanding and, as our national-defense program proceeds, we will very soon be sending them enormous supplies of airplanes and defense materials. Under our national-defense program we are now turning out 1,500 planes per month, and this will be steadily increased until we reach a rate of 40,000 a year. As this production expands and is added to the British production, it is only a matter of time when the British air forces will be able to deliver blow for blow to the Nazi powers. When that moment comes, the handwriting will be on the wall and Hitler's forces will crumble, rendering American armed intervention wholly unnecessary.

Every recognized authority on air power now concedes that this war will be won in the air. While the rest of the world slept, Hitler had prepared, with all possible speed, his powerful fleets of air bombers. He took the world by surprise. His might in the air could not be resisted. His powerful air forces have accounted for all his spectacular victories. It was the threat of Nazi air power that compelled Britain to falter at Munich. It was Nazi air power that pulverized Poland's defenses at the commencement of the war. It carried the ruthless Nazi armies to speedy victory in Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France. It quickly bombed the Balkans into submission and drove the British out of Crete. To offset this tremendous air force of Hitler's is the task of Britain and the nations of the world threatened by his program of world aggression.

Hitler has now spread his forces all over the European Continent. His difficulties are beginning. He has already fallen away behind his schedule. According to his original program of aggression, England should have fallen last year. Then his next schedule fixed this past spring for the fall of England. It has now come to be recognized that he can never invade Britain. He can never capture the British Fleet, and the British blockade is daily becoming more effective. It is the definite conclusion of the ablest experts that Germany can never gain possession of the British Isles, subdue the British Fleet, or break the British blockade. Therefore, Hitler can never gain free access to the seas, and must eventually fail. Thus, as the British power in the air expands, it is only a matter of time when Hitler will be utterly defeated.

The greatest need in this country to escape the threat of world domination by Hitler is the unity of the American people. Hitler has been led to believe that this country is disunited and he is banking on the failure of America to extend timely and substantial aid to the British. This accounts for the enormous program of propaganda that has been spread over the country, designed to stir up disloyalty and disunity among the American people. The Nazi government has maintained a propaganda organization in New York City which has covered the country with tons of publications designed to confuse and disunite the American people. The most unfortunate thing about the present situation is that we have in this country people who are innocently deceived and misled, and who are unconsciously serving as "fifth columnists" for Hitler in his plans to destroy democracy and set up his pagan system of totalitarianism in the world.

The greatest disappointment that the American people have ever experienced is to find Charles Lindbergh, hero of the first solo flight across the Atlantic, contributing to this disunity in the Nation at a time when complete solidarity is so essential to our national and hemispheric defense plans. I do not detract from the courage and daring shown by Lindbergh in his flight across the Atlantic. His success, however, was due mainly to American engineering skill that developed the plane and the engine that carried him safely over the ocean. I think, therefore, it is absurd to assume that because of that spectacular feat he has become a military expert and first statesman of the country. He merely assumes authority to tell us that we must discontinue all effort to support Britain and permit Hitler to become master of the world.

This country will never follow such craven advice. America will never take a stand alongside of Hitler in a world governed by the cowardly and fiendish philosophy of nazi-ism. The American people will never surrender to such a system. Hitler's treachery to the small democracies of Europe which have been invaded and enslaved, his ruthless and wanton murder of thousands of cowering and defenseless men, women, and children in the dead of night, his destruction of the cathedrals and historic structures of the Continent, and his demoralization of religion and culture have all but blotted out European civilization. This should be a warning to us in this country as to what will be in store for us if Hitler should succeed in becoming the master of Europe and the dominant power on the Atlantic.

We are a peaceful people in this country; we are all opposed to war. No sane person wants war. Our national policies are all designed to keep us out of war. But, let me say to you, the surest way to keep war away from America is to support the lawfully constituted Government of the United States, and not the pusillanimous leadership of Lindbergh, who regards with complacency the threatened fall of democracy and a Hitler dictatorship of the world.

When this subject was before the Congress of the United States I expressed myself on the floor of the Senate and made two radio addresses over Nation-wide broadcasting systems in support of the views I have expressed. I had not intended to speak again. It seemed to me that the country was being confused by the multiplicity of discordant voices on the air and the scores of propaganda organizations conducting forced mass meetings—contributing, not light, not understanding, but confusion.

I have been trying to devote my time in Washington to constructive work relating to our own State problems as affected by this great emergency. I have been kept very busy with that work. I would not come here today to make this address, except that I feel that I owe it to the people of Montana to let them know that I stand now where I have stood consistently throughout this period of national crisis. I am supporting the National Government of the United States. I am upholding the arm of the President, and backing up the entire national-defense program; seeking to have Montana play a noble and patriotic part in the Nation's defense. I feel that if I took any other course I would be recreant to my oath of office, false to my State, and false to my country.

Platform on Interstate Migration of National Conference of Social Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

PLATFORM PREPARED AT MEETINGS HELD IN ATLANTIC CITY JUNE 2-3, 1941

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the platform on interstate migration prepared by the special committee on interstate migration of the National Conference of Social Work for the consideration of its members in connection with the problem of migration.

There being no objection, the platform was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREAMBLE

Migration is necessary in America. It offers new opportunities in normal times. It makes possible the full use of our resources in times of crisis. National defense demands migration, and America is on the move. This is no new phenomenon. America has always been on the move. Now the process is more rapid and more people are involved.

Migrants are people. This fact must be recognized if we would solve the problems associated with migration. Since migrants are people, their problems must be treated on the basis of individuality, regardless of length of residence.

Though they present problems, migrants contribute to the well-being of the communities to which they come and to the Nation as a whole. Most migrants are unrecognized. Though they are newcomers, they are clothed, housed, fed, and employed sufficiently to require no public assistance or special attention. Yet along with their benefits to the community these migrants bring difficult problems affecting all phases of community life. Those who fail to make a go of it and require assistance represent a small percentage, yet large numerically, of the total migrant group. A still smaller number actually ask for aid. But the failure to provide such help, the restrictions of settlement and residence requirements and the antagonism of communities to needy newcomers, aggravate the situation and magnify its related problems out of all proportion to their actual size.

To obtain the maximum benefits from the mobility of our population, to establish methods of dealing with the problems of migration whether in normal or abnormal times, and to eliminate discriminations which impair our national security, intensified efforts must now be directed toward the development of programs designed to overcome the problems that grow out of the movement of people.

In furtherance of these efforts, the time has come to present, through the medium of this committee, a recommended platform on interstate migration. It is not designed as a guaranteed cure-all. It recognizes certain existing situations and offers recommendations for dealing with them. It is presented as a basis for discussion at the National Conference of Social Work.

SITUATION

The revival of industry in large centers, the establishment of new defense industries, and the building of large military camps in small communities are stimulating a movement which is necessary, but which also magnifies community problems. Unguided movement of potential workers results in accentuating distress and waste of manpower.

Defense activity may reduce resident relief rolls. At the same time, it increases the relief needs among nonresidents, for there are more migrants searching for employment. Many are placed and need no further help; others secure employment but are soon laid off; others are unsuccessful in obtaining work; still others are unemployable. They need help but are ineligible. Some communities are unable to finance relief even to needy residents. Federal aid through the Social Security Act and Federal employment on projects of the W. P. A. are relieving distress, but many resident persons requiring help are unable to secure aid through these programs. Migrants do not receive Federal aid through the Social Security Act because of State residence requirements In general, migrants cannot obtain local relief because of settlement and residence laws. Migrants are not aided by W. P. A., although W P. A. regulations permit such assistance, because of local unwillingness to certify nonresidents, quota limitations, and the recruiting of workers from relief rolls, for which migrants cannot qualify.

People in distress are denied help, not on a basis of unproven need, but on an artificial criterion of length of residence. The unfilled need creates continuing problems which only aggravate the situation.

Settlement and residence laws vary widely throughout the country, so that migrants soon become "Stateless." Residence requirements have become more and more stringent during the past few years. The prospect of securing uniformity or abolition of settlement and residence requirements is not bright. Their undesirable effects might, however, be circumvented and thereby lead to their ultimate elimination.

Health hazards exist for both the community and the migrant because of the lack of medical care. Varying educational standards within the Nation are a threat to the development of citizens capable of taking responsibility in community life.

Arbitrary restrictions on the free movement of people within the United States are undesirable, but people are now leaving home and joining the migrant stream when assistance or advice at the source might prevent wasteful and unnecessary migration.

Government and private agencies, local, State, and National, are concerned with the problems of interstate migration. Sporadic attempts are made to deal with emergency situations. Studies and surveys are conducted without sufficient appreciation of related efforts by other organizations. States and localities have no official place to turn for guidance in dealing with their migration problems. Duplication of effort, waste, and confusion result.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Committee on Interstate Migration of the 1941 Conference of Social Work regards as fundamental the principle that migrants shall be accepted and cared for, if necessary, where they are and on the same basis as residents. In other words, there shall be no arbitrary distinction between people in distress based upon length of residence or settlement status. Toward this end, the committee has, therefore, prepared the following platform and presents it as a basis for discussion at the committee's sessions at the 1941 National Conference of Social Work.

1. Federal grants-in-aid for general relief shall be made available to the States to aid those not eligible under present categories of the Social Security Act, and for whom work on public-work projects is not suitable or available.

2. Federal grants-in-aid for general relief shall be contingent upon the acceptance of a State plan which will guarantee assistance to all who require it, regardless of any settlement or residence requirement.

3. Federal aid to States involving assistance or service to individuals, including health and medical care services and education and vocational guidance programs, shall be conditioned upon the willingness of the States to extend such benefits to all requiring them, regardless of residence or settlement restrictions.

4. The insurance provisions of the Social Security Act shall be extended to include occupations not now covered and provision shall be made for simplified and equitable payment of unemployment-insurance benefits to persons crossing State lines.

5. Increasing use shall be made by workers and employers of expanded employment services on a regional and national basis to guide workers to job opportunities, both in industry and in agriculture, to prevent as far as possible wasteful and aimless movement in search of employment, and to reduce distress resulting from the concentration of surplus workers at points of potential employment.

6. Loans to maintain competent farmers on their land and to reestablish them on a self-sustaining basis shall be continued and extended to prevent the economic and social losses resulting from their enforced entrance into migratory life.

7. Provision shall be made within the Federal Government for centralized and continuing collection of current information relating to interstate migration, establishing a basis for the placement of such responsibility in Federal administrative agencies as will make possible adequate protection of migrants and the communities to which they come. Provision shall be made for the correlation of Federal administrative agencies concerned with interstate migration so as to establish a central body to which States and localities may refer problems relating to interstate migration.

Condition of National Guard Men and Trainees in Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. OVERTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALEXANDRIA (LA.) DAILY TOWN TALK

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, there appeared a few days ago in the Alexandria (La.) Daily Town Talk, a newspaper published in Louisiana, an editorial with reference to the splendid condition of the National Guard men and trainees now quartered in central Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Alexandria (La.) Daily Town Talk]

A SOURCE OF PRIDE FOR UNCLE SAM

Uncle Sam may well be proud of his National Guard men and the trainees in his new Army, if those who are making their homes at present in the camps of the Alexandria area may be considered as representative of the Army as a whole.

During the few months that they have been in training in central Louisiana the boys from the North have shown that they are attaining an increasingly high physical standard, that their morale is the kind which any general would be proud to have in his army, and that their personal behavior, as a whole, is above reproach.

Good leadership, too, is reflected in the appearance of these young men. It takes more than just a healthy and well-behaved boy to make a good soldier; he must have the leadership of men of sterling character and tested ability.

Indicative of the splendid progress which the guardsmen and trainees are making was the fine display of troop coordination and healthfulness which was presented in the Thirty-second Division's "all out" review at Camp Livingston last week. Alexandrians who witnessed this spectacle of 18,000 suntanned officers and enlisted men parading briskly through a downpour of rain can join wholeheartedly in the commendation of the official reviewer, Maj. Gen. Edmund L. Daley, commanding general of the V Army Corps, who, in a letter to the Thirty-second's leader, Maj. Gen. Irving A. Fish, said:

"I desire to commend you, and, through you, the officers and men of your division for the splendid appearance made by the division during the review on the morning of May 29.

"Despite the heavy rain, the marching and appearance of your command was excellent. The morale of the troops who had concentrated in the area opposite the reviewing stand was still high as they returned to their camps."

It is regrettable that all of the parents of these husky youngsters are not able to visit them in the camps and see them in action. The boys' own admissions in letters back home that they are looking better, feeling better, and weighing more do not tell the full story. Only by seeing them could the troops' relatives and friends have the benefit of a complete record of their remarkable achievements.

Seizure of Plants in Case of Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, in connection with the bill coming up tomorrow proposing a seizure of plants by the Government in order to deal with strikes, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from this morning's New York Times, entitled "The Wrong Solution."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 9, 1941]

THE WRONG SOLUTION

If the administration carries out its threat to seize the Inglewood plant of the North American Aviation Co. today the action cannot in itself end the strike there. When the Government has seized the plant, its next move must be to get the strikers back to work. Its first decision must be the rates of pay and working conditions that it will offer. These will either be those previously maintained by the company, those demanded by the strikers, or something in between fixed by the Government, presumably on the recommendation of the National Defense Mediation Board. This will be, in effect, compulsory arbitration imposed on the strikers. But if compulsory arbitration is to be adopted, it could be adopted just as well without seizing the plants at all. In any case, the question of compulsory arbitration deserves to be discussed and decided on its own merits and not adopted as an unforeseen consequence of some other policy

It is said that under the Army plan of taking over the plant the first action will be to open the picket lines to any men who wish to return to their jobs. Why has not this been done already? What excuse is there for permitting mass picketing to prevent those who wish to return to work from doing so? Here again is an action that could be taken without plant seizure and is quite irrelevant to it. It is said that if the back-to-work movement is insufficient the Army will recruit additional workers through the Civil Service Commission. Why could not the company just as well recruit additional workers from the private labor market? The Government has no magic formula for bringing new men or skills into existence.

There have been few cases in which the strikers are more clearly to blame than this one. The company has been and remains willing and ready to submit the dispute to the Government's Mediation Board. It has promised to make any wage increase retroactive to May 1. It is the strikers who refused peaceful mediation and who declared that they would stay out until the company "settles with us on our terms." They are striking in violation of their own agreement. The local C. I. O. union leaders responsible for the strike have been condemned by their own national leaders. Richard T. Frankensteen, national director of the aviation division of C. I. O., speaking on behalf of himself and of Philip Murray, chairman of the C. I. O., and R. J. Thomas, president of the United Automobile Workers, has denounced the walkout as a "wildcat strike" in which "the infamous agitation and underhand maneuvering of the Communist Party" are clear.

Yet if the Government seizes the North American plant it will not be cracking down on the strikers but on the company struck against. It will be, in effect, rewarding those who caused the strike and punishing those who tried to prevent it. For if, in order to get the men back, the Government should grant generous wage increases and other concessions, it may be precisely such Government seizure that the strikers are hoping to force. If this strike is inspired by the Communists, such an outcome would be in line with their domestic program. The precedent might prove a grave one that would lead to a whole wave of strikes, in the belief that they would force Government seizure and thus lead to better terms for the strikers than they could hope to extract from private industry. Such a result could only demoralize the defense effort and lead to ultimate disillusion.

The strike crisis that the administration confronts is in large part the fruit of the lack of clarity and courage until now in its own labor policy. The President declared in his radio speech of May 27 that labor and capital must defer to Government mediation processes "without stoppage of work." Why, then, has not the President long since requested of Congress that, paralleling the existing Railway Labor Act, precisely this requirement be enacted into law? It is failure to take needed and moderate measures of this sort in the past that has led to the proposal of drastic remedies that would create far more problems than they would solve.

Picketing the President's Home

REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN M. YOUNG

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is entitled to have his home life respected the same as the humblest citizen in this land. The President is a worried man. In this grave national emergency the problems confronting him are tremendous. As a Representative of the people I denounce as outrageous and uncalled for the indignity inflicted upon this hard-working man by the mass picketing in front of the White House.

This blatant group of misguided, misinformed, misdirected, and moronic individuals are infringing upon the personal liberties of the first citizen of this Nation. For more than a month the White House has been picketed by a group of mentally unbalanced, publicity-seeking morons. It is time that someone spoke up regarding this contemptible thing that is being perpetrated, and I take this occasion to express my views and to state exactly what should be done to suppress this.

I believe that all civil liberties must be preserved. Freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom to worship, the right of petition and the right peaceably to assemble are American rights which no one will deny. They are the beacon lights of individual hope and the best guaranty for the perpetuity of our free institutions. This mass picketing of the White House is a public nuisance and a disgrace which should not be tolerated. Furthermore, this hard-working man occupying the most exalted position in the world in a time of grave national emergency should not have to see day after day in front of his yard a motley group of morons parading back and forth carrying signs "School budgets are being slashed"; "Student Union supports peace mobilization"; "Mr. Roosevelt, on November 2 you said, 'We want work and bread' "; "You mothers, keep your sons—No convoys"; "Jim Crow is not democracy"; and other signs similar in character.

I make this statement upon my own responsibility and without suggestion from anyone: "A man's home is his castle." After all, if any publicity-seeking group calling themselves "Peace Mobilization" or any other name desire to hold picketing exercises to show their disapproval of war, here are the Capitol and the Senate and House Office Buildings. Even morons should know that only Congress may declare war.

When individuals picketed the Japanese Embassy in Washington, they were rushed to jail. It is conceded that if a similar group of misguided, equally dimwitted placard-bearing pickets resorted to this same procedure in front of the German, British, or Italian Embassies, or the home of any foreign envoy in Washington, our police would intervene and end such disgraceful conduct.

There are at least eight policemen detailed constantly at considerable public expense to protect these pickets from being assaulted by American citizens. The policemen would no doubt like very much to load these blatant, dim-witted, publicity-seeking pickets, placards and all, into a patrol wagon and cart them to jail.

Ours is a government of law and order. I am thinking not only of a worried man who is head of this great Nation and who is entitled to have his home and front yard respected—I am thinking of the men and women who come here to the Capital of their country, perhaps the only trip they will ever make here, bringing their children with them—they want a good look at the White House where their President lives, and what do the children see first and last as they look toward the White House, they see this ugly little group of morons with their insulting and lying placards, and with the reference to the President of the United States as "Mr. Roosevelt."

If I were a Commissioner of the District of Columbia or the chief of police I would direct patrol wagons to cart off to jail every morning all of this group of mass picketers day after day. I would throw them into a room for investigation, holding each for investigation to determine whether they were Communists, whether they were citizens, what they were doing in Washington, were they in fact suspicious persons, and after the interrogation I would turn on the steam heat, and then if the investigation showed no grounds for further detention I would turn off the steam heat and let them out in the cool of a Washington summer afternoon, and then repeat the process each morning until there were no more pickets in front of this home.

Abe Tikotsky, an electrical worker, who appreciates the blessings of being an American citizen, has the right idea. He is picketing the picketers. His sign reads:

We Americans Protest Communists Picketing the White House.

Enough is enough. I call upon the District of Columbia authorities to abate this public nuisance and end this offense against public decency and the home life of a citizen who happens to be President of the United States.

Taking Over of North American Aviation Plant

REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, you have already had the news report, and therefore know what is going on in the air industries. I have taken this floor many times and pointed out the socialistic, communistic, outlaw labor leaders who would communize industry, betray the rank and file of decent, patriotic American labor, and destroy the defense program.

Many took my statements lightly, but these things have now come to pass, and, unfortunately, in my own district. I have had these people in my district, known them, had to fight them, and therefore was familiar with them. You were not. Had you been familiar with them, perhaps you would not have taken these statements so lightly.

Today we find these socialistic, communistic outlaws defying their own union, the O. P. M., the local authorities, the President of the United States, and the United States Government itself. Their plan was and is to destroy the defense program of the United States, bring about Government ownership, and eventually socialism or communism.

We must now meet this head on and face the facts. The Government of the United States is about to or has already taken over the North American Aviation plant and operate it. If the Government does this, do you think this is going to stop here? I say it will not. This will result in the Government having to take over every airplane plant, the steel, automobile, coal, lumber, and many other industries. What is this? I say this is equivalent to Government ownership and Government operation, which, in turn, is a form of socialism or communism. I, for one, and many Democrats and many Republicans, do not like this, because none of us is a Socialist or a Communist.

We are at a crossroad and this is a precedent. One of these roads leads to socialism or communism. The other will preserve the American form of government as we have known it. I say we should take the American road.

We can no longer be Democrats or Republicans, but must be Americans in choosing this road. The socialistic, communistic road is the one that has been on the program of these outlaw leaders, to make this country a socialistic or communistic Republic. They hope to accomplish this by disruption of production and forcing the Government to take over, and this is their program. Let not the Government be fooled and fall in with this program.

This whole matter could be solved by the President of the United States directing a strong statement to these communistic outlaws, saying that this treasonable conduct and destruction of the defense program will no longer be tolerated; that we are going to have a defense program in spite of them; that under the Constitution of the United States we will not force those to labor who do not want to, but by that same Constitution we will say to these outlaws that they shall not interfere with those who do want to work and these plants shall remain open to those patriotic men in labor who are willing to carry out the defense program; that in order to do this, if necessary, the armed forces of this country will be used to keep every plant in this country open and in production.

If the Government takes over and operates these industries, it will do this:

First. Penalize those patriotic institutions which have cooperated and are now cooperating.

Second. It will put a premium on the efforts of these communistic outlaws to destroy production. Government ownership and operation in France is the best evidence of this.

Third. It will be playing into the hands and carrying out the actual program of the Communists to establish this precedent of Government ownership, with the final result of socialism and communism.

Fourth. The President should say that if they persist in their treasonable attitude of destruction he will ask for laws to put these people in their proper place and protect this country against them.

I think the above suggestion will efficiently handle the situation and preserve the American form of government. It can be done and it should be done.

I have before this House bill 4223, which would make strikes in defense industries treason. If this bill is too strong for passage, I will be glad to modify and revise it in such a way as to penalize only the communistic outlaw labor leader and protect loyal, patriotic American labor, who are willing to do their duty, but who have been put in the position they are in today by this type of destructive leadership because they were unable to protect themselves in their positions.

I think it is also time to take a firm stand and indicate that this country is through and will no longer tolerate such people as Bridges, Freitag, Orgon, Reuther, and other saboteurs and traitors.

I hope also, that the President will investigate the whole administration, take out every Communist, and clean his house of such people as Hillman and Perkins.

There is no question of a doubt but that the Hillman and Perkins element have largely contributed to and brought about this condition. Therefore, the blame is justly and properly placed upon Hillman and Perkins. They have failed. Therefore they must go.

Atlantic Patrol

REMARKS
OF
HON. KNUTE HILL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday of last week Alsop and Kintner in their syndicated column frankly state that the President and his close advisers hope that the Atlantic patrol will produce an incident which can be used as an excuse for taking this country into war. Note also their column in today's Post. These two commentators have been commonly credited with being unofficial spokesmen for the White House. Therefore, there must be some real basis for their statement. However, I sincerely hope that it is not true; but if it is true, this is nothing less than a tragic situation.

Either the President himself should openly repudiate these statements or, failing to do so, thereby indirectly accepting them as his own, the people, the only sovereigns in this Republic of ours, should call him to strict account and demand that he, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, withdraw the Atlantic patrol from all foreign areas conducive to such incidents as mentioned above. He should be bound by his many solemn, oft-repeated promises to the American people during the preelection days. As a servant of these people, as we all elected officials are, he is bound by the highest obligation to obey the wishes of a very substantial majority of these people as expressed in communications both to him and to the Members of both Houses of the Congress. Moreover, the President of the United States, as the head of the executive department of this Government, is definitely bound legally and morally to refrain from usurping the clear and constitutional prerogative of a coordinate branch of this Government—the Congress—to declare or bring on war. That is our duty and ours alone, and we should resent and repudiate any attempt on the part of anyone to encroach on our constitutional authority. The crisis is so serious and the proposed action so momentous that I, for my part, must speak out frankly. I am only one Member of the Congress, but I have taken a solemn oath of office. My official position is not as important as that of the President of the United States, but my duties are as clear and definite as are his, and I have served the people as long as he has. I hereby warn the President that if he persists in a course of provocation in foreign waters that will eventually lead us into taking part in war on foreign soil, I shall personally do my utmost to have such action challenged by the Congress and hold him and his advisers wholly responsible for the dire consequences of such unwarranted an act. The Congress of the United States is in session. If action such as currently attributed to the Chief Executive is necessary, let Congress act in the only constitutional way. With all due respect to the executive department, I, for one, shall insist on performing my duty as a Member of the legislative department. Let us, as men, do our full part in this crisis. May I repeat what I have said on this floor before: Billions for the defense of this Western Hemisphere, but not one cent for aggressive warfare on foreign soil or in foreign waters.

President Roosevelt Should Start a Peace Offensive—Instead of Going to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 21, 1941

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sincerity that I ask President Roosevelt to start a peace offensive instead of going to war. We know that war can bring untold suffering, misery, and want, and no sane man would want to bring war to America. President Roosevelt can lay the groundwork for peace by consulting with the belligerent nations to see what terms of peace might be acceptable. The post-war reconstruction program recently suggested by the Secretary of State Cordell Hull might be of assistance in setting up a peace program.

We know that peace must come to the warring nations at some time. When the smoke of battle has cleared away, America, if it remains out of the war, will be in an excellent position to carry on peace negotiations which might result in a peace program leading the world to freedom from military danger and political intrigue for many years to come. Rational economic reconstruction must follow in the wake of this war or we will again find the clash of arms in another war.

When Secretary Hull suggested that raw-material supplies must be available to all nations without discrimination, he promoted a theory which must of necessity have a salutary effect upon relations between nations. Economic dislocations leading to inaccessibility of raw materials and foodstuffs should be eliminated if at all possible. America can best serve the world by taking a leading part in the reconstruction period following the present war.

The Defense Property Seizure Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ENDICOTT (N. Y.) DAILY BULLETIN

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Endicott (N. Y.) Daily Bulletin:

[From the Endicott (N. Y.) Daily Bulletin]

THE DEFENSE PROPERTY SEIZURE BILL

A bill to give President Roosevelt power to seize for just compensation any private property, real or personal, which may be deemed in the interest of defense during the emergency has been sent to Congress with the approval of the President, the War and Navy Departments, and the Office of Production Management.

All loyal Americans will concede that our Government should have the power to seize property that is essential to national defense if the owners refuse to do their share toward producing articles needed for our Army, Navy, and air force.

Loyal Americans will not concede, however, that the President of the United States, be he Mr. Roosevelt or someone else, should have the power to seize such property, pay for it what he considers fair, with the owner's only redress being suit against the Government, which is a long-drawn-out, costly affair.

More specifically, we quote essential sections of the proposed measure:

"SECTION 1. The President is authorized, when he deems it in the interest of national defense, (a) to requisition and take over, either temporarily or permanently, property of any kind or character, whether real or personal, tangible or intangible * * * which itself or through its exercise or control can be used or is adaptable in any way for national defense * * * and (b) to use and, on such terms as he shall deem satisfactory, to sell or otherwise dispose of, either temporarily or permanently any property, right, or interest requisitioned or taken over pursuant to the provision of this act.

"SEC. 2. Whenever the President shall requisition and take over any property pursuant to the provisions of this act, the person or persons having right, title, or interest therein shall be paid as compensation thereof such sum as the President shall determine to be fair and just.

"If any such person * * * is unwilling to accept as full and complete compensation for such property the sum so determined by the President, such person or persons shall be paid 75 percent of the sum * * * and shall be entitled to sue the United States for such additional sum as when added to the sum already received shall be determined as fair and just compensation."

This bill, if passed, would give the President tremendous power, and, in fact, complete power over the economic life of individuals and business concerns in our country.

The measure also permits the President to take over property of any kind "* * * real or personal, tangible or intangible * * *" which could easily be interpreted to mean that he could seize stocks, bonds, savings accounts, and practically anything and everything that directly or indirectly might affect national defense, in the President's opinion.

We know that a united Nation is essential to defeat of Hitler, but in uniting ourselves to defeat the dictators we should not permit the President to have powers that create a dictatorship.

Effect of this measure, if passed, would be to make Mr. Roosevelt the economic czar of our country. We are absolutely opposed to this, as much as we are anxious for a united country.

We do not believe that the President should have asked for such wide powers, if he truly is interested in a united Nation, for be it Democrats or Republicans, we surely do not care to have the President, whomever he may be, the economic czar of our country.

If Congress authorized creation of a nonpartisan commission to authorize seizure of such property, subject to court review, then this action would met with public approval.

We have followed Mr. Roosevelt without criticism in his stand against the dictators ever since his reelection, but, in the interest of retaining our democratic form of government, war or no war, we cannot support delegation of "life-and-death economic powers" to the Chief Executive. That is not the democratic way.

This smacks of dictatorship. We hope that Mr. Roosevelt will call for revision of this bill and have it rewritten the American way, not à la Hitler, Stalin, or Mussolini, as it stands today.

Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE PONCHATOULA (LA.) ROTARY CLUB

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Ponchatoula (La.) Rotary Club relative to the current friction between capital and labor in vital defense industries.

This resolution well expresses the temper of our people in the present emergency and their determination to take whatever steps are necessary to preserve our country. It is evident that this scramble over profits that is now agitating capital and labor alike in vital defense industries, if not curbed, may well lead to the ruin of our beloved country.

The resolution in question is as follows:

PONCHATOULA ROTARY CLUB,
Ponchatoula, La., May 29, 1941.

At a meeting of the Ponchatoula Rotary Club, the taking formal cognizance of the international problems as affecting these United States, and, deploring and denouncing the improvident stands taken by labor and capital in vital defense production,

It was moved, seconded, and affirmatively voted by each member present that it is the sense of this club that drastic measures be forthwith taken by Congress, independently of any administrative complex, to effectively curb the bent of labor and capital alike against strikes during the national emergency declared by the President,

And to that end our Congressman, Hon. J. Y. SANDERS, Jr., and our Senators, Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON and Hon. ALLEN ELLENDER, be memorialized to give careful consideration to the introduction of a measure in Congress providing that any laborer engaged in any defense work who strikes for any reason shall, ipso facto become an inductee into the armed force at current pay, and, any individual, corporation, partnership or association of persons wilfully provoking and permitting any strike shall suffer fine, imprisonment, or both as fixed by the measure and within the discretion of the court.

PONCHATOULA ROTARY CLUB,
W. D. FRELLUE, President.
H H COLMER Secretary.

Sentiment Grows Stronger for Separate Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to many of us that sentiment is growing stronger in this country for a separate air force. It was my privilege a few days ago to attend the annual convention of the National Aeronautic Association, and at those sessions I found much enthusiasm on the subject, and also a determination to gather our forces and work for action.

In this connection I include two news dispatches:

[From the Washington Evening Star]

FLYERS ORGANIZE CAMPAIGN FOR SEPARATE AIR FORCE

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., June 9.—The Billy Mitchell Air Defense Committee, a group including many of the Nation's prominent figures in aviation, began work today to have a separate air force established in the United States.

James R. Graham, of Chicago, aviation underwriters official, said the National Aeronautic Association and the Aviation Writers' Association already had pledged cooperation.

Donations of $100 apiece were made yesterday by the Birmingham Aero Club and Arlene Davis, Cleveland flyer, as the group banded together at the close of the National Air Carnival.

Earlier a resolution, proposed by I. S. Randall, vice president of Transcontinental and Western Air, Inc., was adopted calling on President Roosevelt and Congress to have the air force made a separate unit.

Mr. Graham said the committee would set up groups for each Army corps area and appoint a key man for each State.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald]

SEPARATE AIR ARM DEMANDED BY EXECUTIVES—COLONEL TURNER SAYS JOB IS TO SELL IDEA TO AMERICAN PUBLIC

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., June 7.—A group of the Nation's leading aircraft manufacturers, airline executives, and aviation writers today demand a separate air arm for the United States armed forces and pledged themselves to lead a Nation-wide drive for its creation.

The group, here for the eleventh annual national air carnival, adopted a resolution favoring the separate air branch and appointed a committee "to convince America that a separate air force is a vital necessity."

APPEAL TO ROOSEVELT

The committee, consisting of Frank Tichenor, editor of Aero Digest; I. S. Randall, associate boach chairman of Transcontinental & Western Airways; and James Graham, Chicago aviation underwriter, was instructed to draft a resolution for presentation to President Roosevelt.

Col. Roscoe Turner, noted speed flier, warned that "an embossed and beautifully worded resolution will not do the job."

"Resolutions sent to Washington end up in the waste basket," he said. "The job, before us is to quickly sell the American people on the idea and get them to write, wire, and telephone their Congressmen to take action."

CREDIT TO GENERAL MITCHELL

Steadham Acker, manager of the municipal airport here and carnival director, pointed out that many men in aviation "who realize the need for a separare air force" may not be able to support the drive openly "because they are at the mercy of people in Washington who have fought the idea for years."

It was suggested that when organization work is completed the group be given the name of the Billy Mitchell Defense Commission, in honor of the late Army general who was discredited because of his efforts to establish a separate force.

MEMBERS JOIN IN EFFORT

I feel certain that a hearing on this important subject will be forthcoming in the near future. I say this after having talked again today with the gentleman from New York, Chairman O'LEARY, of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I have before that group two bills, H. R. 3795 and H. R. 4532, which would bring about a unified air force or a separate department of air defense. Other Members of the House also have bills pending, while others have expressed the hope that the matter be gone into thoroughly. Scores of my colleagues have told me they favored a separate air force, and several of them, including the gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS and Mr. RANKIN] and the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], have taken the floor to say so.

I quote at this point in my remarks from the following editorials:

[From the Cleveland Press]

FOR A SEPARATE AIR FORCE

It has long been known that many important officers of the flying services, particularly of the Army Air Corps, favor divorcing air power from the Army and Navy and giving it an independent, unified status wherein the practitioners of air could work out their destiny without hindrance from groundling tradionalists.

But while Maj. Al Williams and Maj. Alexander De Seversky and other top-ranking airmen not actively connected with the services have crusaded for this objective, active Army and Navy air officers have had little or nothing to say in public. They have known that men at the top were opposed to it.

That reluctance to talk has finally begun to break down. A new book, Winged Warfare (Harper), has just been produced by Maj. Gen. H. H. Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps and Acting Deputy Chief of Staff for Air, and Col. Ira C. Eaker, commander of the twentieth fighter group of the General Headquarters air force.

In their concluding chapter, Major General Arnold and Colonel Eaker have this to say:

"Many feel that eventually the defensive air component of the Nation will be given a status coordinate and commensurate with that of the Army and Navy.

"When that time will come, if it does come, is not yet clear. It came in some of the other nations of the world when the pressure of war was upon them. We shall be fortunate if our time for that reorganization comes in the relative calm of peace or, at worst, in the preparatory and not in the fighting stage."

While they emphasize that there should be no plunging pell-mell into separation of the air from the older services, but rather a gradual evolution, nevertheless they make it plain, despite their cautious language, that they consider a separate air force the eventual goal.

It seems to us that the country is indebted to these two veteran officers for having the courage to speak up in the face of widespread hostility in high places.

In the light of their testimony, Congress can hardly do less than to arrange hearings, such as Representative RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, is now seeking, at which the arguments for and against can be fully canvassed.

[From the Washington Times-Herald]

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

Agitation for a unified air force is increasing, and, as is to be expected, various admirals and generals are building up a backfire of propaganda against the proposal.

SPEAKING OF COOPERATION

One of the counterarguments now being circulated is this: That in the battle of Crete the Royal Air Force failed to cooperate with the Royal Navy sufficiently to beat off the German air-borne invasion. This is claimed to indicate that if we put our air forces under a unified command we'll find our sky fighters snooting and snubbing our sea fighters or land fighters or both in some wartime emergency some day.

The facts are otherwise about the battle of Crete as thus far reported. What happened was that the British air fighters were bombed or gunned out of the island's few usable airports and had to withdraw to Egyptian bases. These were too far away for fighter planes; only bombers of considerable range could continue the air defense of Crete. The battleship and the cruiser are at a bad disadvantage in narrow waters without airplane help, so the German planes eventually were able to drive the British East Mediterranean Fleet away.

That isn't refusal of cooperation; that is simply inability to cooperate. The R. A. F. did the best it could as long as it could base on Crete; and until it was driven off the Germans had very tough going. And, speaking of cooperation, was any lack of cooperation observed between the German Luftwaffe and the German invading soldiers?

Speaking of air power and sea power, the following speculations have just been suggested to us by a friend who studies these things:

TWO VICTORIES FOR AIR POWER

It was air power, almost entirely, that won the Battle of Crete. It was also air power that enabled the British Navy to give the new German battleship Bismarck its death blow.

Well, for two generations or more we have tacitly depended on the British Navy as our Atlantic bulwark. Of late years this understanding has grown into a virtual agreement, whereby the British Navy has policed the Atlantic for our benefit and Britain's, while our Navy has policed the Pacific for Britain's benefit and ours.

Don't these recent victories of air power by land and sea indicate that the British Navy henceforth will be less valuable to us as an Atlantic outer line than it has been up to now?

Isn't this the lesson of these air power victories: That from now on, the best defenses for a continental nation such as the United States, with long coast lines on two oceans, will be long-range bombing planes based on airfields and harbors of both coasts, plus a lot of aircraft carriers to ferry fighter planes out to sea, plus a powerful navy to back up the air-defense forces?

Putting it more briefly: Isn't air power fated to become our first line of defense, instead of sea power?

It seems too early to embrace that theory, quit building the two-ocean Navy, and the 1,500,000-man Army, and go all-out for bombers, fighter planes, and carriers.

UNIFY THE AIR FORCE

But we think it is time to bring our air-war policy abreast of those of Great Britain and Germany in the matter of unifying the air force under its own command. There should be a Secretary for Air in the Cabinet, and the Air Corps Chief should have equal standing with the Army's Chief of Staff and the Navy's Chief of Naval Operations.

The land, sea, and air forces should be trained for cooperation, just as in Britain and Germany. The notion that they couldn't cooperate has been blasted by the fact that they do cooperate 100 percent in both of those countries, which have now had actual war experience for 21 months

It will take an act of Congress to blow the air force out from under the thumbs of the admirals and the generals These gentlemen, like 99.9 percent of the rest of us, love power, and can be depended on to keep a death grip on every ounce of their power as long as they can.

But that the thing has got to be done, we're convinced. Our four separate air forces—Army, Navy, Marine, Coast Guard—now are hobbled and hampered, split up, and tied down, because they are subordinate to men trained to fight by land or sea, not by air. Until we set the air force free, we cannot hope to build the world's most powerful air force, which is the thing we need for the adequate defense of this country

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

RESOLUTION OF RAILROAD COOPERATIVE LEAGUE OF MICHIGAN

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution adopted by the Railroad Cooperative League of Michigan in opposition to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway:

Whereas the agreement between the United States and Canada for construction of the much-discussed and thoroughly discredited St. Lawrence seaway has finally been signed and presented to Congress; and

Whereas Congressman MANSFIELD, of Texas, has now presented to Congress the necessary legislation for authorization of this outmoded, useless, and uneconomical project; and

Whereas the billion dollars plus that will be required for completion of the scheme is badly needed for legitimate national-defense activities, and skilled labor cannot be spared at this time for unnecessary work; and

Whereas nothing has been said of the huge expenditures necessary to deepen harbors and reconstruct port facilities at all our Great Lakes ports to accommodate the larger ships of foreign registry which will enter the Great Lakes through the deepened channel; and

Whereas the taxpayers of this Nation are beginning to question the spending of huge sums for unnecessary undertakings, even when cloaked with the mantle of national defense; and

Whereas we believe the time has arrived when Congress should assert itself on behalf of the people to end this mad orgy of spending our public moneys; and

Whereas there are absolutely no benefits to be gained, on the other hand much is to be lost by such wasteful expenditures at a time when our Nation is on the verge of financial collapse; and

Whereas from a standpoint of either transportation or power the project is not needed at the present time, never will be at a future time, and by no stretch of the imagination can it be considered as a defense measure in the present national emergency; and

Whereas hundreds of organizations, many of them national in scope such as the National Manufacturers Association, National Association of Commerce, Association of American Railroads, the 21 Standard Railroad Labor Organizations, and the American Federation of Labor can see the folly of this costly undertaking which will result in untold damage to millions of American citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we again urge our Michigan Members of Congress to take an active and aggressive part in opposing this pet scheme; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all Michigan Members of Congress, members of the Michigan Legislature, presidents and secretaries of our 92 local units in the State, and all newspapers in Michigan.

W. P. A. Employment in California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentleman of the House, we are going to be asked to consider a bill appropriating about $875,000,000 for the continuation of the Work Projects Administration during the next fiscal year. With that sum of money the Work Projects Administration could provide an average employment of 1,000,000 persons compared to the 1,700,000 employed during this fiscal year. That will represent a curtailment of approximately 40 percent of W. P. A. employment from the fiscal year 1941 through fiscal year 1942.

A question which you may well ask is whether there is a sufficient industrial recovery and expansion in prospect in this country to absorb a very large number of the unemployed and thereby permit the Federal Government to reduce its work-relief expenditures even further.

I think the answer may be found in some of the areas which are experiencing a substantial expansion in industrial activities directly resulting from the defense program. This is occurring in southern California. I sincerely believe that in southern California we are witnessing the optimum type of empoyment conditions which we may expect as the defense program gets going at full speed.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

In southern California there is a shortage of labor. Workers are pouring in from other States to fill these jobs. These workers are by and large young persons, or, in a few cases, individuals with specialized skills. Many other workers are pouring into the State and are not obtaining employment. But the fact remains that there are many jobs available in southern California.

W. P. A. EMPLOYMENT DECLINES—WAITING LIST INCREASES

The Work Projects Administration has evidently recognized that there is a favorable job situation in southern California and has cut its employment authorization each month since the beginning of the year. I would be very much pleased to see this continue except at the same time the number of persons certified for need awaiting assignment, and by that I mean they are eligible for and seeking W. P. A. employment. has been steadily increasing. In January 1941 there were 10,900 persons awaiting assignment, or a number equal to 29.9 percent of those actually working for W. P. A. By the end of April this number had increased to 15,000, or 49.5 percent of the number of persons actually in work. These significant figures are as follows:

Month	Work Projects Administration average monthly employment (assignment load)	Certified persons awaiting assignment	Awaiting assignment load as a percentage of actual assignment load
1941
January	36,500	10,900	29.9
February	36,000	10,400	28.9
March	33,000	12,400	37.6
April	30,300	15,000	49.5

In this period, the total number of persons eligible for W. P. A. employment and actually employed declined from a total in January of 47,400 to a total in April of 45,300 or a drop of only 2,100.

COMPARISON OF W. P. A. ROLLS AND EMPLOYMENT SERVICE FILES

Unemployment has not disappeared in southern California. The active files of the local offices of the State employment services in the eight counties of southern California showed 240,000 persons looking for work in April 1940. As might be expected, there was a reduction since that period of time. In April 1941, 199,000 were registered as seeking work. This means there has been a drop of 17 percent in the number of persons looking for jobs through the local offices of the State employment service in southern California.

What has W. P. A. done in that same period? In April 1940 it employed 39,800 persons. In the same month 1 year later it gave work to 30,300. This shows a decline of close to 24 percent. Thus the Work Projects Administration has reduced its employment far more than the public employment offices have reduced their active files of job seekers.

OBSTACLES TO REEMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY OF W. P. A. WORKERS

It must be quite apparent that in southern California, where there are these ideal opportunities for employment in the defense industries, the W. P. A. load is not going down as fast as might be expected. The reasons for this are quite clear.

First. Age: Industries are giving preference in employment to younger persons. The average age of the W. P. A. worker in southern California is almost 46, compared to an average W. P. A. age of 42.75 for the country. I am told that this age level will increase steadily as younger workers are drawn from the rolls of W. P. A.

Second. Physical handicaps: Another significant explanation for the continuation of the W. P. A. load in southern California is the fact that industries are highly selective in the physical standards required of persons accepted for employment. The W. P. A. in southern California has a large load of competent workers who can perform the tasks assigned to them and who have built public works and rendered various public services which in my opinion are among the finest in the country. Yet close to 30 percent of the W. P. A. workers in that State have minor physical handicaps which exclude them from private industrial employment even under defense conditions. Yet these are people who are daily making an efficient contribution to the W. P. A. projects—both civil and defense—which are being undertaken in that section of California.

Third. Lack of education, specialized skills or training: Another reason for the existence of such a large number of persons on the work program in southern California is their lack of education, specialized skills, or training to meet the current requirements of the defense industries. The aircraft industries have depleted the W. P. A. rolls of all workers considered suitable by that industry at the present time.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING PROJECT

The W. P. A. has conducted an excellent training program in cooperation with the vocational schools and the industries. In fact, as of the end of March 1,530 or 75 percent of the 2,031 trainees who have completed their training for defense jobs have already found employment. Many of the others are expected to be placed in the near future.

But not all of the relief workers in southern California can be trained and placed with industrial standards as they are today. Age, physical condition, lack of education, and even lack of aptitude in some cases prevents the Work Projects Administration from training all these workers for industrial employment.

NATION-WIDE SITUATION

Since there is this need for W. P. A. employment in southern California where there are many jobs available, where some of the job seekers from other States can find employment, where there is frankly a great defense industrial boom, then in other areas of the country which are not so fortunately situated there is at least as great if not a greater need for carrying a substantial W. P. A. program during the next fiscal year. The March estimates for unemployment vary between 6,100,000 reported by the National Industrial Conference Board, 7,500,000 reported by the American Federation of Labor, and 9,071,000 computed by the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

During the coming fiscal year there will be the usual increase in the labor supply of some 600,000 persons. There will also be a special increase in the labor supply because of the attraction of the defense industries for young persons and housewives, retired persons, and so forth, who would ordinarily not be in the labor market. There will also be some increased unemployment because of the curtailment of production in some of the consumer-goods industries. It is reasonable to expect that with unemployment ranging from 6,100,000 to 9,500,000 at present there is likely to be, even under the most favorable circumstances, between five and five-tenths and seven and five-tenths million unemployed during the next fiscal year.

If the Work Projects Administration employs only a million of these, it will be giving work to only 1 person in 5 or 1 person in 7 who are unemployed. This is hardly too large a work program. Since 1936, when W. P. A. employed 33½ percent of the 7,600,000 unemployed persons, there have been employed on the work program a decreasing proportion of the total unemployed in this country. In the calendar year 1940 the 1,900,000 W. P. A. workers represented only 23.7 percent of the unemployed.

With a million employed during the next fiscal year, the W. P. A. may be providing work for only 20 percent of the unemployed. There comes a time when these appropriations may be reduced too much. In my opinion, the appropriation this year should not fall below the $875,000,000 requested by the President, as many people will never be reemployed in private industry, especially that type of women who have been working on the sewing projects. This type of project should be the last to be closed, as it is the only employment these women can get. Thank you.

LETTER SIGNED BY CONSTITUENTS

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this letter expressing the views of my constituents is worthy of your consideration:

GOULD, OKLA., May 24, 1941.

Hon. Victor Wickersham, Member of the Congress from the Seventh Oklahoma District, and all other national lawmakers, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: The undersigned are deeply concerned about the outlook for our democracy. May we suggest with all the earnestness we have that whatever measures that are necessary be taken to accomplish the following:

1. Stop these strikes in defense industry. If it takes a declaration of a national emergency or war or what not, lets get it done. As it is, the country is at the mercy of the C. I. O. which is in turn controlled by un-American and communistic influences. If these elements cannot be handled then we are defeated already.

2. Get help to England by whatever means necessary. We had better get going while there is someone to help us against Hitler. We have played at this matter too long now. Convoy ships and be glad to do it. Forget politics and use the information that has been available to you for months and months. Let's not sleep in fancied security any longer.

3. It has been pointed out to us by the dictators that our democratic form of government is slow and ineffective. Let's get some concentration camps and some teeth in effective laws and some all-out effort. If your house was on fire would you stop at the end of a 6-hour day? Then why let the country be run and ruined on that basis? You, our Representatives, are all we can depend on. Are you going to let us down?

Respectfully,

Harold Clark, M. H. Carrell, C. T. Putnam, E. Q. Anderson, H. T. Summers, O. F. Culpepper, J. M. Nelson, J. W. Curnutt, A. E. Stegall, Mrs. F. E. Johnson, A. F. Dickerson, Willie Sanders, Mrs. G. D. Plight of the Small Manufacturers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY IN THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include herein an article from the Washington Post by Ernest K. Lindley dealing with the difficulty had by small manufacturers in getting defense-contract work. The case history detailed therein describes to a "t" the experiences of the small manufacturers in my district. I believe the same story applies the country over except in the overindustrialized East.

Mr. Speaker, after trying vainly for several months to obtain just a nibble of defense work for the idle men, the idle machines and the idle housing in my district, I have almost arrived at this conclusion:

That the only way we can insure an equitable distribution of defense plants and defense orders is by congressional action. Otherwise the old rule that "them that has gits" will continue to leave the have-nots out in the cold.

From my district you can draw a line 400 miles north to the Canadian border and 1,500 miles west and in this area there is not to my knowledge a single defense plant or a single defense activity. Throughout this great territory, comprising several States, the almost daily appeals from Washington to "work, produce, speed up" have come to have an ironic ring.

The article follows:

A CASE HISTORY—PLIGHT OF THE SMALL MANUFACTURERS

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

Here is a brief case history which illustrates two of the most serious criticisms of the direction of our defense-production program. It is the experience of the head of a mis-western manufacturer of brass, aluminum, and zinc castings and stampings.

The firm has 460 employees, including an engineering staff and 16 tool and die makers, and about 200 machine tools. Its normal business is making such things as parts for refrigerators The firm is in excellent financial condition. Until recently it was working around the clock—some departments on three shifts and others on two 10-hour shifts.

Some months ago its president sized up the dimensions of the defense program and decided they would put a dent in his regular business. He saw that there probably would not be enough brass, zinc, and aluminum to meet all civilian needs. He suspected also that considerable amounts of steel would have to be diverted from civilian to military channels. Some of his business friends belittled his fears, but as the days passed and it became harder to get the metals he needed, he set out to try to get some defense business.

Knowing a little about the Government and the defense agencies which are completely unknown to many small manufacturers—he lost no time in learning what steps he should take.

He was told to offer his services as a subcontractor to the large concerns which had the big defense orders. He was informed that the policy of O. P. M. was to bring these smaller facilities into use by encouraging the big concerns to subcontract parts.

So he wrote to a selected list of prime contractors, 500 in all, stating exactly what his plant was set up to do. He did not get even one serious nibble, much less a subcontract.

He filed with the Defense Contract Service office in Detroit a complete survey of his plant. All he got there was a suggestion that he write to the other regional offices, making sure that he told them he had already been in touch with the Detroit office, since, otherwise, his letters would be forwarded to Detroit.

Finally, the Detroit office invited him to submit bids on 2 fuses for the British. Neither was of a type that previously had been manufactured in this country. Of the 200 machines in his plant, 8—all automatic screw machines—could be used in making the fuses. He submitted a bid, but with it the statement that he could not produce the fuses unless he also got business to keep the rest of his plant going.

Meanwhile, the real pinch has come in supplies of metals. He can get almost no brass, zinc, and aluminum. His refrigerator-making clients have realized they are going to have to find substitutes, including substitutes for a large amount of steel, or else suspend production.

Last week our exhibit X had to lay off his night shift. His 16 highly skilled tool and die makers are idle.

He has machines and men of exactly the type and training desperately needed for defense production. But they are not being used. And unless they are put to work quickly he will have to suspend business entirely and let his organization go to pieces.

Early this week he arrived in Washington to make the rounds of the defense agencies—the Army, the Navy, and O. P. M. He received sympathetic hearings, but up to the time this was written no action.

Billions of dollars' worth of defense orders have been poured forth, largely into big corporations. Huge new plants are being built from the bottom up at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. The machine-tool industry is staggering under a record-breaking load of orders.

Here is a plant ready to go. It has the machines, the trained men, the engineers, and management. It doesn't need a dollar from the Government, either for expansion or working capital. It can make any number of items important to defense without adding even so much as one machine to its equipment, and with a few new machines here and there its scope could be greatly expanded.

It is organized and manned for two- and three-shift operation, while many other producers are still working only one shift.

It wants defense business and has been searching for it. In fact, if it doesn't get it, it may go out of business forever.

If our defense production were efficiently planned, this plant would have been sought out, surveyed, and asked to undertake defense work months ago. But for 2 months it has been knocking at the door, asking for a chance to produce for defense needs.

It is caught on one side by the failure of O. P. M. and the Army and Navy to mobilize quickly and effectively such smaller manufacturers. On the other it is caught by the shortages of metals for civilian use—shortages which are far more acute than most of the businessmen brought in to direct the defense production program had the wit to foresee. The reassuring statements that there would be enough aluminum, enough magnesium, and enough steel have all been pricked by events. There is not enough of any of them, and not enough zinc and brass.

Our exhibit X is confident that there are hundreds, perhaps several thousands, of small manufacturers who are getting caught in this double squeeze. Many are less well-equipped than he is to move immediately into defense production. But, for lack of metal for civilian use, they will have to suspend operation and disband their organizations. Whether they would ever come to life again is doubtful.

Factory Seizure and Production

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE PROVIDENCE (R. I.) JOURNAL

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Providence Journal of Sunday, June 8, 1941:

[From the Providence (R. I.) Journal of June 8, 1941]

FACTORY SEIZURE AND PRODUCTION

The three strikes on the west coast, involving two-thirds of the 52,800 defense workers now idle, are outlaws—that is to say, they have been repudiated by labor itself. They are the products of a minority of irresponsible leaders and recalcitrant workers. In view of the honest, sincere, and reasonable efforts of authorities to settle the disputes, they cannot have the support of the rank and file of workers who see clearly that our national life and security is tied up with the success of the defense program.

Both William Green, president of the A. F. of L., and John Frey, head of the metal-trades division, have repudiated the strike of the 1,700 machinists in the San Francisco shipbuilding industries, called in violation of the master agreement and tieing up millions in naval- and merchant-marine construction.

Philip Murray, head of the C. I. O., has described the strike of the Pacific Coast woodworkers as one against the National Defense Mediation Board, which means against the Government. Though the leader of this strike has called the National Defense Mediation Board "an all-out labor-busting and strike-breaking device," incendiary language of the most vicious sort, Mr. Murray has approved the settlement offered by the Board. Under the circumstances, there is every reason to suspect that the leader has other motives in the strike than the terms under discussion.

In the strike at the North American aircraft factory, producing badly needed planes for the United States and Great Britain, the effort of the National Defense Mediation Board to secure a postponement was called by the leader "stalling the workers." The Board had secured the promise of the leaders not to strike while a basis of settlement was being worked out, but they issued the order nevertheless.

This strike, as well as the other two on the west coast, has been severely condemned by spokesmen for the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O who are members of the Labor Policy Advisory Committee associated with Sidney Hillman's labor section of the O. P. M.

The unions and their leaders responsible for these three strikes have not a leg to stand upon in justification for the continuation of the disputes. They have been repudiated by national leaders of labor. They have defied the efforts of the National Defense Mediation Board. They have flaunted public opinion. And, worst of all, they have put to shame the thousands of conscientious employees in defense industries who are working up to the point of fatigue to get out production.

Now the President has intervened in the North American strike with the threat of seizure, or nationalization, of the plant unless the workers return.

In view of the fact that the North American strike, like the other two, had lost face and had been catalogued as the work of an irresponsible minority, the President's threat to intervene by seizure deserves examination for its possible effect upon the all-important issue of production for national defense and aid to Britain.

Let us examine what happened in France when, for other reasons, the Blum government in the summer of 1936 ordered the nationalization of war industries and started to take over the aircraft industry. The decision, together with the reform program of the Blum government, had an upsetting effect upon French economy and finances; production declined while Germany was working night and day to rearm. The extension of state control over industry was one of the causes of France's debacle.

Remember, the nationalization was ordered and started in the summer of 1936, with particular emphasis upon the aircraft industry. In March of 1938 accounts described the French aircraft and armaments industries as "virtually paralyzed." France, like the United States, had a paper program of aircraft construction calling for 5,000 modern planes to cost 16,000,000,000 francs. Yet the average monthly output actually was only 38 planes in 1937 and at the end of 1938 was only 62.

The picture of tragic France, badly underequipped with modern tanks, motorized columns, the vital airplanes, and the other instruments of modern warfare, when she was met by the prepared German divisions, bears recalling to make the United States democracy wake up to the menace of lagging production.

France tried nationalization of war industries during crucial months—and the Republic is a comment on the failure.

It has been said that seizure of factories in this country would come only as a last resort. There is grave danger that seizure—or nationalization—will, as in France, have a serious effect upon production. The Army can take over a factory, but the Army cannot make bombers and pursuit planes. There is the question of management—whether in seized factories the Government will put in its own employees or agents or retain the men presently in charge. Again, when the Government interferes, it takes upon itself the responsibility of fixing wages and working condition. If it is found that the Government meets the terms of the strikers without much ado, there will be the natural inclination of workers in other factories to create a situation which will cause the Government to intervene in the expectation that an administration so favorable to labor will meet the terms they ask. Then again, seizure of factories may be a penalty for management absolutely blameless in an industrial dispute.

But the most important consideration is the capacity of government, through bureaucracy, to get out production as efficiently and as speedily as private management.

It is advisable, therefore, for public opinion to forget the drama of the threat to seize a factory and concentrate its attention upon what Government control will do to production, keeping in mind the lesson of France.

Production of Aluminum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. JOHNSON

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

LETTER BY HON. GEORGE W. JOHNSON, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me to Hon. William S. Knudsen, Director General, Office of Production Management:

JUNE 9, 1941.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN,
Director General, Office of Production Management,
Social Security Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KNUDSEN: Let me preface this communication with a preliminary statement. It is that I realize our country faces a grave and perilous crisis, and as a loyal and patriotic citizen, and as a Congressman, I stand ready to approve and help put forward every means and measure which will strengthen our national defense to the maximum possible point in the shortest possible time.

One matter that gives me much concern on this score is the proposal from T. V. A. to initiate the building of a series of ten new hydro-electric power dams on the rivers under its jurisdiction. There is no pretense that these additional dams are requisite to flood control or navigation. Their express and only justification is to augment T. V. A.'s pool of electric power.

T. V. A. Director, David E. Lilienthal, made a public address at Knoxville, Tenn., in which he pointed to the need for providing more electric power than was comprehended within T. V. A.'s present power program. He stated that the construction of ten dams and their related features, would cost an estimated quarter of a billion dollars. He, then, hastened to add, "That will seem a modest price to pay for the sense of security it will bring and an end to a feeling that this great country in its hour of great danger may be without the dire necessities for the defense of its independence."

I am sure all of us would agree that a quarter of a billion dollars would be a modest price to pay for security. Appropriations by Congress for national defense, in the hope of obtaining security, will be 100 times the cost of 10 more dams proposed by T. V. A.

Unfortunately, Mr. Lilienthal's blueprints for 10 more dams afford no present security whatsoever, for it would take years for their consummation. Furthermore, even if it were possible by magic to bring them into being immediately, it is still a question whether these dams are a solution of the problem.

I am reliably informed that while the plants producing aluminum will be ready by about June 1942, the power will not be available. It had been assumed that all the power needed could be available from Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams. It is now established that less than 180,000 kilowatts will be free in these regions. While there are also immediately available about 60,000 kilowatts at Boulder, putting all together there would be only about 350,000 kilowatts free by the end of 1942. At which time a million kilowatts will be urgently needed.

The question is not the need for more electric power for the production of aluminum and other vital and critical defense requirements. We all concede that more power is needed. The question is not whether the Federal Government shall go further into the business of the generating and distributing of electric power. This, I may concede, though with misgivings.

The real question presented by the Lilienthal proposal is whether the construction of more water-power dams for more electric power in the present emergency is the best and the quickest way to get that power. I do not believe that it is.

What is the alternative? Steam plants to generate electricity with coal. It seems to me that here is a major question of policy which you and your agency might very properly study and give to Congress and the country the benefit of your conclusions.

Those who follow our efforts at "all out" defense are cognizant of the serious shortage of power that confronts our airplane program. President Roosevelt recently called for a tremendous step-up in the production of four-engined bombers to a rate of 500 a month. I have been informed that this means that our output of aluminum must be accelerated approximately 50 percent over the previous goal of 200,000,000 (b) pounds annually, and an increase of 300,000,000 pounds of magnesium yearly.

This, of course, means that we must develop adequate supplies of power quickly to meet this load. I have been told by some power experts that this will require not less than 1,000,000 kilowatts additional electric energy. According to these sources, probably not more than one-third of this total will be available by the end of 1942, without rationing civilian consumption, invoking priorities, or other drastic steps.

I have also been told that it will take only 12 months, perhaps less, to build the essential aluminum and magnesium plants, yet the T. V. A. proposal would require 2 years—too late to get the plants in production during this crucial period. For this reason, it seems to me, that we should consider immediately the possibility of adding steam plants, which can be placed in operation in approximately one-half the time of dams projected to increase hydroelectric power.

It is not my purpose to disparage the hydroelectric plants which the Government has already built or has in contemplation. Nothing is served now by debating whether the electric power generated in these plants could have been developed more economically in steam plants, or more desirably located. However, it seems to me that in the present circumstances, when the time element is so vital, when speed is so essential, when the demands upon the financial resources of the Government, upon the manpower of our Nation, and upon our material resources are so overwhelming that the right way to meet the requirements for additional electric power is to build coal-burning steam plants, and that the wrong way is to embark upon new water-power dams which will take twice as long to build and cost twice as much money and, when finished, are especially vulnerable to sabotage and to air attack, and are undependable with respect to rainfall and water supply.

It is pertinent to observe that T. V. A. came to Congress last year for permission to build a large steam plant at Watts Bar, in Tennessee, with the argument that it was a quick, economical way of augmenting T. V. A.'s facilities. The Watts Bar plant is scheduled to be constructed within the space of 18 months, and is ahead of schedule. Provision is already being made for doubling its installed capacity. It is my understanding that the Philadelphia Electric Co. is proceeding with the installation of two steam turbogenerators, whose combined power will exceed the entire output of the large hydroelectric power plant of this company at the Conowingo Dam.

I am also reliably informed that the greatly increased efficiency now prevailing in the generation of electricity in coal-burning steam plants puts an entirely different complexion on the comparative cost aspect, as between steam and hydro power. In the most modern steam plants it requires less than a pound of coal to generate 1 kilowatt-hour of electricity. Here let me call attention to a recent report to the Senate by the Federal Power Commission, which concluded that, whereas it would cost in the vicinity of $90,000,000 to carry to completion the Passamaquoddy hydroelectric power project initiated some years ago, and now abandoned, that a steam plant could be built at that point for less than $15,000,000, to develop an equal amount of electric power, and that in actual operations, taking into account fuel costs, the cost of steam power at the switchboard would be less per kilowatt than the cost of water power.

May I call your attention to the expert opinion of Mr. Gano Dunn, the consultant in the O. P. M., on the question of power supply—an opinion which was presented at a hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee last summer in connection with T. V. A.'s request for funds to construct a steam plant. Mr. Dunn's statement reviewed the progressive diminution in the amount of coal required to generate electric power and said, "And today, in 1940, a new plant can produce a kilowatt-hour for 0.9 pound of coal. In that scaling down from 8 pounds of coal per kilowatt-hour to 0.9 pound of coal per kilowatt-hour, steam power passed water power, and is now much the cheaper power when costs are calculated on the same basis for each form of power."

In addition to the considerations of time and money, there are other factors in favor of turning to steam plants for additional electric power in the present emergency, instead of starting in to construct new dams to provide more water power. Steam plants may be scattered, in line with the policy of avoiding concentration of war industry. Steam plants eliminate the uncertainties of rainfall and water flow.

We know that hydroelectric power plants displace coal, not for a day or year but in perpetuity, and that every ton of coal lost means the loss in aggregate somewhere along the line of 1 day's labor and wage for one man. It is a wholly unnecessary sacrifice.

I trust, Mr. Knudsen, that you will pardon the length of this letter, but, obviously, the questions here raised go far beyond the immediate proposal of T. V. A. and the contemplated development of hydroelectric power at Grand Coulee, at Bonneville, and Boulder Dams. I shall anticipate your response and the expression of your views upon this pressing subject.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE W. JOHNSON,
Member of Congress.

Attitude of Texas People on Present Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

RESOLUTION OF TEXAS LEGISLATURE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Legislature of the State of Texas recently adopted Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 68. Since it is stated that the resolution expresses the views of the people of Texas, I desire to insert the entire resolution in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 68

Whereas the history of Texas bears witness that the people of this State oppose to the last drop of blood, and the last breath in their bodies, tyranny and aggression; and that they love liberty even more than life itself; and Texas and Texans have never hesitated to enter the fray when this two-headed monster, tyranny and aggression, has threatened their homes and their ideals.

The bloody fields of San Jacinto, Goliad, and the Alamo give mute testimony to these facts; Shilo and the Wilderness in the Civil War, and the impetuous charge at San Juan Hill were altars upon which they made their sacrifices; and Chateau Thierry and the Meuse-Argonne confirm the willingess of Texans to make the ultimate sacrifice to preserve freedom, liberty, justice, and peace in all the world; and

Whereas two divergent philosophies of government are now embraced in a deadly struggle that has drawn into its flaming vortex most of the countries of Europe; and the totalitarian states have sworn to extirpate democracies and democratic people from the face of the earth, and are now at war with our ideals and our way of life that we cherish as a heritage; and Great Britain is the last remaining barricade sheltering our Nation from the forces of tyranny and aggression: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Senate of Texas (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Texas, speaking for the people of Texas inform the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States:

That the people of Texas, in these days of peril to ourselves and all democracies throughout the world, are unified behind the foreign policies of President Roosevelt, and desire that a firm policy toward the aggressor nation be maintained without thought of appeasement, and that Great Britain be given all possible aid until victory is won, so that the epitaph of Christian civilization may not be "too little and too late," and that steps be taken to impress upon both capital and labor the full realization of their responsibilities for national defense, so that strikes and lockouts may not occur and imperil the safety of this Nation and our civilization over a few pieces of silver; and

That Texans are and will remain true to their historic heritage, and are willing to make whatever sacrifice is necessary that our Nation and our posterity may live in peace, freedom, and liberty; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Member of the Texas delegation in the Congress of the United States, so that the President and the Congress and all the world may know that Texans still honor the principles of their fathers.

Civilian Defense Organizations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to give warning to those in charge of civilian defense organizations of Washington and the other places in the country to be most careful and cautious about the type of persons who volunteer for that service.

There are thousands upon thousands of Communists, Nazis, Fascists in our midst right here in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere in the country, whose purpose is the destruction of our Republic, and I am sure that every Member of Congress and a great majority of the American people are very anxious that steps be taken to effectively bar such radicals from obtaining membership in the home-defense forces where they could do untold damage to our national security by the same cunning tricks they have employed in many nations which have been the victims of such cancerous growth from within and have thus fallen prey to their enemies.

Mr. Speaker, unless we make sure that everybody in our civilian defense organizations is a 100-percent true American, then we might better not even attempt such an organization.

On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of this week thousands of citizens in Washington, D. C., will volunteer for the civilian defense of our Capital City, and I hope those in charge will exercise due care and caution that not one Communist, Nazi, or Fascist be enrolled. I would suggest that the searchlight of the F. B. I. and the Dies committee be turned on this list of volunteers, that should the names of any black sheep be found on that list, they might be relegated to the ash heap pronto.

Some may resent such investigation, but I would say that any sensible, true American should welcome the same, and furthermore they should insist upon such scrutiny by these two very efficient organizations.

While I am one of the great majority of Americans who does not feel an invasion of this country by any foreign nation or combination of nations can be made against a strong national defense here, yet I am aware that he who sows safety reaps happiness. Consequently, I am going to cooperate to the fullest extent with the civilian-defense program by acting in a cool, deliberate manner, and urge every loyal American to do likewise without fanning the flames of war fear and hysteria in any sense.

Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY RAILROAD YARDMASTERS OF NORTH AMERICA, INC.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a resolution adopted by the Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc.:

Whereas it is a recognized fact that our American labor unions came into being as a means of protection to the workers against the unscrupulous and selfish individuals of industry who refused to better the workers' conditions, and, the workers being disorganized, had no means of effective bargaining; and

Whereas the majority of labor organizations founded for the purpose of collective bargaining have proved beyond a doubt that their aims, objectives, and achievements, through the years, have definitely established them as a permanent foundation, a guaranty to the workers' rights; and

Whereas through the activities of the labor organizations certain legislation has been passed intending to protect the natural prerogatives of the workers and their organizations; legislation guaranteeing the workers the right to collective bargaining by means of their own choosing; and

Whereas the intent of this legislation was to create a condition of harmony between the workers and their employers by setting up legal machinery as a means of further promoting the rights of labor through freedom of discrimination and exploitation for its followers; and

Whereas, though the intention of this labor legislation may have been to protect the rights of labor, it has been inadequate in many respects in that it has failed to free labor of unscrupulous and selfish individuals who are imposing on the workers in spite of present labor laws. It is a matter of common knowledge that labor is being exploited by individuals who are unscrupulous and selfish, and many of these individuals are to be found not only among the employers but right within the unions; and

Whereas these individuals, though unworthy, are able to operate under the present laws without restraint because the present labor laws have not set up a differential as to what type of person shall exercise the rights of labor guaranteed in the present statute; and

Whereas it is obvious that aliens, ex-convicts, absconders, and persons who have never worked at the occupation represented by their union are in official capacity, which places them in a position of controlling the destiny of legitimate workers and their unions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc., in convention, urgently request the Senators and Congressmen of these United States to pass further labor legislation that will correct the present-day abuses by establishing a definite guarantee of the workers' rights to collective bargaining by means of their own choosing; and be it further

Resolved, That this legislation incorporate the following safeguards:

(1) Aliens to be ineligible to hold office in any labor union.

(2) Any person not actively engaged in the occupation represented by the respective union for at least 3 years prior to holding elective office to be ineligible.

(3) All officers of labor organizations handling the funds thereof to be adequately bonded.

(4) A financial statement to be rendered to every member at least once per annum.

(5) Jurisdictional disputes to be arbitrated without stoppage of work, and a 60-day "cool off" arbitrational period before a strike be considered legal; and be it further

Resolved, That we, who have for many years been operating in accordance with the five-point program of this resolution, sincerely believe that legislation making it mandatory to all labor organizations to operate likewise would play a major role in reducing labor troubles to a minimum, and thereby promote harmony between the workers, their employers, and the general public.

Loss Due to Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the work of Madam Perkins, Harry Bridges, Sidney Hillman, and other lesser apostles of the New Deal is producing results. By reason of the strikes in defense industries since the first of this year to April 30, we are short the equivalent to approximately 1,168 bombers, or 1,193 light tanks, or 9 destroyers.

From January 1 to April 30, 1941, there were 70 defense strikes according to the records of the O. P. M., the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and the United States Conciliation Service. These 70 strikes involved 203,915 men and a loss of 2,237,774 man-days. On a basis of an 8-hour day this amounts to a loss of 17,902,192 man-hours.

The Army Air Corps according to Major Timberlake estimates that 16,000 man-hours are required to produce a B–24D bomber.

The Ordnance Department of the Army according to Major Warner estimates that 15,000 man-hours are required to produce a light tank.

The Navy Department's Public Relations Division estimates that 1,800,000 man-hours are required to build a destroyer.

Mr. Speaker, the answer to this situation is not confiscation of all property in America and a complete socialization of our country. This House should, without further delay, enact whatever legislation is necessary. The handling of our labor problems in defense industries should be taken away from the reformers and left-wingers and turned over to patriotic Americans, who consider the defense of our Republic the paramount objective.

President Roosevelt Plotting for an "Incident" in the Atlantic To Plunge United States Into Active War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Post of today:

[From the Washington Post of June 9, 1941]

ATTACK ON SUB BY UNITED STATES SHIP REPORTED—DESTROYER SAID TO HAVE DROPPED DEPTH BOMBS; SECOND ENCOUNTER REVEALED

(By Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner)

Nothing better illustrates the strangely equivocal position in which present war policy places this country than the undisclosed episodes of the Atlantic patrol. In one case, rather more than a month ago, an encounter between German and American warcraft at sea very nearly terminated in an attack by the Germans. In another, slightly more recent, an attack on what was believed to be a German submarine was actually made by an American destroyer.

No details of the first episode are available, but the basic facts of the second are known. The destroyer, the name of which cannot be ascertained, was picking up survivors from a British vessel sunk not far from the coast of Greenland. While the operation was in progress the destroyer's detecting device announced the approach of a submarine. The submarine could only have been German. It was virtually certain to use its torpedoes, as semidarkness concealed the nationality of the American ship. And the commander of the destroyer accordingly dropped three depth charges.

SHOOTING ALREADY

Thus, although the President is waiting for the Germans to shoot first, the truth is that there has been shooting already. The truth may be denied—indeed, it is likely to be. The outcome of the episode is a mystery, since the light was too poor for the commander of the destroyer to make certain that the submarine really was nearby, or to guess whether the depth charges had taken effect. But official denials cannot alter either the episode's basic facts, or its broad meaning.

The episode's meaning is pretty obvious. The Atlantic patrol in itself is not effective. Even now it has not been extended to cover the most dangerous waters, yet four British ships have recently been sunk in the part of the ocean it supposedly guards. The President, all his most important advisers, and the War and Navy Departments hope, however, that the patrol will produce an incident to serve as the pretext for really effective action by this country. The interest of the Germans is to avoid such an incident. It is perfectly possible that the submarine was in fact sunk, and that the Germans have suppressed all public complaint in order to keep public opinion here in its present lulled condition. Nevertheless, as the episode described above pretty clearly demonstrates, the chances are strong that an incident will eventually occur.

TIME IS SHORT

The trouble with that is the word "eventually." The time is now desperately short. In his desire for a pretext for the action the President wants to take and knows he must take, he is wasting days and weeks that may forever alter the balance of the war.

The Navy, as has been stated before in this space, is fully ready to act. Possibly measures may soon be taken to solve the minor aspects of the Atlantic problem. It is far from improbable that the preventive occupation of the Azores and the Cape Verdes, or the garrisoning of Iceland, will be ordered in the near future. But among the men who should know the President's intentions, if anyone does, the prevailing opinion still is that all-out shipping protection will not be instituted for some time, unless an incident occurs, even though other aggressive steps are taken.

There is considerable confusion about the nature of an all-out system of shipping protection, chiefly arising from the President's repeated assertion that convoys are outmoded. The President is perfectly correct in his assertion, if he is understood as he unquestionably means to be—that convoying alone is no longer good enough. But what most uninformed persons have gathered from the President's words is far from being the truth. While combined air and naval action and constant sweeping of the sea lanes are also highly important, it is still essential to accompany merchant ships crossing the Atlantic with protective escort vessels.

This is so because 50 percent of the damage at sea is still done by the submarine. Constant, aggressive sweeping of the sealanes virtually removes the threat from commerce raiders, and greatly diminishes the threat from the long-range bombers, which together do the other 50 percent of the damage. But the submarine is hardly susceptible to a mere sweeping operation. If we had enough aircraft and warships to keep within range of most of the submarines at sea most of the time, a sweeping operation would be effective. Then the submarines would have to remain submerged most of the time, and their batteries would run down. Unfortunately, there are several million square miles of ocean to be cleared. Submarines sight enemy warships and aircraft as soon as they are sighted themselves, and submerge at once. Thus submarines are only slightly hampered by a sweeping operation.

In short, the only answer to the submarine menace, in the opinion of the best naval minds, is the presence of warcraft which can attack the submarines when they attack merchant ships. If the President will face the changes wrought by onrushing events and face the unwisdom of delaying action in hopes of a pretext for action, the ablest men in our Navy are convinced the battle of the Atlantic can be won both quickly and gloriously. On the other hand, the men around the President who really know the war picture are equally strong in the belief that the war may be lost if action is much further delayed.

National Daylight Saving

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED TO THE OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT BY THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following memorandum submitted to the Office of Production Management by the Merchants' Association of New York setting forth pertinent reasons why national daylight saving should be adopted in the current emergency for certain periods of the year:

National daylight saving was in effect throughout the Nation by act of Congress from March 31, 1918, until the last Sunday in October 1919, during two 7-month periods. Since the repeal of the national daylight-saving law it has been extended by State and community action to embrace a large section of the New England and Middle Atlantic States, has extended through localities as far west as Chicago, and has touched some cities in the Rocky Mountain area.

In this memorandum the benefits derived from the practice are treated on a purely factual basis.

SAVING OF FUEL AND POWER

An accurate estimate of the reduction in kilowatt-hours consumed as a result of national daylight saving would not be possible. However, we are informed from authoritative sources having close connection with the electric-power industry that the average savings would probably amount to around 2 percent. It is estimated, roughly, that in those communities which are now on daylight saving there will be a reduced consumption throughout the daylight-saving period of approximately 1,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours and that if the practice should be extended to the entire United States for the same period the savings in power would be doubled, giving a total reduction of around 3,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

From the standpoint of savings to customers, the reduction in the electrical industry's revenues that would result from national daylight saving is roughly estimated at $50,000,000 a year, based on the probable reduction in consumption from a total annual output of 150,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. The electrical industry is naturally opposed to any further extension of daylight saving. This industry contends that average spare generating capacity exceeds 30 percent. Obviously, the saving in current is more important in industrial communities where there may be a shortage of power than elsewhere. In view, however, of the current drought, which has reduced power potentialities of some plants and of the necessity for conserving every bit of energy for the gigantic task ahead, it would seem that an additional possible saving of 1,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours would be well worth considering.

Some additional data on the subject are available. Senator William H. Calder in an article published on October 28, 1918, stated that according to estimates of the United States Fuel Administrator one and a quarter million tons of coal had been saved that year by pushing the clocks ahead. Senator Calder further stated that definite reports from St. Louis showed a saving of 17.5 tons for each thousand of population on a 7 months' basis. The saving in France for a 3½ months' period was fixed at 250,000 tons, which would make a saving of 12.5 tons for each thousand of population in a 7 months' period, according to the Fuel Administration.

Another factor in conservation is the opportunities afforded to cultivate home gardens to increase food supplies.

INCREASE OF PRODUCTION

Increase in production is a complement of daylight saving which cannot be expressed in statistical terms. Factors which enter into the increase in production include such items as decrease in accidents, efficiency of employees, morale, and health. These will be treated under separate headings.

DECREASE IN ACCIDENTS

Accurate studies have proved that a majority of the industrial accidents occur during the closing hours of the day, when artificial light is required. Fatigue is a contributing factor. Daylight saving decreases the need for working under artificial light. It permits a larger part of the work to be performed in the relatively cool morning hours. It thus has the effect of increasing efficiency and reducing fatigue. In instances where overtime work is required, it increases the proportion of the work that may be done during daylight hours. In the case of double shifts it may permit the second shift to do a part of its work under daylight conditions.

Related to this subject are data compiled in 1939 concerning automobile accidents. These showed that in that year 2,570 fatal accidents occurred between 6 and 7 p. m., 2,860 between 7 and 8 p. m., these constituting 16.9 percent of all the fatal accidents. The hour between 5 and 6 p. m. showed 2,150 fatal accidents, constituting 6.7 percent of the total. Thus a large percentage of the automobile deaths were shown to be in the early evening, whereas the heaviest automobile traffic is ordinarily in the daytime. It is asserted that the motor-vehicle death rate based on mileage is at least three times as high by night as by day. These figures are in conformity with the statement made above that industrial accidents occur more frequently during the closing hours of the day. The lesser eye strain experienced by the workman under natural light is obvious.

MORALE

All experience shows that the contented workman is the productive workman. Workmen are contented as they are enabled to live and work under satisfactory conditions. There is ample evidence that the workman does like daylight saving. It is a well-known fact that the largest part of the opposition to daylight saving comes from the rural districts. Definite proof of the attitude of the working man toward daylight saving is found in a poll taken by the Merchants' Association of New York in 1921 among the employees of several hundred commercial and industrial establishments. Approximately 300,000 ballots were cast. Ninety-five percent of them voted in favor of a daylight-saving law. In working against the repeal of the New York State daylight-saving law in 1920, James P. Holland, then president of the New York State Federation of Labor, stated that the wage earners had benefited physically, mentally, and morally from the operation of the law.

HEALTH

There is ample evidence that the practice of daylight saving promotes the health of both the workman and the community. Among the organizations that have endorsed the practice when it was under consideration at an earlier date were the American Medical Association, the National Tuberculosis Association, and many doctors. The late Senator Royal S. Copeland, then health commissioner of New York City, had this to say:

"I have never been able to understand how the opponents of daylight saving could deny the good the scheme has accomplished for the public health. It is my conviction that this hour of daylight has taken into the fresh air and sunlight thousands, and indeed millions, of people who otherwise would not have the opportunity. Unquestionably this benefit has resulted in great good to the public. If there were no other reasons than the argument in favor of improved health, that would be sufficient, in my opinion, for the daylight saving."

WHAT OTHER NATIONS DO

Perhaps the best proof of the universal opinion that daylight saving is a necessary addition to the national economy in times of stress is found in the experience of other countries both in the first World War and in the present conflict. Great Britain has had her clocks advanced for 1 hour for more than a year and for the present summer has advanced them for 2 hours. Unoccupied France has advanced her clocks for 2 hours. Germany and the German-occupied countries use daylight saving. Italy has advanced her clocks. Mexico has advanced her clocks 1 hour as a fuel and power conservation measure. Other countries which make use of daylight saving include Cuba, Egypt, Greece (prior to occupation), Iceland, New Zealand, Portugal, and parts of China. In all of these countries daylight saving is freely recognized as a means of conservation and of promoting efficiency. The Canadian Government by order in council required all of those communities which observed daylight saving in the summer of 1940 to extend it as a war measure indefinitely.

The United States cannot afford to be on a less efficient basis than the rest of the world.

VIEW OF INDUSTRY

Some further evidence of what production interests think of daylight saving is found in a number of communications received by the Merchants' Association and by Members of Congress when the repeal of the national daylight saving law of 1918–19 was first proposed. Of the many communications available the following may be of interest to the O. P. M.:

Published June 9, 1919

Statement by National Association of Manufacturers:

"We are interested keenly in this matter and have it under observation. We are of the opinion the repeal of this law would be a serious mistake."

Statement by American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers:

"The American Association is unalterably opposed to the repeal of the daylight saving law. Just before the expiration of the last Congress we communicated with all our members urging them to communicate with their Congressmen—against the repeal. It now appears that we shall have to renew our endeavors."

Telegram to Congressman from a representative of General Electric Co.:

"I am writing to you as a resident of the seventeenth district to say that I am strongly in favor of daylight saving; it has been a conserver of time and effort. A large proportion of the several hundred employees of this office live in the outskirts of the city or suburbs and spend from three-quarters of an hour to 2 hours each morning and evening in traveling between their homes and the office. Daylight saving has enabled them to spend more of the daylight hours with their families either in doing useful work or outdoor recreation. It results in economy in the use of electricity for lighting, which, although not directly to the benefit of our industry, is to the benefit of the community in its conservation of energy.

"I hope you are in favor of daylight saving and will work against the adoption of the rider for the repeal of the daylight-saving law, which is now before you as part of the agricultural appropriation bill."

Telegram to New York Senators from a representative of American Locomotive Sales Corporation:

"My attention has been directed to the pernicious rider attached to the agricultural appropriation bill calling for the repeal of the daylight-saving law. I trust that you will use every effort to prevent the repeal of a law that has demonstrated such decided merit from the point of view of economy in coal consumption as well as affording longer leisure daylight hours to our large working population."

Telegram from Luckenbach Steamship Co., Inc.:

"The handling and maintenance of American steamers and the consequent steady flow of supplies to allied countries would, in our opinion, lose a great portion of its efficiency if the present daylight-saving law should be repealed."

Published June 16, 1919

Statement by International Association of Garment Manufacturers:

"We are very anxious to do all that we can to be of assistance in defeating the repeal of the daylight-saving law. In accordance with the decision of our board of directors, we are requesting all of our members to write or wire their Congressmen concerning this proposition, and as soon as you are thoroughly in touch with the situation at Washington, we would suggest further that you may use our name and favorable statement in any way you think best."

Conditions prevailing today are so similar to those prevailing when the national law was enacted that the same arguments that prevailed then are pertinent.

Letter from the Solvay Process Co. in reference to daylight saving law in New York State:

"THE SOLVAY PROCESS CO.,
"Syracuse, N. Y., February 8, 1941.

"MR. WILLIAM FELLOWES MORGAN,
President, the Merchants' Association of New York.

"DEAR SIR: I have your telegram and letter of February 7, regarding the daylight saving law.

"We are very much interested in retention of daylight saving for 5 months. We believe that it is the most beneficial thing for our men and for our officials and we want to do anything we can to retain it.

"We are writing today to our representatives as urgently as possible. We are also asking a number of our people to write to our representatives, and we are making an effort to have the manufacturers' association here take up the matter actively and get the other business interests of the city interested in an effort to get behind the movement. If there is anything else we can do, please let us know.

"Yours very truly,
"THE SOLVAY PROCESS CO.,
"M. H. KNOPP, Vice President."

CONFUSION

The current confusion due to a diversity of practices in time observance is a source of annoyance and a hindrance to maximum efficiency. The growing confusion and danger resulting from the difference in Federal, State, and municipal time standards have led the Interstate Commerce Commission to recommend to Congress the amendment of the Standard Time Act. A study of the Merchants' Association's survey of daylight-saving communities observing summer time for the season of 1941 will emphasize this. New Hampshire and Massachusetts require the observance of daylight-saving time by State law. It is practically universally observed in Connecticut and New Jersey, in all except the rural commodities of New York and Maine, in most of Rhode Island, in large sections of Vermont, and by a large majority of the population of Pennsylvania. The northern part of Indiana has daylight saving, while the southern part is on central time. Similar differences exist in the State of Illinois. Georgia has shifted a part of the State from central time to eastern standard time in order to get the benefits of daylight saving. Several cities in Kentucky observe daylight saving. A peculiar situation exists in Michigan. The local standard prescribed by State law for the entire State is eastern standard time, but the Federal standard for the northern part of Michigan is central time. Some municipalities use the Federal standard (central time), others use the State standard (eastern time), while a third group observe daylight saving by shifting from the Federal standard to the State standard during the summer.

All of the above creates a hodgepodge of times, which could be corrected by suitable legislation in connection with a national daylight-saving law.

CONCLUSION

It is necessary to conclude from a study of all the facts that a national daylight-saving law covering the period from the last Sunday in March until the last Sunday in October would be of distinct benefit to the United States. Were we not in a national emergency, it would probably be difficult to enact such a law, but since we are in such an emergency calling for the exercise of maximum efficiency and every productive effort, it seems plain that the country should to that extent take the same course as other nations and avail itself of this means of conserving resources and increasing efficiency.

Respectfully submitted.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION
OF NEW YORK,
By FRANK L. HOPKINS.

Increase of Federal Gas Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. HILL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of Colorado expresses in language easily understood what our people of Colorado think of increasing the Federal gasoline tax:

[From Rocky Mountain News, Denver, Colo., May 30, 1941]

GAS-TAX RAISE UNJUSTIFIED, CARR ASSERTS

There is no justification for a proposed increase of 1 cent in the Federal gasoline tax for the purpose of conserving petroleum supplies, Governor Carr said.

"There is plenty of petroleum, ample refining capacity to supply the demand," he said. "Only about 75 percent of our capacity is being utilized to meet present all-time peak demands.

"As far as Colorado is concerned, the tax would be injurious in that it would reduce consumption of gasoline and cut into highway-department revenues," he said.

"We now pay 4 cents State tax and 1½ cents Federal tax on each gallon of gasoline," he said. "In 1940, alone, operators of some 352,000 motor vehicles paid Federal and State gasoline and oil taxes aggregating twelve and one-half million dollars.

"In motor-vehicle registration fees, specific ownership taxes, motor-carrier or road taxes, inspection fees, titles, licenses, and sales taxes, Colorado motorists contributed another $7,300,000, or $56 for each vehicle."

Farmer Boys Go to War—Convicts Remain at Home, Where They Can Sabotage National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, that we are not fooling all of the people by just making motions is evident from a letter which came in under air mail from Beverly Hills, Calif. The gentleman who wrote it seems familiar with the subject matter. He writes:

MAY 22, 1941.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your printed statement in the RECORD regarding Willie Bioff prompts me to enclose a clipping that you may know the outcome of his trial which was set for June 24.

What dire straits our national-defense program must be in when Willie Bioff, swindler, convicted flesh peddler, keeper of bawdy houses, gangster, labor racketeer, alleged bribe taker, and income-tax evader is the only suitable and available man to keep the wheels rolling.

My, my, Mr. Congressman, is that the sort of government we are spending billions of dollars to protect and perpetuate?

Who are these Government officials who agreed it was "very essential"?

Fred E. Pelton, "film producers' coordinator" who gave Bioff this schedule of "highly important" films relating to national defense is employed by the motion-picture-studio leaders involved in Bioff's income-tax case.

Pelton formerly worked for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio (controlled by Joe Schenck's brother Nick) at a time truckloads of material intended for picture production checked into the studio through one gate, was tallied and checked for payment, and then mysteriously disappeared through another gate. (Metro charges their stockholders 40 percent overhead on all pictures.)

Pelton wasn't the only studio official helping to maintain the 40-percent overhead, so he was transferred to the Metro studio in England. He scurried back to America at the first sound of war rumbling and a place was created for him as "film producers' labor coordinator."

The Congress of the United States struggle manfully to enact laws and place statutes on the books for general public welfare; but what happens to a Republic when the laws are flaunted and ridiculed, in the face of the public, by exponents of arrogance, greed, and bribery?

What has happened to the investigating powers of Congress? Motions are presented to investigate the motion-picture industry (Boren), also many other abuses in both Houses of Congress, but they all die in committee.

Who, may I ask, are the committee fooling, the public?

No, my friend, not these days.

They only fool themselves and give the individual Congressman or Senator the merry run-a-round, much to the public's disgust.

It is nearing the time some of the buried motions are revived and brought to life before democracy and all this Republic stands for is layed out solemnly beside them in the committee burial grounds of pressure politics.

Are we to be a government of laws conscientiously enforced or are we to become a government of bribery, political conspiracy, dedicated to privileged men? That question must be answered correctly if the government of our forefathers is to endure.

One of the clippings which he enclosed from the Los Angeles Examiner of May 20, 1941, is captioned "Bioff wins delay in United States Tax Hearing" and continues:

TRIAL OF FILM LABOR LEADER POSTPONED ON GROUNDS HE IS ESSENTIAL TO DEFENSE PROGRAM

Willie Bioff, Hollywood film labor leader, will not go to trial in Federal court on June 24 as scheduled on an indictment charging he evaded payment of approximately $85,000 in income tax for 1936 and 1937.

This was assured yesterday when Bioff's attorney, George M. Breslin, appeared before Senior Federal Judge Paul J. McCormick and requested a continuance on the grounds that film workers represented by Bioff were essential to national defense during the coming few months.

George E. Browne, president of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, stated—that Fred E. Pelton, film producers' labor coordinator, had given Bioff a schedule of highly important films relating to national defense, including private pictures of engine production, Army maneuvers, and various technical data to be exhibited at private showings to military officials.

Browne said, according to Breslin, that Bioff, former Hollywood I. A. T. S. E. chief, was the "only suitable and available man" to keep the wheels rolling and prevent strikes in other jurisdictions where Hollywood technicians were sent to produce military-training films. He declared Government officials had agreed it was "very essential" that there be no interruption, either through labor or technical reasons, in production of the military films.

Judge McCormick continued the Bioff tax-evasion trial to the September calendar, at which time it will be given a new trial date.

"ONLY MAN AVAILABLE"

In various items submitted to support Bioff's contention that his services were "indispensable to the Government," Browne urged that Bioff was the "only labor official available" who could give the necessary orders to assure "immediate shooting" at widely separated Army posts and industrial centers in connection with the Government films.

I have no way of knowing personally how much of the newspaper item is an accurate statement, but experience inclines one to the belief that newspapers do not print articles which, if untrue, would be libelous.

What the folks back home are beginning to think of Congressmen is indicated by the letter printed above. If we would retain the respect of our home folks, is it not about time that we produce results here in Washington?

Threat to Unity Deplored

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

LETTER FROM NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a letter which appeared in the New York Times on June 7, 1941:

[From the New York Times of June 7, 1941]

THREAT TO UNITY DEPLORED—FOMENTING GROUP DISCORD IN AMERICA REGARDED AS AID TO THE ENEMY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

It would be a mistake to permit the dramatic and tragic death of Representative Edelstein to overshadow the seriousness of the situation to which he referred in his last speech.

Representative RANKIN's references to "a little group of our international Jewish bankers," which brought Mr. Edelstein to his feet in protest, was unfortunately not an isolated congressional expression of a misguided and bigoted way of thinking. There have been others before him, and they have said equally dangerous things.

There was, for example, Senator WHEELER, who managed to pick out a predominantly Jewish list of "international bankers" for attack in a speech February 28. There was Representative LAMBERTSON, who singled out a group of Jews as the implied nucleus of what he called the war crowd. There was Senator RUFUS C. HOLMAN, who on March 4 paid tribute to Adolf Hitler because "he broke the control of these internationalists over the common people of Germany"; and it was clear that Mr. HOLMAN meant Jews when he said "internationalists." And, finally, there was Mr. RANKIN himself, with his gibe at "our international Jewish bankers."

Representative Edelstein's reply was truthful, but he did not say all there was to be said. For he simply pointed out the facts—that there are few "Jewish international bankers," that they are not at all so important as men of finance who happen to be Christian, and that the meeting to which Mr. RANKIN objected was "entirely controlled by persons other than Jewish bankers."

But to refute these insinuations and accusations is not enough. It is far more important to remember how dangerous such loose, irresponsible talk is, especially in this period of unlimited national emergency. For such talk is not merely an insult to the dignity of the Congress of the United States; not merely an insult to the intelligence of the American people. Worse than that, this strategy is one which plays directly into the hands of Adolf Hitler and his Nazi propaganda machine.

Certainly there is nothing that the National Socialists of Germany desire more than a confusion of issues in our democracy by this irrelevant exploitation of prejudices against American citizens of the Jewish faith. However innocent the strategy may have been, it is also sinister and perhaps catastrophic because it is a threat to the unity of the American people.

In their drive for world conquest the Nazis have time and again employed the ancient technique, "Divide and conquer." They have time and again tried to set one group against another in order to create discord, disunity, and utter weakness. They set the French against the British; they set labor against industry, and they set Christian against Jew.

The people of America will be impotent if they are not united. And they cannot be united if there is distrust, suspicion, tension among the groups who make up our American population. The fomenting of group hatred, therefore, is a mightier weapon against our free way of life than would be a hundred Nazi air raids over New York City.

It is too bad that Representative Edelstein had to die to bring this explosive situation to the attention of the American people. Let us at least make sure that he has not died in vain.

President, Council for Democracy.

The Food-Stamp Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

RESOLUTION BY THE ILLINOIS HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution recently adopted by the Illinois House of Representatives:

House Resolution 21

Whereas the Federal Government has in operation a plan known as the food-stamp plan for the benefit of the workers on W. P. A. and those with low income, and also those receiving old-age assistance as well as the recipients of direct welfare; and

Whereas this food-stamp plan has proven to be a great boon in increasing the purchasing power of these people, as well as increasing their food supply in some instances as much as 50 percent on every dollar spent; and

Whereas this increase in food has and will do much to reduce the many illnesses that undernourished people are subject to, especially among the children of the lower wage group; and

Whereas there are many workers who have only part-time employment, such as coal miners, and others who receive during periods of unemployment, benefits under the Unemployment Compensation Act; and

Whereas in many instances they only receive the minimum pay under this act which at present is only $7 per week, some receive the maximum of $16 per week, yet in many instances, their benefits are lower than the maximum W. P. A. rate of $52 per month: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Sixty-second General Assembly of the State of Illinois go on record recommending to the Congress of the United States, that the Federal food-stamp plan be amended to include all recipients of unemployment insurance and all others in the low-wage brackets whose salary or incomes are lower or equal to the wages received by W. P. A. workers; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Members of the House of Representatives and to the Senators of the State of Illinois, the President of the United States, and to Director, Unemployment Relief Commission, Washington, D. C., by the secretary of state.

Adopted by the House, June 4, 1941.

ELMER J. SCHNACKENBURG,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
R. R. RANDOLPH,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Necessity for Suppression of Strikes on National-Defense Projects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the serious effects of strikes on our national-defense projects become more alarming from day to day. At this very moment, when the House is considering a $10,000,000,000 appropriation bill, outlaw strikers in some of our west-coast factories engaged in manufacturing defense materials are openly defying the authority and power of the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, the American people will no longer tolerate this situation, and I sincerely hope that before this day ends the House of Representatives will have taken appropriate action to thwart the purposes and designs of certain subversive groups that have gotten into control of some of our labor organizations. The heart of American labor is sound and loyal and can be depended upon in the great emergency we are now facing.

Mr. Speaker, the splendid people of the district which I have the honor to represent want nothing left undone to insure the preservation of our Nation and our American way of life. This deep feeling and strong sentiment of my people prompted the junior chamber of commerce of the city of Caruthersville, Mo., to adopt the following expressive resolutions which I insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

Whereas the United States of America is now faced with the most acute crisis in the Nation's history in which the liberties, security, and happiness of our citizens are gravely imperiled; and

Whereas we have been emphatically shown by the fall of one free nation after another that only industrial capacity, linked with manpower, can halt the onward march of aggression; and

Whereas our ability to defend ourselves is being grievously handicapped by numerous and protracted strikes in defense industries, and by reason thereof fear and uncertainty are rising in the minds of our citizens; and

Whereas the age bracket of the Junior Chamber of Commerce organizations coincides with the age bracket of the Selective Service Training Act; and

Whereas many of our members from all over the Nation have been, and will be, inducted into the military service of our land, with great financial loss to themselves but with unquestioned patriotism and willingness on their part; and

Whereas the spirit of our people and of our Nation demands equal treatment of all of our citizens engaged in a great effort in order that there may be laid upon every American the same obligation for the support and maintenance of our democratic way of life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Caruthersville Junior Chamber of Commerce in regular meeting assembled, That to make our Nation safe and strong in the crucial days to come, our Government should swiftly adopt a policy of equal justice and consistency for American manpower and American industry; that Congress and the President should act to stop, at once, strikes in defense industries and adjust immediately the differences between capital and labor, to the end that in event of an attack upon our democracy the citizen soldier of the United States will have the tools with which to do the job; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to each of the following: The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Senators from the State of Missouri, and the Representative from the Tenth Congressional District of the State of Missouri; and that a copy hereof be given to the press for publication.

Passed this 2d day of June 1941.

Attest:

L. B. FISHER,

JERE KINGSBURY,
Secretary.

The Property Seizure Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. BENNETT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. WALTER C. PLOESER, OF MISSOURI

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by my colleague from Missouri, Hon. WALTER C. PLOESER, over station KMOX, St. Louis, Mo., June 7, 1941:

CONFISCATION

Station KMOX is rendering an exceptional public service to its listeners by bringing government closer to the people, through the medium of the present series of weekly broadcasts entitled "A Visit From Your Congressman." As your Member of Congress from the Twelfth Missouri District, I am indeed grateful for the opportunity of participating in this program.

There are many pertinent subjects which I would have enjoyed discussing this evening, but, during the present week, two identical bills have been introduced in Congress which have brought to a crisis the tremendous issue of today. These bills might easily transcend in importance everything which has gone before. Senator ROBERT REYNOLDS, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, and Representative ANDREW MAY, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, introduced identical bills granting authority to the President of the United States, and those of his personal choosing, to seize and confiscate property of any kind or character.

So distasteful was this measure to my congressional colleague, ANDREW MAY, that he introduced the bill with the notation "by request." Later, speaking for the press, Congressman MAY said, and I am quoting from the press report: "If I don't like 'em, I say 'By request.' If I like 'em, I put 'em straight." Referring directly to the contents of this bill, MAY was quoted as saying: "It's just dictatorship—raw and unashamed."

From my own observation, I do not mind telling you that when the contents of the May bill became known, the temperature in the House cloakroom rose rapidly, and I must confess mine kept pace with the others. Members of both parties were incensed. This bill is unquestionably the most drastic dictatorial measure ever submitted to any Congress since the founding of the Republic.

Pending a title, the bill is being referred to by many as the property-seizure bill. I prefer, however, to call it the confiscation bill, for it gives the President complete authority to confiscate any or all property, should he so desire. Frankly, as the bill is now written it would complete the most absolute dictatorship in the world today.

I persist in the belief that in the proper functioning of our representative form of government, a republic, the people are entitled to be completely informed.

Once you have read this proposed legislation, there will be little doubt left in your minds as to its intention. Do not mistake the language. I now read briefly from the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That during any period of national emergency proclaimed by the President, the President is authorized when he deems it in the interest of national defense, (a) to requisition and take over, either temporarily or permanently, property of any kind or character, whether real or personal, tangible or intangible, or any part thereof, or any right or interest therein or with respect thereto, whether by virtue of contract, patent, license, or otherwise."

There are continuing provisions in the bill which are too long for me to read now, but none of them lessen or restrict the powers granted in this first section that I have just read. Think of what these words mean: "That during any period of national emergency proclaimed by the President, the President is authorized, when he deems it in the interest of national defense, to requisition and take over, either temporarily or permanently, property of any kind or character, whether real or personal, or otherwise.

In simpler language, the President would have the power, under this bill, H. R. 4949, to take any or all of your property, your business, your money, your home, your bank account, your clothing, your automobile, your savings, your everything, by which, and with which you live. Imagine this—in a democracy. Such an attempt causes us to wonder: Are we defending democracy or are we using the excuse of defense to destroy it?

I am not of the belief that any man living would attempt to confiscate your property and my property on a wholesale, take-all basis, at least not from Americans. The point I am making is that the President, under this bill if enacted into law, could do this. It follows naturally that with such power the President could say to me as a Member of Congress, "You do my bidding regardless of the interest of your people or I will take everything you own." He could do the same thing to you. This isn't conscription in any sense; it is confiscation, "unashamed." Now, I do not believe this bill will pass the Congress in its present form. I am hopeful that it will not pass at all.

The administration has already begun to partially back away. This bill, it seems, originated in the Office of Secretary of War, Stimson. The White House claims to have never read the measure before its introduction. This seems odd—because all of us in Washington know that the Secretary of War or any other Cabinet member never proceeds in any major move without the complete approval of the President. Even the public speeches of the Cabinet members are carefully edited before their release. I am indeed sorry that I must confess that, had a bad reaction been avoided, there would have been no disclaimer from the White House as to authorship.

Let me remind you that the President of the United States now has powers greater than any other President ever had. For almost 8½ years we have been under continuing emergencies of one form or another. The President asked for powers to cope with the emergencies and they were granted. Then, too, the war-time emergency legislation written during the last World War is for the most part—still the law of the land. Under these laws, now on the statute books, the President can if he so desires, take over and operate any plant that fails to cooperate in the production of defense materials. He can correct or alleviate any un-American situation which hampers our defense. President Wilson had these powers—President Roosevelt has them now. Then why this new request for complete confiscatory power?

Surely you and I as Americans must awaken to the trend to completely destroy our form of government and the liberty that we enjoy.

Oh, what crimes are committed in the name of democracy.

You have as much right to be heard as any living American, and I implore you to make yourselves heard on this subject. Tell your Member of Congress and your Senators that this bill, H. R. 4949, or ~~4-9-4-9~~, and the identical Senate bill go too far—much too far—that they must be defeated.

Erection of Monument to Richard S. Scarrem at Eddyville, Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, when the Revolutionary War was fought, the region west of the Mississippi was still largely an uncharted and an unexplored wilderness as far as white habitation was concerned, and in the State of Iowa there are probably buried not to exceed four or five veterans of the Revolutionary War.

In the community cemetery at Eddyville, Iowa, one of these heroes is resting in peace—Richard S. Scarrem—who served in the Saratoga campaign that resulted in the surrender of General Burgoyne and his army, probably the turning point of the war. On Memorial Day this year the American Legion, D. A. R., Lions Club, other civic organizations and public-spirited men, including Superintendent of Schools L. C. Taylor and others, cooperated in erecting a monument to Richard S. Scarrem, and with an appropriate program dedicated it to the memory of Richard Scarrem, erected a flagpole, and gave a ceremony in honor of heroes of all wars.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a news story by C. E. Baldwin in the Eddyville (Iowa) Tribune of June 5, 1941, and two telegrams, one from the Governor of the State and one from myself, concerning this important event.

The matter follows:

One of the outstanding Decoration Day services observed in Eddyville was held Friday when district and State officials of the American Legion, D. A. R., Lions, and other organizations gathered to dedicate the memorial to Richard J. Scarrem, Mahaska County's only Revolutionary War veteran and the new soldiers' and sailors' plot in Highland Cemetery.

The plot is located in the Eddyville Cemetery, one of the oldest in the new purchase and has the distinction of being in a grounds that has buried therein soldiers of every war that the United States has ever fought.

In addition to Scarrem of the Revolution it includes: Col. James Vance, War of 1812; William Jenkins, of the Seminole War (1837); E. W. Myrick and three other veterans of the Mexican War and veterans of the Civil War, Spanish-American War, and World War.

Rain that threatened during the day finally interrupted the ceremonies of the afternoon and the program was shortened as the more than 2,000 persons spent much of the time between speeches seeking shelters under trees and in cars.

A parade from the school grounds with American Legion posts from surrounding towns, Boy and Girl Scouts, and Veterans of Foreign Wars was greeted by the crowd that jammed all available space in the vicinity of the memorial plot.

The flag-raising ceremony, with Hayden Evans, scout bugler, was followed by a prayer by Dr. Charles M. Edmondson, of Oskaloosa. In the absence of Fred Brewer, district governor of the Lions, Clifford Thoma, governor-elect, dedicated the flagpole given by the Eddyville Lions Club.

Rev. A. S. Kilbourn, former pastor of the Eddyville Congregational Church, was in the midst of a speech dedicating the memorial plot when the rain came and drove the crowd to shelter, and speeches from that point were given from the shelter of a sound truck bearing loud-speaker equipment. Frank Miles gave a short talk, and Mrs. A. E. Augustine, of the Oskaloosa Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, unveiled the marker.

The program closed by a salute from the American Legion firing squad and Taps sounded by the Boy Scout bugler. Telegraphic communications were read from Governor Wilson and Congressman KARL LECOMPTE.

Too much credit cannot be given to the local men who gave their time in preparing the plot and arranging an excellent program in the dedication of it. No attempt will be made to list the men responsible for the ceremonies, but the community appreciates and thanks them for their efforts.

RECEIVE TELEGRAMS FROM WILSON AND LE COMPTE

Unable to be present, Congressman KARL LECOMPTE and Governor Wilson sent the following messages, which were read at the dedication:

"I sincerely regret my inability to be with you for the services of dedication for the memorial to Richard Scarrem, Revolutionary War hero, at his lasting resting place. More than a year ago I included in an address a statement that men who fought with Washington at Valley Forge built cabins in Iowa, and was immediately countered by skeptics who did not believe this to be true. It is true, nevertheless. While Iowa was settled at a later period, the men who won the first victory for freedom participated. The fact that they were few in number makes it the more appropriate that we do honor today to the memory of their accomplishments.

"We recognize this as a day in which to do honor to one noble veteran and, by so doing, to fulfill the larger purpose of memorial remembrance of all the soldiers of the Republic, that we may not only decorate their graves with the flowers of love, but refresh ourselves with recalling what they did and what it means for us and all who shall come after.

"So it is that we salute the flag of the stars and the stripes with a feeling of reverence a little deeper than ever before. Its meaning seems to be to us greater than ever in the history of the world. Certain it is that it has a meaning for peoples in remote corners of the world that fixes their attention upon that flag as never before.

"For as there is deeply embedded in every human being that which for want of a better name we refer to as his or her soul, so also there is a soul of the Nation and a living principle running through all the people of every community that is fit to survive. Today is a good time to think about all this; to think hard, to think courageously, to think with wisdom.

"All honor to the memory of Richard Scarrem. All honor to the sacred principles for which he and his comrades made this Nation safe. All honor to the American Legion, the Lions Club, and other patriotic organizations and citizens who have made this dedication possible. May this memorial serve to symbolize all that is best in our American way of life.

"GEORGE A. WILSON,
"Governor."

MESSAGE FROM LE COMPTE

"On this great occasion when the patriotic citizens of Eddyville are assembled to pay tribute to the heroic dead of all wars and to dedicate a fitting memorial to one of the immortals of the Revolutionary War, Richard Scarrem, I beg to add one simple thought. Let us resolve anew that we will not give up the fight for liberty, that we will emulate his example of unselfish devotion to his country and the ideal good which makes life grandly worth living. I congratulate and commend the community upon the accomplishment of this fine project, the dedication of a monument and erection of a flag pole.

"K. M. LECOMPTE,
"Congressman, Fifth District."

EDITORIAL FROM THE MEMPHIS (TENN.) COMMERCIAL APPEAL

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a short editorial that appeared in the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., on June 7, 1941, pertaining to the present strike situation, and entitled "Questions Unanswered."

It strikes me that this editorial expresses one of the most common-sense viewpoints on the present strike situation that I have read anywhere. It expresses my view in a nutshell.

The editorial follows:

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal of June 7, 1941]

QUESTIONS UNANSWERED

How many ordinary citizens—plain, sensible folk—President Roosevelt and his advisers talk to in the course of a day or a week is more than we know. On that account we are not sure whether the President and company are aware of the questions men and women are asking, so far without getting any answers that satisfy them. Whatever the case, though, it behooves them to get their ears to the ground, for the feeling is basic and the problem is profound.

What we have in mind is illustrated by the fact that a man, a resident of a small mid-south town and the salt-of-the-earth sort, dropped in at this office the other day. We'll back his public spirit and his patriotism against anybody's. He wanted to know why the same Government that had drafted his boy away from a good job to fight for his country, if necessary, couldn't draft the man who was supposed to be building weapons for his boy to use and was out on strike for the difference between $1.12 and $1.15 an hour.

In the same connection we think of a telephone call from a woman who wanted to know if any action had been taken to stop strikes in defense industries; and if not, why not. She declared herself willing to give up her boy for a year, even if it meant scrimping and the loss of certain small pleasures his pay ordinarily gave her, but she still wanted to know why the Government couldn't draft the strikers.

Then there was the Army private that we got to chatting with, and all we know about him is that he evidently came from somewhere in the Midwest. The twang of his tongue told that much. He wanted to know if you can whip a tank with a pickax; and if you can't, he said, he was out of luck because a pick was all he had. He also wanted to know why the Government could take him away from home and his job and his fun if it couldn't put the same screws on men whose job it was to build stuff for him to train with.

The best we could do was to tell these folks, not to mention lots of others, that we didn't have the answers, but that we hoped Washington did have and would give them out before long. What we do know is that such voices are the voices of the American people, and that when they want to know such things somebody had better tell them without stammering.

Wage and Hour Division Ruling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. HILL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from a letter which was received this morning from a constituent of mine who is in the stationery business. He complains about the "imperical ruling" by the Wage and Hour Division:

THE W. H. KISTLER STATIONERY CO.,
Denver, Colo., June 7, 1941.

HON. WILLIAM S. HILL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BILL: I read with some interest this morning a release from our National Association which gave the speech you made in front of the House plus some amended remarks.

It seems that some interpretative bulletins have been issued giving an imperial ruling that the furniture departments and mimeograph departments come under the purview of the act because they sell merchandise supposedly which is used by firms in interstate commerce, therefore, this merchandise is of interstate commerce, and we recently had to pay a lot of back wages to the clerical force in these two departments.

We can, for instance, sell mimeograph paper at the moment in our stationery department and the retail salesmen on the floor would not come under the act, but if the same paper were sold on the balcony by a clerk in the mimeograph department that sale would come under the act. We can sell a cheap card index cabinet at the moment on the floor of the stationery department or we can sell folders or cards there and the salesmen would not come under the act, but if the same merchandise were sold in the furniture department it would come under the act.

It is the contention of the Wage and Hour Division that a retail sale should be determined by the question of the amount of the sale and of the discount allowed rather than the thought as to whether the sale was made to the ultimate consumer of the merchandise. If, for instance, any individual came into our store and purchased a binder at list, the sale would not be in interstate commerce, but if the same individual came in and purchased a quantity of binders and was given a quantity discount, that particular sale might come under the Act.

It is inconceivable to me that the amount of merchandise made in any sale or the discount at which that merchandise is sold has any bearing on the case. The only question involved so far as I can see is whether the merchandise was sold for resale which would obviously make it a wholesale transaction and therefore would come under the present law, or whether the sale was made to the ultimate consumer for the use in facilitating the transaction of his business. These things naturally pertain primarily to the stationery business.

Take, however, the case of the dry goods stores. Normally, I cannot conceive how any normal dry goods store is anything but a retail establishment. They do sell merchandise, however, in their Contract Department and they are sold to hotels, clubs, and other organizations. This merchandise is sold in quantity and at a discount. It moves, however, to the ultimate consumer. If the present definition of the Wage and Hour Division of a retailer is applied to this case, that contract department of this dry goods store would come under the Act, and with their present ruling any department of the dry goods store which handled any details for the contract department would also come under the Act. This would mean at least all of the office force which bought or billed this merchandise would be subject to its provisions as would all of its delivery departments and shipping departments.

I believe, as I have urged in previous letters to Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS and to our two Senators that a very much clearer definition should be given as to what constitutes a retailer, and secondly, as to what portion of business executed by a firm would bring that firm under the act. Let me again repeat, I believe the general conception is that a retail organization is one which in the main sells merchandise to the ultimate consumer.

I do not want to further bother you about this whole situation, but I wanted to bring our own situation more clearly to your mind.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,
THE W. H. KISTLER STATIONERY CO.,
ERLE O. KISTLER.

Industrial Migration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 9 (legislative day of Monday, May 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY DR. WILL W. ALEXANDER

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of industrial migration prepared by Dr. Will W. Alexander, of the Office of Production Management, and read in his absence before the National Conference of Social Work, held at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 2, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The unlimited national emergency challenges the machines and the manpower of our Nation as they have never been challenged before. While the world presents a chaotic picture, from the American standpoint certain fundamentals are completely clear: (1) Democracy and its free institutions are menaced by the forces that seek to destroy all freedom and substitute state slavery; (2) the menace is the menace of battle on land and sea and in the air; (3) battle today is a matter of machines—the most complicated and destructive machines ever known to man; (4) machines are manufactured in workshops, by plant capacity, labor capacity, managerial capacity, working all together.

Thus, the war of democracy becomes ultimately a war of the workshops—democracy's free workshops against the slave workshops of the totalitarian system—and because the democracies were peaceably minded their workshops started late. Free industry now must overtake the mobilized production of regimented Germany, plus the additional production of the countries Germany has overrun. This is a terrific task, and the whole future of democracy on earth is at stake.

As matters stand, approximately $42,000,000,000—with more to come, for the measure of what we must do is Hitler's and not ours—must be converted into ships, planes, tanks, food, clothing, and the thousands of other items needed for democracy's defense on the battlefield. Of this sum about $37,000,000,000 have already been appropriated or authorized by the Congress.

We have made good beginnings toward the fulfillment of this objective. But they are only beginnings. There is no basis for complacency when we examine our efforts in the light of what we and other democracies must do in order to survive. It is true that in April nonagricultural employment reached a new all-time high of 37,617,000. It is true that for the sixth consecutive month employment has exceeded the levels of corresponding months for all years on record. It is true that more than 2,000,000 persons were absorbed into defense industries between May and December of 1940 and that 4,000,000 are at work in those industries today. But it is also true that defense industry should require 3,000,000 more workers by January 1942 than were employed at the start of this year, and that an abnormally high percentage must, because of the nature of the work, be skilled workers. For example, the machine-tool industry, in which skill is very high, must employ 25,000 more workers by the end of the year. They may be hard to find. The aircraft industry must have 200,000 more men in its plants of final assembly than it had on January 1, and the shipbuilding industry must have 325,000 more than its present 300,000 workers on the pay roll by September 1942, both including a high proportion of skilled. Any shortages that develop in material, capacity, manpower, or skill must tend to frustrate the necessary industrial expansion.

It is in the light of this necessity to expand, and to avoid all factors of waste, that we must look at the problem of industrial migration. This, of course, is not a new problem. We are, characteristically, a migratory nation, and it is a familiar fact that a whole assortment of economic and social problems hinges about the migration of workers—problems ranging from those of health, education, and family life to those of losses in productive efficiency by industries and by communities. But in this emergency all such problems have an amplified significance. The Labor Division of the Office of Production Management from the outset has taken cognizance of these problems, involved in migration, which accentuated our unpreparedness during the World War; when (to quote the familiar study of Clark, Hamilton, and Moulton) there was "little or no guidance from the top, since the industries and labor resources of the country had never been effectively cataloged and classified." There was also a "tremendous concentration of contracts. * * * The war-industry districts * * * reached out to the rest of the Nation for materials, money and men. They required that scores of thousands of workers be transferred to them, from districts where war work was not being done." Along several concurrent lines of attack within a unified policy of action, the Labor Division is coping with this general problem now.

Uncontrolled, helter-skelter migration of labor has presented itself, during this first year of the defense program, certainly not on any such scale as existed during the World War, but still to an undesirable extent. For example, by the middle of last November 10,000 more persons than could secure employment had poured into Camp Blanding, in Florida. They came from every State in the Nation. Many of them came with families; they had little or no knowledge as to the number of jobs open or the precise skills needed. There was no housing for them; no sanitary facilities; it is fortunate that prompt action minimized the effects of this planless migration. Similar situations were reported incipiently in Fort Bragg in North Carolina, Fort Meade in Maryland, Camp Beauregard in Louisiana, Fort Allen in Vermont, and in other places. While these areas were construction sites, which require a highly mobile labor supply, nevertheless somewhat the same condition has been in evidence in other parts of the country and in other than construction projects.

Ohio reports that many of the 7,000 migrants who flocked in from Kentucky and Tennessee in January remain unemployed. In California only a fraction of the thousands of agricultural workers who have moved toward areas of defense production have found work. The north-central and midwestern industrial areas report a considerable influx of workers of all kinds. Massachusetts has drawn many migrants, and Connecticut reports that migratory laborers are streaming into the State to a large and alarming extent, and that a great majority of these workers do not have much to offer in the way of skill. In many communities reporting labor influx resident labor is not yet fully employed.

In some cases workers are migrating from areas where they could actually have been more easily and more effectively employed than in the areas into which they are streaming. Their hopes for employment often have no substantial basis in fact. The communities which they left may be adversely affected. We often forget that the problem of out-migration may be just as important as in-migration. Our surveys have indicated a surprising number of small "ghost towns" and overlooked communities with idle plants and machinery which can and should be put to work, and will be if their labor supply is not dissipated.

On the other side of the picture, there is a definite need for the importation of certain types of labor to speed defense production. But the types must be carefully selected and are usually highly skilled. A specific indication of the extent of this necessary migration is contained in a survey of 68 labor-market areas with a total population of close to 17,000,000 people. The survey, compiled by the Bureau of Employment Security, reveals that these particular areas must absorb more than a million persons of the approximate 4,000,000 new workers needed this year. Of this million, more than 350,000 will have to be of special skills. For the San Diego, San Francisco, and Vallejo areas of California alone there must be either local development or in-migration of 31,000 skilled workers. Detroit will need 66,000 to 88,000 skilled workers more than it has now. Philadelphia needs 70,000 such workers. Northern New Jersey needs 30,000; the Dallas-Fort Worth area requires 17,200; Wichita must find 7,000. And so on for other specific industrial districts.

This, of course, adds to the already enormous problem of allocating our manpower efficiently. While we cannot establish any strict ratio between industrial expansion and necessary migration, it is apparent that considerably more than 350,000 workers will have to be resettled. Moreover, thousands of new service workers will be needed to supply the immediate wants of these in-migrants. And when we remember that many of these workers will have families, and that there are approximately 4 persons in the average American family, we begin to appreciate the tremendous scope of the undertaking and the danger of chaos which it represents.

Unplanned, chaotic, haphazard migration of labor, as well as the immobilization of labor in particular areas, can disturb the national-defense program as much as any other factor. Thousands of man-hours can be lost, machines may remain idle, costs can jump to fantastic levels, health and social problems can develop, unless there is complete and wholehearted cooperation of both industry and labor with the agencies of government that are working to systematize this gigantic jigsaw puzzle.

From the very beginning the Labor Division, first in the National Defense Advisory Commission and now in the Office of Production Management, has concentrated on this problem. Its Labor Training and Supply Section is coordinating the work of seven governmental agencies, as well as the Army and Navy, in locating, training, and placing workers in defense industries. These agencies include the Bureau of Employment Security, the United States Office of Education, the United States Civil Service Commission, the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship, the Work Projects Administration, the National Youth Administration, and the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Nearly 6,000,000 unemployed workers have been registered with the Bureau of Employment Security by occupation, by kinds and degrees of skill, and by communities. Some illuminating cases of economic waste turned up in the course of this notable achievement of registration. A spot welder was discovered making $49.40 a month as a member of a W. P. A. weed-eradication crew. An expert on cannon rifling, trained in the Skoda works in Czechoslovakia, was found herding sheep. One defense manufacturer appealed to a State employment agency for a good man at slide-rule and blueprint work. In half an hour the agency called back. "We've found him," they reported. "He's right in your own stockroom making $20 a week." We have developed an effective mechanism for securing an inventory of our labor resources and we now have the basic inventory. But still more workers must register and more employers must utilize the free public employment service, so that greater coordination can produce a more systematic matching of worker-skill to worker-location.

In addition, monthly reports are being made on labor-market conditions. The network of 1,500 public employment offices today can transfer workers from one area to another quickly and efficiently, and with knowledge of conditions in both areas. It might be added parenthetically that the labor organizations, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O., have helped very greatly by cataloging and transferring their own memership when they have received requests for skilled workers.

These labor-market surveys are proving invaluable in another respect, namely, in the location of plant sites. While it was necessary in launching the defense program to let 85 percent of the contracts in 12 States with 48.3 percent of the population, a special plant site committee has been established within the Office of Production Management to avoid any such undue concentration of defense work as occurred during the first World War and to ascertain that the contracting plant and its labor requirement are within economical touch. New plants and the major expansion of previously existing plants are now being located with a direct view to the avoidance of all possible migration or importation of workers. The use of resident labor is the key.

The training of existing resident labor reserves to fit the needs of defense industries offers an obvious means of reducing migration. Such training, as you know, is being applied on a very large scale. Refresher courses have been instituted to polish up rusty skills; apprentice courses have received new impetus; defense vocational schools and such agencies as the Work Projects Administration and National Youth Administration are training workers day and night with funds appropriated by Congress and supplied through the agencies indicated. I am happy to report that these vocational classes are this month graduating their millionth trainee, whereas during the entire World War period only 60,000 persons received vocational training for defense. Here is the basic training. However, the higher advancements in skill can best be gained on the job, and to that end a special training-within-industry section has been set up in the labor division. It is under the direction of Channing R. Dooley, formerly personnel director of Socony-Vacuum Corporation. He has secured the cooperation of 430 representatives of management and labor in 22 industrial centers throughout the country who are now engaged in installing these training systems in the defense industries as rapidly as the cooperation of industrial management will permit.

General ability must be trained into specific skill; nondefense skill must be modified to defense purposes; highly skilled operations must be put on a mass-production basis by isolating techniques. At the same time, "upgrading" of all workers into higher skills or into leadership capacities must go on constantly if the expanding plant organizations are to remain efficient. And training of resident labor skill in the localities where that skill is required is the fundamental answer to the problem of migration. As a further answer to that problem, the Office of Production Management is urging the greater development of subcontracting. It has asked time and time again that prime contractors do not hog defense awards, but break up the large contracts into bits and pieces and farm out all possible work. We want every bit of capacity—no matter how small, no matter where—to be utilized. We want every community, its people and its workers, brought into the work of defense. Fortunately, we can point out some outstanding successes in subcontracting, such as Sperry Gyroscope, York Safe & Lock Co., Kearney & Treder, William Sellers, Allison Motor, and many other companies. But these are not enough. We want subcontracting and more subcontracting and then subcontracting again. We want the skill requirements of the subcontracting plants coordinated with the employment program and the training program. In this way only, can the Nation utilize every item of mechanical and labor capacity that can be turned to defense purposes, and at the same time, cut down the need for migration, as local idle labor and local idle plants are brought together, adapted to defense production, and given work to do.

It all sums up to this: We are trying to substitute occupational mobility for geographic mobility. We are trying to bring the job to the worker rather than having the worker roam in search of the job. And while the cooperation we have received has on the whole been encouraging, there should exist no place in defense industry where that cooperation is not forthcoming. Employers must recognize that not only will these programs mean so-much and so-much in dollars and cents of plant economy, but that system is imperative to the work of national defense. As with the supplies of materials, so with the labor supply—it must be systematically and economically routed to the point of need, and no defense contractor should indulge in practices that disrupt the major program. The maximum utilization and training of adjacent idle labor is the key.

In March, the average rate of absorption of new workers into defense employment reached 5.62 per 100 workers on the pay rolls. While this was the highest rate for any corresponding period in several years, voluntary separations or quits also were reported at the rate of 1.70 per 100 employees, which was a greater percentage of separations than in any month on record. Here is one statistical reflection of a condition of labor turn-over that must be coped with; and we may ask: To what can we attribute this high rate of so-called voluntary separations? A great deal of it can be said to be induced separations—to put it bluntly, labor pirating by scouts and advertisements promising higher pay and ideal working conditions. It is strange that some who complain most bitterly about strike stoppages, which have amounted so far to but a fraction of 1 percent of the man-days actually worked, will competitively bid for another plant's workers, and create delays and disruptions in defense production, through failure to utilize local resident labor, train it to the full, and so aid both the Nation and themselves. It is strange that some who have the opportunity to stabilize their labor supplies do not learn the familiar truth that migration flows from areas of less economic opportunity to areas that have higher wages, lower hours, better conditions, and offer the worker better opportunity for employment and advancement on his job.

And here we encounter a problem long existent in this Nation of ours—a Nation whose population has been assembled from all the races, creeds, and peoples of the earth.

This is the problem of prejudice—of intangible lines of cleavage operating to prevent the full usage of our manpower in the cause of defense. We have found in area after area that it is not the nature of the labor supply which is restricting the man-hours of production but the nature of the labor demand, and here is a restriction that grows ever more acute as the many divisions of defense industry concurrently expand.

Age requirements have gone by the board to considerable extent. Increases have been registered in the employment of women. But racial and national lines of discrimination have remained damaging bottlenecks in the utilization of America's labor strength. Here is a situation in which, for the sake of the Nation, we must examine our own souls.

Negroes with necessary skills or capacities for skills are still denied employment by most companies. Specifications as to national origin are tending to reach alarming proportions, especially in the industrial areas where aliens are most numerous, and where skilled-labor shortages are most likely to develop. Extreme variations in the individual and regional specifications indicate the purely arbitrary nature of these restrictions. Some employers want both grandparents to be American-born; others will take aliens, but not first-generation Americans of particular national origins; others refuse to take any naturalized citizens at all; and there are many other variations in this picture. These employers have stretched to unnecessary and detrimental lengths the only actual legal restriction on alien employment, which is in regard to defense work of a highly confidential nature. It should be remembered that the category of alien is not only, by itself, an insufficient criterion of disloyalty but that, in many cases, the exact opposite is true. We cannot afford to cast aside democratic-minded men and women of racial and national minorities who want to do their utmost for the defense of liberty; nor can we allow ourselves to be led into the totalitarian practice of intolerance toward any group or groups in our midst.

The Negro and minority sections of the Labor Division, headed, respectively, by Dr. Robert C. Weaver and by Dr. Alexander, recognize that the few advances thus far made in coping with this deeply rooted problem are insufficient. In support of our efforts, Mr. Sidney Hillman, Associate Director General, Office of Production Management, recently issued a letter to all holders of defense contracts, pointing out what such discrimination means in the face of threatened labor stringencies:

"To All Holders of Defense Contracts:

"Pursuant to the decision of the Office of Production Management, I wish to advise you as follows:

"Current reports on labor-market developments indicate skilled labor stringency in a number of fields vital to defense production. This threatens to become more general within the next 3 months. Artificial factors, however, are tending to aggravate this increasingly serious situation. In some of these occupations, we are informed there are good workers available who are not being hired solely because of their racial identity.

"The Office of Production Management expects defense contractors to utilize all available local labor resources before resorting to the recruiting of additional labor from outside their local areas. Our programs of training and labor clearance are being established in accordance with such a policy.

"In many sections of the Nation there are today available labor reserves of Negro workers. Plans for their training and employment in capacities commensurate with their individual skills and aptitudes should be undertaken at once.

"In many localities qualified and available Negro workers are either being restricted to unskilled jobs or barred from defense employment entirely. Because of this situation, Negro workers of skills and aptitudes are in many instances not being included in many of the training programs for defense.

"Such practices are extremely wasteful of our human resources and prevent a total effort for national defense. They result in unnecessary migration of labor, in high rates of labor turn-over, and they increase our present and future housing needs and social problems.

"All holders of defense contracts are urged to examine their employment and training policies at once to determine whether or not these policies make ample provision for the full utilization of available and competent Negro workers. Every available source of labor capable of producing defense materials must be tapped in the present emergency.

"Yours very truly,

"SIDNEY HILLMAN,
"Associate Director General."

Is it not fundamental to the national emergency, then, to insist that all local labor be utilized before recourse is made to importing workers? Is it not fundamental that the gates of local opportunity should be wide open to all, thus counteracting the temptation upon individual workers to migrate? This is preeminently a time when we must consider every phase of our national life in terms of the threats presented by the international scene and the effort our workshops must make. Individual prejudices and preferences must be reexamined; management and labor must do some joint industrial housekeeping; utilization of our industrial and labor and other civilian capacities must keep pace with the military branches in being based on national needs rather than particular desires or emotions.

Time runs out. There is an enormous job to be finished. This task was not of our choosing. But having the supreme advantage of being able to shoulder that task with the spirit and the fortitude of freemen, we must and will finish it in triumph and success. In no other way can we hope for a world in which human beings can control their own destinies—a world of sanity, of stability, of peace and freedom, and the participation of all who have contributions to make under that creative tolerance which is the program of democracy.

W. P. A. Is That Something Which Is Worth Doing Well

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the committee, in reporting out the present relief bill, has followed the President's suggestion in reducing the total amount for W. P. A., but it has gone beyond the President's suggestion in the proposed reduction as found in the bill now before the House. I ought not and do not complain of some reduction, for in our defense program we must cut down somewhere. However, I regret to see a cut at this place. I know, of course, employment in defense industry has called many into jobs and reduced the unemployment problem throughout the country as a whole, but that does not mean that every community in the country has had its unemployment reduced to the same degree.

It must be held in mind that it is in the populous cities in the East where factories are found, and it is along the coast where navy yards are located that our great defense program has taken so many off relief. There are certain States like Arizona, for instance, where there are no navy yards, no factories, and comparatively little defense spending. The real need of W. P. A. is only slightly less in the State of Arizona now than it was prior to the defense program. Surely these facts ought to be taken into account, not only with regard to money appropriated, but also with regard to the need.

Under the direction of the State administrator, W. J. Jamieson, the W. P. A. has done a most commendable piece of work in the State of Arizona. Mr. Jamieson is an able engineer, and a great portion of W. P. A. work has been of a permanent and useful character and engineering construction by design. This has required a staff of experienced men and women who are proficient to begin with, and have grown more proficient as they have carried on their work. I doubt whether 5 percent of total outlay is enough to go for the cost of administration for, where the program is of an engineering nature, it seems that administration should properly cost more than 5 percent. If in such engineering work 5 percent is spent on administration, it pays for the brains and ability and service which determine whether the other 95 percent is well or poorly expended.

I notice by the bill as reported out by the committee that less than 5 percent has been assigned for administration. I do hope some way may be found to increase the allowable percentage for administration, and thus the State administrator may keep the personnel which he has gathered up for this very necessary work and not lose his best members of the force to private employment other than agencies of government. "A thing worth doing is worth doing well"; and I have little patience with an attempt at economizing, either at the expense of those who are being assisted or in reduced salaries for those who are planning and engineering the work.

Commencement Address at Albion College, Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ARTHUR A. VANDENBERG, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on the occasion of the commencement exercises at Albion College, at Albion, Mich., on yesterday, June 9.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad to come to Albion College on this commencement day, despite our mutual difficulty in determining precisely what it is we are "commencing" when we face this angry, anxious, distraught world in June 1941.

I wish I could bring you the traditional graduation address and the comfortable assurances of joy and prosperity and opportunity and peace under the benediction of the blessed American way of life which has set our country apart as the veritable "promised land" for a century and a half of liberty and progress under law. But that would deny the agony of a world in pain and the hazard of American involvement in the consequences of a war—if not in the war itself—which threaten the very fundamentals of civilization.

Instead, I must bring you the hard challenge of grim reality in a world which is cursed with ruthless conquest on the march, and in an America which literally rocks beneath these alien repercussions and which will not know normalcy again within our numbered days.

But while we might all wish for the happier auspices and the relative blessings of yesterday—and the security of dependable tomorrows—there is substantial compensation in the tougher challenge. It offers magnificent adventure in behalf of God and country—not merely in terms of guns and tanks and wings and marching feet but equally in terms of courage and conscience and imperishable American ideals. It invites the sacrifice of service in behalf of great objectives which reflect the total of all human aspirations. It demands brave loyalties to the American tradition. It calls to men and women who will stand upon the battle lines of their convictions—whether in war or in the equal crisis of peace—nor will surrender, no matter what the burden, what the cost, or what the odds.

Commencement, in such circumstances, is no dull approach to the drab routine of cushioned ease. It is no passport to comfortable assurance. It is reveille, sharp and strident, upon the bugles of high destiny itself.

The college graduates of 1941 are the direct heirs of the pioneers who gave us our American inheritance, because no matter what may be the event of this martial conflict new pioneers must fit a new America into new human relationships at home and abroad. This is a solemn prospect. But I beg of you not to contemplate it as a hopeless one. It asks for earnest hearts, but equally for brave and buoyant ones. It is a wonderful thing to be a pioneer. I doubt if there could ever be a greater sense of high achievement than that which thrills the pioneer when he attains his goal. America is assigned so great a role in the unfolding drama of this new era—a new era that can make America the nerve center of this whole earth—a new era that can create a greater America than ever before, if we but make the right decisions as we go along—that we should not greet this day with downcast vision and discouraged eyes but with high spirit and firm purpose to do our full part, each one of us, in making this destiny come true.

We have faced these critical epochs before in the story of the Republic—and the glory of our inheritance is the steadfast faith and valor of those sturdy souls who never flinched in the presence of a kindred challenge. If we feel overwhelmed today by the magnitude of our perplexity, let's remember Valley Forge—when bleeding feet and doubtful hearts incorrigibly clung to the dream of an invincibly free society. Let's remember Gettysburg—and the price men paid, within living memories, to save our precious institutions from disintegration. Let's remember the valiant American Expeditionary Force of 24 short years ago—the last, I hope, that may ever leave our shores. Let's remember, too, that peace hath her victories no less than war; and that the sword is far less the genius and the impulse of our progress than have been the civilian triumphs of a people who have lived the Christian code; who have glorified the home; who have sustained religion and science and the arts; and who have encouraged individual initiative to develop here in the United States the greatest benefits, the largest freedoms, and the highest living standards possessed anywhere upon this earth.

These achievements scorn any faint-heartedness today. We shall, we must, win through. England's heroic example of grim tenacity and valor, in the presence of infinitely greater threats than ever need approach our Nation, is an inspiration. I have every confidence that the generations of tomorrow—and tomorrow starts today for you—will no less meet the vital test.

Someone has said that "America is God's last chance to make a world." Underlying all else, and dominating all else, that is our responsibility in this tragic hour when external civilization is threatened with collapse, and when our own America is too often urged to take sinister pot-luck in this Tower of Babel. Whatever may be your individual interpretation of our proper course and the policies we should pursue, that above all else is the assignment of your diploma here in Albion on June 9, 1941. "America is God's last chance to make a world."

In the supreme issue of peace or war which harasses every thinking heart, it would be inappropriate for me to use your forum to plead for the specific formula which I believe would best serve our own United States in these hours of critical decision—because conscientious citizens among us too deeply differ as to our appropriate road. But I hope I am right in believing that I may say a few fundamental things without offense to this occasion. They are all predicated, believe me, on the proposition that after our course is officially set, we must close ranks and unite behind one invincible American purpose. They are all predicated on the proposition that Nazi aggression shall not come to this Western World. They are all predicated, equally, on the proposition that until the die is irrevocably cast, the people in this democracy of ours shall continue freely to assert their views, and shall participate in the fateful debates which determine whether another Unknown Soldier shall personify their blood and tears.

The first thing I would say is this: While there is no such thing as complete physical isolation for America in this foreshortened world, there is still such a things as a vast insulating ocean, and it is 150 times as wide as the unpassable English Channel. There is still such a thing as an effective will to stay out of other people's wars, pursuant to Presidential pledges only 7 months ago. There is still such a thing as an American foreign policy, which is primarily devoted to defending America by defending America behind not only the ramparts of nature but also behind an impregnable national defense which requires no proxy to vindicate our freedom.

The next thing I would say is this: It is perfectly obvious that a victory for magnificent, intrepid Britain is to our everlasting advantage. Under the policies which we have embraced it is our major obligation to develop maximum material aid for England with swiftest efficiency—and I would withhold no effort of this nature. But our basic policy and objective surely must stem from the proposition that America is going to survive no matter what happens in Europe, Asia, or Africa.

The next thing I would say is this: It would be the tragedy of the ages if we were flung needlessly into a shooting war which might too easily involve us simultaneously on four continents and two oceans, when, in cold fact, we are not adequately prepared for war on one. It would be the tragedy of the ages if we should dissipate the essential nucleus of our own national defense to such a degree that, in a possible hour of ultimate challenge, we could not swiftly defend ourselves and this Western World against any assault by any invader who might blunderingly mistake our spirit of detachment for a spirit of pacifism or a spirit of surrender. It would be the tragedy of the ages if anything we do should contribute to insufferable aggression; yet it would be equally the tragedy of the ages if we should be less eager to lead the world to a just peace—not an appeaser's peace, but a just peace—at the first legitimate opportunity to end this process of mutual destruction which Moscow, like a vulture, waits to use to its advantage—than we are to arm the earth for war.

And the next thing I would say is this: We must not lose our own democracy at home while striving to save democracy somewhere else. It is a thrilling apostrophe when the great President of the United States asserts his noble purpose to establish his famous "four freedoms" * * * "everywhere in the world in our time and generation." I would not desert this dream within limits of reason and reality. But neither would I desert reason and reality. Nor would I ignore the warnings of Joseph P. Kennedy, the President's great friend and our former Ambassador to Britain, who lived in the heart and center of this world tragedy until last November. Said Kennedy 2 weeks ago at Oglethorpe University:

"Democracy cannot be imposed by force or otherwise. * * * In our attempt at this colossal crusade we should end in failure and disgrace abroad, in disillusionment and bankruptcy at home. * * * We cannot divert the tides of the mighty revolution now sweeping Asia and Europe. They were not of our making and they will not be subject to our control, no matter how courageously we strive to subject them. * * * We should not be deluded by any claim that self-interest should make us guardians of the peace of the rest of the world."

In my judgment, fellow Americans, there stands the naked truth. The everlasting verity of things was set down by Paul to Timothy in Holy Writ:

"If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

We have a selfish interest in the welfare of the world. We have spiritual responsibilities which are as wide as the brotherhood of man. But these things always must be assessed in the light of our own situation. Always and forever our first charge and our first obligation is not only to save democracy but also to make it work right here in our own United States.

And the next thing I would say is this. Our leadership owes the American people complete candor regarding our aims and intentions and commitments. There has been too much mystery and too much equivocation. This is still the people's Government, and our democracy can arrive at intelligent opinions only if it is authentically informed. The people must not be misled. Neither must those brave people abroad whom we promise to aid, be misled. Nothing could exceed in cruelty and bitter disillusionment the encouragement of these brave people to depend upon a degree and an extent of American martial support which we cannot deliver or which exceeds our intended commitments. That would be treachery which would win for us only the eternal enmity of the whole earth. So, above all else, let us be careful not "to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope."

These are the tenets of my faith—and I am encouraged to believe that I speak in some representative degree for Michigan in view of the fact that the State legislature, Democrats and Republicans alike, unanimously memorialized the President recently to pursue the twofold purpose of substantial aid to Britain and strong domestic defense, adding that our involvement as a belligerent would be disastrous to democratic institutions.

These are the basic objectives, in this hour of critical decision, which I commend to your thoughtfulness. You may disagree. That is still your privilege. If you do, I shall respect your attitudes; and I shall complain of you only if, on the one hand, you lack the courage of your convictions, regardless of consequences, or if, on the other hand, you try to deny me my right to my convictions regardless of whether you approve or not. There comes a point at which we cannot tolerate the dynamite of dissension; namely, the dissension of those ugly traitors and saboteurs who advocate and practice the overthrow of our own Government by force. I would deport them, or I would intern them without a moment's hesitation. By no legitimate philosophy of free speech is Columbia required to nurse vipers in her bosom. But when honest citizens—all equally faithful to their country—assert differing opinions regarding the selection of a proper policy for us to pursue in the defense and the salvation of America, I condemn as reckless, sinister tyranny the growing habit of any person or any group which attempts to smear the motives, the purposes, and the patriotism of those who speak otherwise; and this applies equally to those who, in such circumstance, attack the President, and it applies to the President himself when he hurls epithets at the shining targets of his opposition.

Let me repeat: "America is God's last chance to make a world." Heaven only knows what lies ahead. All we can be sure of is that, win, lose, or draw, this world of ours is going to be a tough nut to crack for all the years that any of us shall survive in life. Our war decisions are desperately serious business. Our ultimate peace decisions will be still more desperate and still more serious. They are times to try men's souls. You who step this morning from the cloister to the arena are indeed keeping a rendezvous with destiny. Let's search together—you of young America, we of the passing generation—let's search together for the road of regeneration rather than destruction; let's make our blessed country so strong that no enemy, however mad, will ever dare assail us; let's make her so strong—spiritually as well as physically—that our independent influence can always weigh heavily in the scales of justice and humanity whenever and wherever we may choose to speak; then let's keep her influence independent; let's not yield one fraction of an inch in our entrenched hostility to the crucifying curse which Hitler personifies in his bloody challenge to the souls of men; let's do our maximum, short of war itself, to aid those intrepid foreign forces which contend against this curse; but let's always think things through, remembering that we are at present unprepared for war ourselves; remembering that aid to England can seriously suffer if we get in war ourselves because our own Nation will then demand a concentration on our own defense; remembering that our supreme commitment is to protect this Western Hemisphere; remembering that we tried once before to "make the world safe for democracy" and failed; remembering that the United States must finally exercise the authority that brings peace out of this chaos which threatens to reduce even a victor to the conquest of a shambles; remembering that "America is God's last chance to make a world."

Commencement for some of you may shortly take you into the uniform of your country—though I pray that we may avoid the active plague of war or of any policies that would needlessly drag us in, and that there may never be a second A. E. F. on foreign shores. If you are called to the colors, you will justify the magnificent tradition of the fighting sons of Uncle Sam. When once our course is set, we must close ranks and unite against all enemies, foreign and domestic; and to the last man or woman among us, bearing the diplomas of American patriotism, we must dedicate ourselves to the achievement of our national aims. "My country, may she always be right; but right or wrong, my country."

But whether you are destined for a uniform or not, "Commencement" for all of you brings you face to face with your share of responsibility for American decisions which will touch every hearthstone of your homeland for a century to come. Your privilege here of higher education has intensified your obligation in proportion as it has put your brains in mesh, cultivated your ability to think, and fertilized the courage of your hearts. So play your part—in or out of uniform—in making America secure, in keeping America free, in serving America's new destiny, and in building here the ever broadening blessings of the brotherhood of man.

Now, let me tell you that in such a soul-searching hour, I come to Albion to gather, quite as much as to give, inspiration. For if I were searching for a campus upon which I should hope to find the essential elements of faithful and indispensible Americanism at its best—the roots of essential understandings and essential loyalties—I should seek a middle-western town where people still have time to live and think and pray; where common sense is still insulated against the frenzies of mass hysteria; and I would seek a Christian college where spiritual values still survive. I would come to Albion.

I quote from your Albion catalog:

"Albion College accepts the teaching of true scholarship as her most serious task; yet she consistently teaches the higher life that is above text books and laboratory processes. This manifests itself in usefulness to society"—usefulness to society—"as well as to the individual."

This is a precise paraphrase of what the tremendous American scientist, Steinmetz, once wrote to Roger Babson:

"When the genius of the world turns from science to spirituality and examines the realities of God in the laboratories of life, the world will make more progress in one generation than in the last four."

It is what Ruskin said of Venice: "The decline of her political prosperity was exactly coincident with that of her domestic and individual religion."

Now I quote from your admirable President, Dr. John L. Seaton:

"Unless out of such studies interpreted in the light of the present, the student comes to understand the vast movements of life with their prophetic import, and to feel that he belongs to the ages and holds priceless values in trust for posterity, our labor is in vain. Only as the individual reaches maturity in knowledge and wisdom ideals and sense of responsibility, can we have a mature and stable civilization."

I take the liberty of summarizing this Albion theme as meaning that education is not an end in itself; it is only a means to an end; that the true purpose of higher education is not so much to teach men and women how to make a living, but how to make a useful life. And in the presence of these Albion objectives, I present my compliments to her graduates for 1941; and I tell them that their country was never in greater need of them, in this meaning of their diplomas, than in this perilous hour when every value we hold dear is hanging in the balance. But I repeat: it is no hour for the appeaser or for the defeatist or for pessimism—no matter how forbidding the horizons. It is an hour for faith and courage and the spirit of indomitable youth, determined that a greater America than ever shall come from this crucible of fate. That is the challenge, multiplied a thousand-fold today; that is the challenge to you who, as President Seaton said, "hold priceless values in trust for posterity."

What are some of these essential loyalties to which I have referred?

The first is loyalty to God. Systems of faith are different; but God is one. Voltaire said: "If there had been no God, it would have been necessary to invent one." Separateness of church and State is vital to the American system; but separateness of God and state is the open doorway to eternal ruin. That is why communism and nazism, defiling the altars of men's faith, finally are doomed. That is why not a single, great, state paper in the history of the United States—from George Washington, uttering his first inaugural and frankly tendering "our homage to the Great Author of every public and private good," down to the present hour—has ever neglected a pledge of allegiance to the only Super-Sovereign to whom America bends a knee.

This is no ethereal, intangible thing. Witness President John Adams calling the whole country to its knees in a day of prayer that should forefend against impending crisis in Franco-American affairs—and it did. Witness the Senate of the United States, in the dark, forbidding days of 1863, days rendered terrible by the Union's crushing defeat at Fredericksburg, unanimously petitioning the President to proclaim an hour in which a God-loving people should seek "Him for succor, according to His appointed way, through Jesus Christ." And witness the responsive Lincoln, eagerly declaring that history validates the scriptures when they announce that "those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord." And call it what you please—coincidence or cause and effect—the tide of battle turned. Witness President Woodrow Wilson, calling America to Armageddon. "God helping her," said he, "she can do no other." Witness President Coolidge reminding us that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge."

The first essential loyalty is to the thrones of grace. I know of no greater American insurance than the abstract but suggestive fact that out of a billion copies of the Bible, since the printing art began, one-third have been circulated in our own United States in 150 years.

The second essential loyalty is to the living spirit of the Constitution—the hope of mankind this morning all around this darkened world. When rough, uncouth, unlettered Andrew Jackson was made a doctor of laws by Harvard, it was a source of great merriment to many superficial minds to contemplate him in his uncomfortable scholastic robes. As he stood upon the college rostrum some would-be wit, unconscious of his own pathetic limitations, called out truculently from the audience, "Why don't you give 'em a little Latin, Doctor?" Quick as a flash, Old Hickory replied: "I'll give you some Latin if you want it. E pluribus unum, sine qua non!"

Jackson was right. The tides of time, the storms of change have overtaken many another form of government and swept them upon the shoals of history. But the Constitution of the United States—this immortal charter of representative democracy—sails on. It is our supreme heritage. It is sine qua non. It is the warrant of civil liberty for a free people. It is the lighthouse of the world. Those who would undermine it by adroit indirection—and we have seen such efforts in our time—are no better than those who openly would rip it into shreds. It guarantees a government of laws and not of men. Its checks and balances are the greatest creation of the human mind to save a free people from the concentrated tyranny which plagues other lands and which, I warn you, can flow too easily from our own contemporary habits of government by Executive decree at Washington. In the name of the great dead, the living, and the unborn it asks for our fidelities. It is the difference between America and every other land on earth.

"It was not made with the mountains;
It is not one with the deep;
Men, not gods, devised it;
And men, not gods, must keep."

The cardinal difference between our democracy and the totalitarian idealogy which now reaches for universal power is the difference between the alien theory that the citizen is the subject of the State and our theory that the State exists to serve the citizen. In this simple definition lies the crux of today's world-wide strife. Our loyalty to our own ideal is terribly vital. We may call our cause the defense of constitutional government. We may call it the defense of capitalism. We may call it the defense of private enterprise. In essence, it is a defense of the personal liberty, the personal freedoms, the personal initiative, the personal aspirations of each individual citizen beneath the Stars and Stripes. That is the genius of the American system. The "goose step"—or any paraphrase of it—was never intended for the sons of our fathers, yesterday, today, or tomorrow.

It is not a static thing—this American system. It must fit itself to the new necessities of new times. It is social-minded; but it is not socialistic. It must disclose an ever-broadening concept of these human rights and human privileges to which it is dedicated under God. Blindly entrenched conservatism at the right can harm it just as much as blindly brainless radicalism at the left. Its true course is the great middle highway of rational progress—with no detours into special privileges at the right, and no concessions to the leftist mobs. Its greatest dangers are not in Europe. They are right here at home in our own United States. More completely than any other people in this world, we can be the captains of our own fate.

And that is my final plea to you.

The American system, in my humble judgment, is not threatened by conquest or invasion, although no prophet dare be sure. I express the opinion that no combination of enemies could ever cross our borders, if we give even elementary attention to our own defense, and if we stop "fifth columnists" before they ever start. I consider any threat of military invasion to be propaganda fodder which is sheer hysteria, if we give even elementary attention to our own defense.

No; these priceless freedoms, which are the hallmark of our inheritance, are threatened chiefly from within. Of course, they would be definitely blitzkrieged by our own entry into active shooting war, because war swiftly assigns every citizen to his anonymous cog in a vast, impersonal machine. We already find ourselves headed in this direction. That hazard must be accepted if national emergency requires. But I am speaking of the avoidable peacetime threats that are with us always. I am thinking of lax loyalties to the fundamental things of which I have spoken. I am thinking of public and private corruption, and the defilement of the public trust. I am thinking of the lethargy which leaves politics and public affairs to the other fellow and then complains of the results of this complacent default. I am thinking of trends which foster spawning, sprawling bureaucracy in government; trends which reach for regimentation over life and livelihood; trends which climax in government by executive decree, or something worse. I am thinking of sprouting intolerance, which casts a wicked cloud on free religion and free speech. I am thinking of class hatreds and class consciousness organized into class selfishness, regardless of the common weal. I am thinking of broken promises in political campaigns and broken hopes in subsequent administrations—a disillusionment which shatters faith in democratic process. I am thinking of our proneness to rely upon expedients instead of principles. I am thinking of our impulsive hospitality to innovations which are condemned by history and experience. I am thinking of economic bankruptcy, which fatuously pretends that the public credit is not subject to the laws of simple mathematics, and I am thinking of the spiritual bankruptcy which pretends that material achievement is enough. I am thinking of higher education which fails to produce in its graduates an intellectual conviction that the American way of life is worth every effort and every sacrifice which its preservation may entail, and which fails the Albion objective that "usefulness to society is the final goal." And, of course, I am thinking of those active agents of ugly subversion whom we allow to hide behind the very institutions they would destroy by force.

Verily, eternal vigilance has become, more than ever, the price of our liberty, our security, and our peace.

Edwin Markham has summed my theme for me in the thrilling stanzas with which he has described the fall of the Bell Tower of Venice. It is my last word to the graduates of Albion today:

"Yet all the while, in secret, without sound,
The fat worms gnawed the timbers underground.
The twisted worm whose epoch is an hour
Caverned its way into the mighty tower.
And suddenly it swayed, it shook, it broke
And fell in darkening thunder at one stroke.
The tall shaft, with an angel on its crown,
Fell ruining—a thousand years went down.

"And so I fear, my country, not the hand
That shall hurl might and whirlwind on the land.
I fear not Titan traitors that shall rise
To stride like broken shadows on our skies;
I fear the vermin that shall undermine
Senate and school and citadel and shrine;
The worm of fraud, the fatted worm of ease
And all the crawling progeny of these.
I fear the vermin that shall honeycomb the towers
And walls of state in unsuspecting hours."

Graduates of 1941, I welcome you to great adventures in behalf of an ever greater brotherhood of man in an ever greater United States under the benediction of Divine grace. I give you the challenge of Isaiah: "Look ye to the rock whence ye are hewn." And then, with you, I salute the Stars and Stripes.

Retirement of Chief Justice Hughes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by David Lawrence entitled "The Tragedy of Hughes' Retirement."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 4, 1941]

THE TRAGEDY OF HUGHES' RETIREMENT—PERMITS FURTHER WRECKING OF PRINCIPLE OF BIPARTISANSHIP

(By David Lawrence)

The saddest news of the hour is the passing from the Supreme Court of a truly great Chief Justice—Charles Evans Hughes.

It is not merely, however, the retirement itself which may well be an occasion for national regret, but the realization that under the three terms of President Roosevelt the highest Court has become a political institution made up of politicians chosen from the inner circle of official intrigue and partisanship.

There are two vacancies on the high Court today. Can any man trained in the law now sitting on either the Federal or State bench look to the Supreme Court as a possible goal of attainment on merit? Not at all. For only through the channels of politics and personal service to the political chieftain of a national party apparently can promotion be won. The merit-system principle has been dealt a body blow by the five appointments already made and there is talk now of adding two more politicians from the official circle to fill the existing vacancies.

The effect of this policy has already been evident. Political decisions based on the casuistic reasoning of those who have a definite stake apparently in making the present administration's policies effective already have been rendered. Chief among these was the amazing distortion of the laws and the bold addition of words never written by Congress in a labor-relations case recently decided wherein an employer was forced to hire an applicant he had once rejected, being now ordered to compensate in back pay the same employee from the time of the rejection to the date of forced employment.

PUTS PREMIUM ON POLITICS

There are some eminent men on the circuit courts of appeals and some able men on the State supreme courts. But they haven't a chance for promotion in their profession to the Court they all revere. After this a lawyer will be well advised to get into politics early and play the political game with its customary hypocrisies and compromising expediencies if he wishes to land a place on the Supreme Court. The advice given will be to go to Washington, get an appointment in some department or agency, compromise with principle, play the game of the administration, and look for ultimate reward on the bench.

Politics has been the ruling factor not only with Supreme Court appointments but with Federal judges generally. Time was when Presidents had respect for the principle of a bipartisan judiciary. Mr. Roosevelt in 8 years has appointed more than 60 percent of all the Federal judges of the country. Yet 95 percent of those appointed come from his own political party—a great many of them having been actively engaged in politics.

There may be a difference of opinion as to whether past Presidents gave enough recognition to the economic class represented by what might be called the radical as against the conservative viewpoint. But it will be recalled that President Hoover, a Republican and supposedly a conservative, appointed the liberal Justice Cardozo. It will be recalled, too, that President Coolidge, admittedly a conservative, appointed the liberal Justice Harlan Fiske Stone. It will be recalled that President Wilson, a liberal, appointed the conservative Justice McReynolds.

TOTALITARIAN IN CONCEPT

The American concept of fair play and tolerance of the minority viewpoint hitherto has been invoked in court appointments. On the Federal Bench the party in power rarely has exceeded 60 percent, the opposition being given an average of 30 to 40 percent of the judicial appointments. It has meant a balancing of the Court, so as to give the minority some representation. But the present administration has not done so. It has been totalitarian in its concept. Only the members of one group—the political group of officials and advisers of the present administration—have been appointed or are apparently nowadays considered eligible for appointment.

A man like Justice Harold Stephens, of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, for instance, who was recommended by Attorney General Cummings at one time for the Supreme Court and who has made a great record on the bench to which he was appointed by President Roosevelt a few years ago, ought to be placed on the highest court.

In Texas is another Court of Appeals liberal, Justice Hutcheson, and on the highest courts of Massachusetts and New York are men of proved ability and judicial temperament. Do they have a chance? Not if the gossip which for weeks has permeated the Capital is to be believed, for the next two appointments also are to come from the ranks of the politicians.

That's why the passing of Chief Justice Hughes is indication of a bigger tragedy than simply the loss of a great jurist. It means the beginning of the end of the dignified, impartial, objective, nonpolitical, and independent judiciary and emphasis instead on a court which for the first time in history has been packed with politicians who have been subservient to the will of the Chief Executive.

J. Adam Bede's St. Lawrence Waterway Philosophy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ARTICLE BY J. ADAM BEDE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein an article by J. Adam Bede on the St. Lawrence seaway project, now pending in Congress. Mr. Bede served in the House of Representatives from 1903 to 1909, and was a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House. He has long been an ardent advocate of the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. Mr. Bede is well known throughout the United States, and I am sure that his many friends will read with interest the following article:

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

(By J. Adam Bede)

When Ben Franklin, as one of our peace commissioners to Paris in 1783, asked that the St. Lawrence River be made free for the use of American citizens, his request was insolently rejected by the ambassador of George III. That was 158 years ago, and today some of our own representatives seem eager to do the bidding of that half crazy and pig-headed king.

As a Member of Congress at the turn of the century when Teddy Roosevelt was President, Uncle Joe Cannon was Speaker, John Sharp Williams was minority leader, Champ Clark was the most beloved Member, God was in His heaven and all was right with the world, I voted for the Panama Canal, for the 9-foot channel in the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo, for all harbor improvements, and the deepening of the Mississippi. The popular slogan at that time was "Dig it deep through Dixie."

The railroads along the Ohio fought the improvement of the river, declaring it would ruin them. The answer was that river boats would distribute raw materials and build up industries to feed the rail carriers with higher-class freight. This I think has come true, and the railroads have handled a vastly greater tonnage since the river was canalized than before. Both water and rail transportation are essential to develop the resources of a country, and therefore become mutually helpful. The Ohio River roads do not complain now, but their opposition long delayed a needed development.

RAILROADS OPPOSED THE PANAMA CANAL

All railroad influence opposed the Panama Canal. Well might the transcontinental and midwestern lines take alarm for the canal changed the geography of the hemisphere. Had there been a natural channel at the isthmus, the development of our western areas would have been along somewhat different lines. But the shock has been very largely absorbed, and our growth in population has helped to make adjustments.

We of the Midwest knew the Panama Canal would mean a jolt. In public addresses at the time the great railroad man and empire builder, James J. Hill, foretold precisely what has happened. But there was a tacit understanding that if Congress would authorize the ocean link at Panama, the St. Lawrence project would soon follow to compensate the West for its patriotic sacrifice. So we voted for the ditch to double the efficiency of our Navy, and economically have been taking it on the chin ever since. The wild race of the battleship Oregon from our far northern Pacific waters around South America to reach Cuba in the spring of 1898 was duly dramatized, and not much consideration was given to the commercial value of the Canal. Its commerce has been a national surprise.

EFFECT OF CANAL ON MIDWEST

The World War was on when the Canal was opened, and its effect was not felt till that conflict was over. But a survey made in 1927 disclosed that 8 Midwestern States had lost 18,000 manufacturing plants, and in the reapportionment of Congress they lost 17 Members.

The West wants to trade with the seaboard, and the seaboard rejects the offer. Under normal world conditions at least 90 percent of our commerce on the seaway would be coastwise—to all ports from Boston to Houston—a mere extension of our internal commerce, and largely of products that couldn't pay for the rail haul. No foreign ship can engage in this trade, and therefore every bottom built for it by private capital would lift that much burden off the Federal Treasury for the merchant marine. In a period of years this would save the Treasury more than the cost of completing the project.

SEAWAY APPROVED BY PRESIDENTS, PREMIERS, AND RAILWAY CHIEFS

The seaway as now proposed has been repeatedly approved by our own board of United States Army engineers with its constantly changing personnel, by the Canadian board of engineers, by the joint international board of engineers, by special boards of engineers, and has never been disapproved by any board. It has been commended by four Presidents of the United States, by four premiers of Canada, and by most of the outstanding railroad men of the continent in the last generation, including James J. Hill of the Great Northern; Howard Elliott of the Northern Pacific; H. E. Byram of the Chicago, St. Paul & Milwaukee; C. H. Markham of the Illinois Central; William G. Bierd of the Chicago & Alton; Fred W. Sargent of the Chicago & Northwestern; Ralph Budd of the Great Northern; Charles Donnelly of the Northern Pacific; Edward Pennington of the Sault Ste. Marie; S. M. Felton of the Chicago Great Western; Hale Holden of the Burlington; Sir Henry Thornton of the Canadian National, and others of equal standing. During the long depression, most of the roads have been refinanced by eastern bankers who know all about the Rhine, but have never seen the Mississippi, and it is their money that talks. The real railroad man stands mute today.

WHAT ARE THE OBJECTIONS?

What are the objections that can outweigh these favorable opinions?

It is a habit for opponents to say that the lakes are frozen half the year, though the records show that over a long period of years the average navigation season has been 7 months and 25 days, or substantially two-thirds of the year. And in that limited season more tonnage passes through the "Soo" Canal between Lake Superior and Lake Huron than passes through the Suez and Panama Canals combined in the whole 12 months. Somewhere between 70,000,000 and 80,000,000 tons of iron ore alone will pass through the "Soo" this season. Nowhere else in all the world is such a volume of ore available, and if Hitler could wreck the "Soo" he would win the war. This ore is our greatest single asset in the defense program.

It is said that the seaway would cause a congestion of the railroads in the winter season when they are least able to handle traffic. This is not true, as most of the products that seek water transportation, such as iron ore, coal, lumber, grain, flour and meats are stored to wait for the open season.

It is usual for railroad lobbyists to say that the seaway will cost a billion dollars, which is substantially four times the estimate of the board of engineers. However, this statement is comparatively accurate, considering the source. The cost to us is $266,000,000 less $90,000,000 to be paid for the power by New York.

Some say very loosely that it will take 8 or 10 years to finish the job. In 1927 Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, headed a Commission which reviewed the St. Lawrence project and made a very favorable report on its economic aspects. At that time Mr. Hoover, who is himself an eminent engineer, was quoted as saying that under war pressure the whole project could be completed in 18 months, which is less than half the time required to build a warship, and no one complains that we are building ships.

WHEAT MUST BE TRANSPORTED TO EASTERN MARKET

We no longer export vast surpluses of western wheat because of our increased population and greater domestic consumption. Some superficial orators seize upon this fact to shout that we no longer need the seaway, though it might have been very helpful long ago. The other equally obvious fact escapes them: that we still raise the wheat and must transport it to our own people instead of foreigners for consumption. Buffalo is the most strategic point in our country for flour milling, as she is readily supplied with every grade of wheat from Canada as well as the United States and can make any blend of flour desired. She is in a class by herself, and yet she opposes the seaway. Would she not be still better situated and more prosperous if she could load a ship at her door to sail the seven seas, but more particularly to serve our own seaboard cities and the ports of Central and South America with her flour? Why should she shun ocean commerce? However, many people, not knowing their own or the public interest, opposed DeWitt Clinton's Erie Canal, which though only a ribbon of water 4 feet deep and 40 feet wide gave New York City its commercial premiership through contact with the West. And without the West there would be no such New York City as we know today.

THE SEAWAY A 50–50 PROPOSITION

It is also charged that our Government is to bear most of the seaway burden. Only ignorance can beget such falsehood. Every informed person knows that it is a 50–50 proposition. However, it so happens that Canada has done much more than we have in anticipation of a completed seaway, and therefore has less left to do. Among the work for which she is given credit is the Welland Canal opened in 1931 at a cost of $128,000,000. Each of the 7 mighty locks that overcome the fall of 326 feet between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario is 30 feet deep, 80 feet wide, and 820 feet long. This canal is the noblest monument ever reared to 10,000,000 peace-loving people. Such is the simple story. Why juggle the facts for a partisan purpose?

In an open forum following a public address the question was asked, "If we build a canal in Canada and then get into war with England, won't the Canadians blow up our canal"? Yes, they might; but if they did they would also blow up their own canal, for it would be a joint investment, and if we couldn't get in they couldn't get out. So it would be as broad as it was long. But there is a better and more conclusive answer to the question: When the greatest republic on earth goes to war with the most powerful empire in the world, when the Union Jack and the Star Spangled Banner meet on the field of battle, the world will go to hell, civilization will go to dust, and it won't matter who blows up the canal for it will never be needed any more.

It may be a good thing for Canada, but not for the United States of America, is a murmur often heard. But how can 12,000,000 people get more out of the seaway than 130,000,000? The amazing thing is that the Canadians insist on a 50–50 deal and will listen to nothing else.

ELECTRIC UTILITIES OPPOSE SEAWAY

The electric-power interests oppose our project because it will ultimately develop some 5,000,000 horsepower of electric energy. If you know of anything worth while that they are not against, please name it. In 1932 the American people consumed 62,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy, and today they are consuming substantially 3,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours a week, or at the rate of 150,000,000,000 a year. We are now short of energy for defense work, and but for the development of T. V. A., Boulder Dam, Bonneville, and Grand Coulee, we should have an electric famine. And every one of these projects was called a white elephant by the selfish interests now fighting the seaway.

RAILROADS OPPOSED HUDSON RIVER CHANNEL

Railroad interests opposed the 30-foot channel for the Hudson River to put Albany on the ocean. Now the Lake Shore road is carrying California canned fruit from Albany to Cleveland, and distributing vast quantities of Pacific coast lumber that comes to Albany via Panama. The average banker who now controls transportation can't tell a railroad asset from a liability. In the last census of "damphools" he was in class A plus. Under a proper system of birth control he would never be born.

SANITATION INCREASED COST OF PANAMA CANAL

The fact that the Panama Canal cost more than the original engineer estimates, is used as proof that the seaway cost will greatly exceed the official figures. This is distorted reasoning. The Panama project was our first venture in the tropics. The estimates were for engineering work, but much of the cost was for sanitation. We had to catch the mosquito, pour oil in his eye, and sing rock-a-bye baby before we could do the digging. Then the diggers ran into quicksand which oozed up from the bottom, and the high banks slipped into the Canal every night. It was an unpredictable situation that cannot be duplicated in a northern latitude. But we freed the world of yellow fever, which great achievement was worth the price. Health and happiness follow the flag. We had the scandal of embalmed beef in Cuba, but the electric refrigerator is drafted for Army service now. On many harbor projects surplus funds have been covered back into the Treasury.

BACK TO MUD ROADS AND OX CART

If cheaper transportation between the seaboard and the heart of the continent, which the seaway would provide, could harm the producer or the consumer, which some of our opponents contend, then logically we should pull up our railways, abandon our highways, go back to the mud roads and ox cart, live again the narrow neighborhood life of the pioneer. Do you want to do so?

THE CHAMPLAIN CUT-OFF

Immediately the seaway is authorized there will be a move to build a cut-off from Montreal to New York via Lake Champlain and the Hudson River. This would give Canada a coveted outlet to the south, and permit the West to reach our national metropolis by a much shorter route without entering the ocean. Any lake boat could then make the trip. There has long been a proposal, opposed only by the railroads, to cut a 27-foot canal 31 miles long, across New Jersey from New York Harbor to the Delaware River. This would let our lake shipping into Philadelphia, from which city there is already a 27-foot channel to Baltimore. Thus a vast internal commerce would be developed between our continental hinterland and our three great seaboard cities. Such is the ambitious outlook for the future development of our neglected interior. There is nothing local, selfish, or sectional in such a program. It means merely a greater America with new horizons for those whose eyes have long been seared and sealed with willful blindness.

WOULD HELP DEFENSE PROGRAM

The advocates of the seaway have never urged it as a defense measure, but if electric energy is needed, no greater volume can be secured in so short a time or at so low a cost as in the harnessing of the St. Lawrence rapids. That is a matter for the engineers. Page the Chief for an answer, and follow his lead. And if the seaboard shipyards are overcrowded, ours are idle. Why not build ships in them and open the seaway so they can reach the sea?

WHAT INTERESTS OPPOSE THE SEAWAY

It seems proper to inquire who or what interests are fighting the seaway project. In the forefront are found the railroads and the electric-power promoters and manipulators. Many years ago I rode on a first-class train from Chicago to Kansas City for 50 cents when two roads were trying to cut each other's throats. Those were the days of rugged individualism when piracy was permissible. Rebates and passes were destroying and corrupting influences. All delegates to policital conventions were provided with free transportation through the constituted party bosses. One businessman could be wrecked and his rival rewarded with prosperity through corporate favoritism. The Government had not yet asserted its rightful authority in behalf of the people. Most of these evils have been corrected, but during the prolonged depression of the past decade most of the roads have been thrown back into the clutches of a pirate crew who care no more for human rights than a tomcat cares for a marriage license, and are out to crush all water competition. In the old days the management made sure that every State had the best legislature that money could buy, and their successors are playing a bigger and bolder game in which they must miserably fail.

The electric utilities are drawing close to judgment day and therefore shun the spotlight, but are financing the propaganda campaign now as they did effectively against the treaty 7 years ago. Next to air and water, electricity is the cheapest resource nature has given us, but its manipulators hold it beyond generous use by the common people. As an illustration, the city of Duluth, with 101,000 population, has taxable real estate assessed at $40,000,000, while its power and light company is capitalized at $71,000,000. The company does considerable business beyond the city limits, but the amount is hidden from the public.

An electric plant and distribution system for a city of 100,000 population can be constructed and installed for $10,000,000. Therefore, if the Duluth Co., which runs under remote control from New York, does as much business outside the city as in it, which is a generous guess, $20,000,000 would be a fair capitalization. We are, therefore, lugging about $50,000,000 of watered stock to get our homes lighted. Electric energy can be generated with steam on our water front for less than 3 mills a kilowatt-hour. The basic retail rate is 6 cents, and the average residence rate for rich and poor is probably 4½ cents, or 45 mills, a pretty big spread between cost and price. It is this and many other like injustices that account for the Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota. If the old parties can't take care of this situation, the people will some day take care of them. It isn't brain power that is lacking. Both parties have plenty of that. The real trouble is that, while we can hire brains for a hundred dollars a month, we can't buy or borrow guts at any price anywhere. We drove the pirates off the sea more than a century ago. It is now time to drive them off the land. With their booty filched from the people, they are the most corrupting influence in American politics today.

STEEL TRUST OPPOSES SEAWAY

When the United States Steel Corporation was organized in 1901 for a billion and a half, the promoters put the half billion in their own pockets. It was the usual custom then for promoters to take one-third, and this transaction is notable only for its magnitude. However, it doesn't read so well in retrospect. This company has benefited greatly from Government improvement of the channels between Lake Superior and Lake Erie but fights the seaway. It says foreign ores will come in and ruin the iron business.

We have already shipped more than a billion tons of high-grade ore from the Minnesota mines and have about another billion left. At the present rate of shipment this ore will be exhausted in 20 years. Then we shall have left several billion tons of low-grade ore which must be beneficiated to be made merchantable. It would be a blessing if the high-grade ores of other lands could be imported to mingle with our low-grade ores to raise their iron content and extend the life of our mines indefinitely. Of course, a tariff could shut them out, but some mills on the seaboard wouldn't like that as they are already importers. This great corporation whose profits this year exceeded $100,000,000 is opposed to the seaway. It owns or controls the mines, it owns the railroads from the mines to Lake Superior, it owns the ore carriers on the lakes, and it owns the rails and mills in the lower lake areas. It is a very good corporation of its class and under the Bill of Rights should be heard but not felt.

Some opponents try to see a trick in offering a resolution to Congress instead of a treaty to the Senate as was done in 1934. The treaty received a majority vote of 46 to 42, but not the constitutional two-thirds. That was Mr. Hoover's treaty submitted by Mr. Roosevelt. However, there is another way to accomplish the same purpose and throw responsibility on the whole Congress instead of a single house. Besides, the bill will carry an appropriation which couldn't go into a treaty. Those who oppose this method are opposed to majority rule, which is the essence of free government. Of course, if the resolution route in such case is not legal then the Government, far from playing a trick, has committed a blunder which should be exposed. But no one in authority raises that point.

MANY FANCIFUL OBJECTIONS

Many fanciful objections are raised to the seaway. I have often been asked if sharks would not come in and ruin our swimming beaches in Lake Superior. Some say that tramp ships with cheap labor will come in and ruin our ports, forgetful that they have been ruining Boston, New York, and Philadelphia for 200 years. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD recently contained a speech by a western Member showing that Canadian rail rates are lower than ours, and that therefore the seaway would ruin our farmers. Such argument is grotesque, and would seem to incriminate the speaker for not regulating and reducing our rates. The ore roads that are making from 100 to 500 percent profit, as shown in their own sworn statements to the Interstate Commerce Commission, are afraid the seaway would take the bread out of their stockholders' mouths. Their situation is pitiful. They are in a class with the farmer who wept over a big crop as it was so hard on the soil.

MUST HAVE TOLERATION

However, I have patience with all differences of thought. In 1926 the school board in an Ohio town refused the use of the schoolhouse for a railway promotion meeting on the ground that if God wanted people to travel more than 15 miles an hour there would be something in the Bible about it. And I well remember personally the opposition to standardizing our narrow-gage railroads as it would throw men out of work by eliminating transfers. It took a hundred years to overcome the opposition to free schools. When Washington died a Pennsylvania paper thanked God that at last we were rid of the tyrant.

In the campaign of 1864 leading Republicans organized a movement against President Lincoln and put an independent candidate in the field to defeat him. Such are the vagaries we must cheerfully encounter. In my time the Rivers and Harbors Committee had 17 members, 15 lawyers and 2 gentlemen. When national flood control was urged the lawyers all agreed that it would be unconstitutional. Some very good lawyers do not say so now. Several years ago I suggested to Huey Long, a very interesting personality, that if only one Senator voted for the St. Lawrence seaway, he should be the man. He evidenced some surprise, but accepted my solution in jolly fashion when I assured him that we sent the mud down the Mississippi River to make Louisiana so he could come to the Senate, and that all he represented was erosion.

ON THE KNEES OF THE GODS

The St. Lawrence seaway is a national project. It is a necessity for a more perfect union between the interior and the seaboard. It will develop a vast commerce now nonexistent because it cannot pay the price for the rail haul. It will build industries and increase coal consumption. It will aid railroads, both East and West, in assembling and distributing its cargoes, and greatly increase employment. Its commerce will be almost exclusively coastwise, bringing the products of the Atlantic seaboard, the Gulf States, and of Mexico and Central America to the heart of our continent while bearing our products to them. It will add to the trade of every Atlantic seaboard city. Every ship built for this trade will lift a burden off the Treasury by enlarging our merchant marine. The seaway was promised us when western Members voted for the Panama Canal. The West has cheerfully borne its share of the burden for the channels in all our rivers and the harbors on all our shores. Our people believe in America, and what helps any State or area of our country appeals to them. We knew that Panama would jolt us for a generation, till great adjustments could be made. We have gone through the fire and passed under the rod. We now await with implicit confidence a long-delayed act of justice from the responsible representatives of a great and free people.

Relationship Between the General Accounting Office and the Tennessee Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 9, 1941

LETTER TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM THE DIRECTORS OF THE T. V. A.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority:

JUNE 6, 1941.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The letter recently addressed to you by the Comptroller General suggesting the need for legislation clarifying the relationship between his office and the Authority has been called to our attention. The difference of opinion between the Comptroller General and the Authority as to the nature of that relationship is not the result of recent developments. On the contrary, it has existed from the Authority's inception and has since been specifically considered by Congress on a number of occasions.

The Authority's views on the matter may be summarized as follows:

(1) The question in dispute is whether, under existing law, the jurisdiction of the Comptroller General extends only to auditing the Authority's accounts in accordance with section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, as the Authority contends, or whether it is empowered to "settle and adjust" such accounts in accordance with the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, as the Comptroller General contends.

(2) Congress has already spoken on the issue by repeatedly refusing to extend the Budget and Accounting Act to the Authority; indeed, the present section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act was enacted in 1935 in place of an alternative provision suggested by the then Comptroller General for the very purpose of rendering the Budget and Accounting Act applicable.

(3) In any event, the difference of opinion between the Comptroller General and the Authority involves a purely legal question of statutory interpretation which the Attorney General should determine and which he is now considering. The Attorney General's decision will settle the construction to be accorded the existing law, and Congress will, of course, be in a position thereafter to decide whether as a matter of policy the law as so construed should be amended.

(4) It should be emphasized that the dispute between the Comptroller General and the Authority has nothing to do with any question of whether the Authority's transactions should be subject to outside audit, or whether it is under obligation to account fully for funds appropriated to it. The Authority has welcomed and will continue to welcome audits of its transactions made by the General Accounting Office in accordance with section 9 (b) of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. On its own initiative, it has also obtained for the past 3 years independent audits by the nationally known firm of certified public accountants, Lybrand, Ross Bros. & Montgomery, as the result of which it has been able to include certified financial statements in its annual reports to Congress. While thus fully recognizing its public obligation to subject itself to periodic audits and to account fully for funds entrusted to it, the Authority believes that the application to it of the rigid and cumbersome procedures of the "settlement and adjustment" system—which bear little or no relation to auditing as that term is understood by accountants and businessmen—would mark an immediate end of its corporate flexibility and unduly hamper its activities.

In view of the importance to the Authority of the basic issue which has been raised, it has been thought desirable to discuss in somewhat greater detail each of the points summarized above. Such discussion follows:

(1) Nature of the question in dispute: The issue is a simple one. Ever since its organization the Authority has been of the opinion that the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, by which it was created, defines and delimits the jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office over its transactions. Section 9 (b) of that statute provides that the Comptroller General "shall audit the transactions of the corporation at such times as he shall determine, but not less frequently than once each governmental fiscal year, with personnel of his selection." It is provided that the Comptroller General and his representatives "shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property, and places belonging to or under the control of or used or employed by the corporation." He is to make a report of each such audit in quadruplicate—one copy for the President of the United States, one for the Chairman of the Board, one for public inspection at the principal office of the corporation, and the other for the uses of the Congress. The statute further directs the Comptroller General to "make special report to the President of the United States and to the Congress of any transaction or condition found by him to be in conflict with the powers or duties entrusted to the corporation by law." The Authority has not only never resisted the conduct of this audit provided for in its own statute but has repeatedly sought to have it made more effective.

On the other hand, the representatives of the General Accounting Office have contended that the Authority is subject, in addition to this detailed audit procedure, to all of the procedures set up in the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, including monthly rendition of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office in Washington, the approval or disapproval of requisitions of funds by the Comptroller General, and the final settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers.

Clearly these conflicting points of view raise a purely legal issue of statutory interpretation.

(2) Prior consideration of the issue by Congress: The precise issue which the Comptroller General now raises was presented to Congress in 1935 by one of his predecessors during the consideration of certain proposed amendments to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. At that time the then Comptroller General proposed that Congress adopt an amendment designed for the specific purpose of subjecting the Authority to the procedures prescribed in the Budget and Accounting Act. After full consideration in committee and debate on the floor of both Houses this proposal was rejected.

The same question was presented to the Joint Committee Investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority in 1938. After full public hearings during which representatives of the Authority and the General Accounting Office appeared before the committee, the final report sustained the Authority's position on every point (Report of Joint Committee Investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority, pp. 109–133).

It was our hope that this carefully considered conclusion of a joint committee of Congress specifically charged with the duty of determining this issue would be accepted as conclusive.

(3) Since the question in dispute is one of statutory interpretation, it should be finally determined by the Attorney General. When the present Comptroller General assumed office we reviewed the history of this controversy with him in an effort to convince him of the soundness of our legal position, which had been sustained by the Congress in 1935, and again by the joint investigating committee in its report issued in 1939. It was after the conclusion of these conferences that we received the Comptroller General's letter of December 21, 1940, reiterating the original view of his office on the question of law involved. Upon receipt of that letter we were of the opinion that the only proper way in which to settle a difference of opinion between two agencies of the Federal Government upon a question of the proper construction of a Federal statute was to submit the issue to the Attorney General of the United States for his opinion. Accordingly, on January 31, 1941, we wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, suggesting a change in procedure, knowing that before determining the question the Secretary would in turn submit the entire issue to the Attorney General. A copy of that letter is enclosed herewith. On February 12, 1941, we wrote to the Comptroller General, stating that since all that was involved was an issue of law depending upon the construction of the relevant Federal statutes the Board had concluded that the only way in which the question could be resolved would be by obtaining a ruling from the chief law officer of the Federal Government. A copy of that letter is also enclosed herewith. Our request to the Secretary was submitted to the general counsel of the Treasury, who has ruled that the Authority's position is correct. The opinion of its general counsel has in turn been submitted by the Treasury to the Attorney General for his opinion.

In his letter to you the Comptroller General states that the Attorney General does not have jurisdiction to determine this matter so as to relieve him of official responsibility. It is impossible for us to understand this position. It means, in substance, that the Comptroller General refuses to be bound by the opinion of the Attorney General upon a question of statutory construction and insists upon reserving to himself final judgment on his own jurisdiction. Were it not for this attitude there would be no reason for requesting legislation at this time. Legislation is neither needed nor appropriate in order to determine the proper construction of existing law. This same question was considered by the Joint Congressional Committee Investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority, which stated:

"The committee doubts whether any useful purpose will be served by legislation clarifying the relations between the Authority and the General Accounting Office. The Authority should be placed on the same basis as other Government corporations in the affairs of which the General Accounting Office is not permitted to intervene. Congress has already recognized this need in the case of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Inland Waterways Corporation, and the Panama Railroad. The accounts of these corporations are audited by private auditing firms, selected by their respective boards of directors. If, however, it is determined that relations between the General Accounting Office and the Authority shall continue, the General Accounting Office's activities should consist in the making of periodic commercial audits. Such audits should be made in the field and not in Washington. Disputes concerning interpretations of statutes and other legal questions should be referred promptly to the Attorney General for final determination." (Committee report, pp. 132–133.)

(4) The procedures of the Budget and Accounting Act are not suited and have not generally been applied to governmental corporate enterprises such as the Authority: While the present Comptroller General and certain of his predecessors have clung in theory to the position that the procedures of the Budget and Accounting Act are applicable to the Authority, they have not—possibly because of obviously reasonable doubts as to the validity of that position—actually sought in practice fully to apply them. It thus becomes apparent that what the Comptroller General now proposes is that the Congress abandon the procedures under which the Authority has successfully operated for 8 years and substitute therefor a new law subjecting, in practice as well as in General Accounting Office theory, all of the transactions of the Authority to the final administrative control of the General Accounting Office. Viewed in this light, the proposal raises the broad question as to the effectiveness of publicly owned corporations as instrumentalities of government.

One unfamiliar with the facts would infer from the Comptroller's General's letter that the Authority stands alone in its attempt to maintain its corporate independence. The exact opposite is the truth. The General Accounting Office has not been permitted to extend the "settlement and adjustment" procedure to such corporate enterprises as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Inland Waterways Corporation, the Panama Railroad Co., the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corporation, and the War Finance Corporation.

The very nature of the Government corporation is inconsistent with the type of control inherent in the procedures of the Budget and Accounting Act. This has been recognized by all commentators on the subject. The Supreme Court itself, in holding that the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation and other Government corporations created during the first World War should not be subjected to this type of jurisdiction, stated:

"Indeed, an important if not the chief reason for employing these incorporated agencies was to enable them to employ commercial methods and to conduct their operations with a freedom supposed to be inconsistent with accountability to the Treasury under its established procedure of audit and control over the financial transactions of the United States" (Skinner & Eddy Corp. v. McCarl, 275 U. S. 1, 8 (1927)).

In his letter the Comptroller General concedes that—

"Any governmental agency charged with the responsibility of conducting operations of the character of those of the Tennessee Valley Authority should have some latitude of authority beyond that needed and usually granted by the Congress to the regular departments and establishments of the Government."

He then expresses the opinion that there is no inconsistency between this view and his insistence upon accountability under the Budget and Accounting Act. With this conclusion we most emphatically disagree. In order to determine the extent of the inconsistency it is necessary to compare the relationship between the Authority and the General Accounting Office under existing law, and the relationship that would be brought about by the change proposed by the Comptroller General.

As previously pointed out, under existing law the Comptroller General is given the broadest possible auditing powers. He has the right to examine every record, every voucher, and every item of income and expenditure; he is under a duty to make his annual audit report available to the President and the Congress; he is under the additional duty of reporting especially to the Congress any improprieties or violations of law that he may discover. If the ultimate objective is to assure proper accounting and to protect against dishonesty and extravagance, it is difficult to see why those powers are not sufficient.

In fact, the Comptroller General does not suggest that the proposed change in the law is required because of any deficiencies in the Authority's accounting or internal audit procedures. The Authority's system of accounts is in accord with standard practices in accounting, and its power accounts conform to the uniform system prescribed by the Federal Power Commission, with such adaptations to meet the particular problems of the Authority as are approved by the Commission. In addition, the Authority has always maintained an elaborate system of internal audit controls, and its accounts have been subjected to audits by two outside organizations, the General Accounting Office and Lybrand, Ross Bros. & Montgomery, a nationally recognized firm of certified public accountants.

In the 8 years of its existence the Authority has handled more than $300,000,000 of Federal funds without the faintest suspicion of fraud or misappropriation. The inevitable effect of superimposing the procedures of the Budget and Accounting Act upon existing auditing procedures would be not to protect the Government against improper expenditures but to subject the administrative discretion of the Authority's board to a final veto power exercised by the Comptroller General.

There is widespread misunderstanding concerning the actual operation of the so-called settlement and adjustment procedure of the Budget and Accounting Act. Under this process the disbursing officers of the departments and establishments subject to the act are required to submit monthly or quarterly lists of receipts and disbursements to the General Accounting Office, accompanied by vouchers and other documentary support. The General Accounting Office then determines whether, in its opinion, expenditures made were legally authorized. At this step in the process it is clear that the Comptroller General reserves to himself the final authority to pass upon the interpretation of all statutes with no possibility of appeal. In this way he is permitted to substitute his judgment, or that of his counsel, for the judgment of the agency charged with the responsibility for administering the statute in question.

The detailed internal control exercised by the Comptroller General over administration is enforced in two ways. By means of his statutory power to disallow a payment already made, and to charge the payment against the account of the disbursing officer he is in a position to force the disbursing officer to follow his interpretations blindly without consideration of their soundness. In case of any attempt at resistance to the Comptroller General's view as to law or as to policy, he possesses the ultimate veto power through the threat of disapproving a requisition for funds. In our prior dealings the General Accounting Office has not limited this asserted veto over administration, at least in theory, to questions of statutory interpretation. Its investigators have repeatedly noted exceptions to transactions solely because, in their judgment, the expenditures involved were not wise or necessary or desirable. In this way, if the Budget and Accounting Act were to be fully applied in practice and the exceptions followed by disallowances, the investigators of the General Accounting Office would be placed in the position of overruling the discretionary decisions of the board of directors of the Authority, even though they were in no way responsible for successful performance of the duties which the Authority is expressly directed by statute to carry out. In our opinion, such a situation would constitute the antithesis of responsible administration.

It should be emphasized that what has been said is in no way a reflection upon the present incumbent of the office of Comptroller General. The objections to the extension of General Accounting Office control are based upon principles of administration and have no relation to the person occupying the office at any particular time.

In considering the validity of the contention that the proposed extension of jurisdiction would in no way jeopardize the efficiency of the Authority's operations, it is significant that all of the avowed opponents of this program have welcomed the proposal with enthusiasm. They understand that they have been presented with a final opportunity to cripple this enterprise by depriving it of those attributes of initiative, flexibility, and independence that have contributed so much to its success.

In the closing paragraph of his letter the Comptroller General states that it is inconceivable—

"That any agency entrusted with the expenditure of mammoth amounts of funds collected from the people of the United States should desire to evade responsible accounting and scrutiny by an independent office created for that purpose."

This statement is based upon the misconception that there can be no true public accounting except that particular type of detailed administrative supervision exercised by the General Accounting Office. The Authority has never sought to evade accountability to the public. All of its transactions are carried on in the light of continued publicity. In its annual reports to the Congress it accounts for every penny that it has expended and for every move that it has made, and its financial statements are certified to each year by a recognized firm of certified public accountants. Again in its annual appearances before the Appropriation Committees of the two Houses it gives a detailed accounting. This is accounting to Congress and to the public in the truest sense.

In conclusion, it must again be emphasized that the legal issue in dispute between the Comptroller General and the Authority has nothing to do with any question as to whether the Authority's transactions shall be regularly subject to audit, nor whether it shall account fully to Congress and the public. The Authority has always welcomed the fullest auditing investigations—as distinguished from application of the "settlement and adjustment" procedures—both by the General Accounting Office and by other accounting agencies, and on the basis of these investigations it has sought to include in its reports to Congress the fullest possible accounting and statistical information concerning its activities. Its books are open to the inspection and review of any interested person. This policy it will continue to pursue.

Respectfully,

HARCOURT A. MORGAN,
Chairman of the Board.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MANCHESTER (N. H.) UNION

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Manchester Union of June 9, 1941, entitled "St. Lawrence Seaway."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Union of June 9, 1941]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

In a special message to Congress, President Roosevelt has renewed his appeal for the approval of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development project as a war emergency measure. This time the seaway is presented in the form of an agreement between Canada and the United States, requiring only a majority approval of both the House and the Senate, instead of as a treaty requiring a two-thirds approval of the Senate only.

The President's argument is that power, and still more power, will be needed to meet the production race for national defense. The enemies of democracy, he maintains, are developing hydroelectric resources on every waterway from Norway to the Dardanelles, and this continent must not allow itself to be outmatched.

In answer to the criticism that the seaway development will take at least 4 years, he replies that there is no assurance that the present emergency will be over before that time. The deep-water seaway, in addition to power development, he declares, will prevent transportation bottlenecks, and increase the Nation's capacity for building ships.

These are all important considerations and should be given the most careful study by Congress and the American people. National defense is the primary interest of the Nation today, and everything that is necessary should be done to promote it. Moreover, it is necessary to look ahead and make provision for every eventuality by shaping a long-range policy so far as that is possible.

But there are also certain questions in relation to this problem that should be weighed carefully. One of these is whether it is wise at a time when the full energies of the Nation should be directed to the immediate increase of production to meet a crisis that is already upon us, to divert money, labor, and skill to the development of a project that admittedly cannot be of use until 4 years hence. Power available 4 years from now will be useless if we fail to meet the emergency before that time, and every effort should be turned now to the immediate task of creating the implements of defense. For that task we have adequate power resources with the prompt supplementation that can be made through the utilization of steam.

The navigation aspect of the project also raises important questions. One of these is the probable effect of the seaway on existing port facilities along the north Atlantic coast, with which it must necessarily come into competition, and on the transportation system of the Nation generally.

It may be that for a time increased traffic due to the national-defense program would prevent the seaway doing these facilities serious injury, but here again the time factor is involved. The seaway cannot become available for at least 4 years, and the traffic problem must reach its peak long before that time. Moreover, the St. Lawrence seaway, when completed, would be usable for only 7 months in the year. Other transportation agencies would have to stand by waiting to take over for the 5 months every year when the St. Lawrence is ice-bound.

These questions are responsible for the almost unanimous opposition throughout New England to the seaway development.

The Maintenance of Morale

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ADDRESS BY M. H. HEDGES, DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH, INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, there is more real inspiration and good American doctrine in the following speech by Mr. Marion Hedges, of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, than in almost any speech I have read for a long, long time. I ask it be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

I need not remind this group of engineers, economists, and administrators that morale belongs with the imponderables. I need not remind you either that imponderables are as important, or even more important, than the material sinews of defense. Imponderables may in part submit to analysis and still we may not be able to do the things that we see are needed to be done.

Morale is not a thing that is created. It exists. Strictly speaking, a nation cannot maintain morale; it can only utilize that morale which exists. I take the liberty, therefore, of rephrasing my topic as utilization of morale. Morale, therefore, belongs to the subconscious forces of a nation's life, or, if we do not like the phrase "subconscious forces," let us say that morale belongs to the forces of public opinion that move at the base of a people's on-going existence. These subconscious forces are what Americans mean when they say, "at the grass roots."

To most of us Adolf Hitler is a necromancer—a sorcerer. With unscrupulous coldheartedness and with no eye to the truth and with no regard to consistency, Adolf Hitler has said the things which he, in some uncanny way, knew would produce loyalty and discipline in his troops. He certainly capitalized the Versailles Treaty dishonestly, but he knew that a defeated nation could not rise to a renewed war effort without being promised the opportunity to become superior. He has pictured to the younger Germans the idea of a lordly race in complete control not only of Europe but of the entire earth. He capitalized defeated Germany's sense of inferiority. He built upon this chasm—thus far successfully. If we are to be equally as successful in 1941, we must understand the subconscious forces that are working through our collective lives.

Because I do not mention natural resources and technology as applied to the production of war material and to actual war effort, I am not ignorant or negligent of these important things. My subject is morale—more specifically the utilization of morale. And the question is, Do we know enough about this disparate, various, complex, and loosely knit organization of society which we call democratic America to know how to utilize the forces which lie within to produce united effort?

First, let us see what the hazards of democracy are in the time of national emergency. Please do not underestimate the ability of the enemy to take advantage of the faults of democracy. Our Nation organized for trade and friendly intercourse between peoples is wide open to cultural invasion by the very nature of the organization of which we are a part. Harsh is the statement, but it is true no less that the virtues of democracy are liabilities in time of warfare. Good-natured tolerance and complacency, the view that every individual and every individual organization has the right to carve a niche for itself in this loose organization; the view that the right to fight it out between economic groups is a natural right creates opportunities for an invader. I need only point to France as an outstanding example of a democracy in fact and in reality incapable of defending itself because of the internal conflicts developed under the theory of natural rights.

Fifty percent of the victories of Adolf Hitler have been won within the countries subjugated, by the capitalization of internal dissension. Antagonisms between sections of a great sprawling nation, class "strugglism" the dubious philosophy as to whether society owes every man a living, laid the foundations for the "fifth column," and upon these foundations the enemy has builded in every country subjugated. These are unpleasant truths because they raise the all-important question as to whether a democracy can preserve its innermost character and enter into conflict with an autocracy characterized by its mechanical controls.

We should intently be aware that for the last 75 years in the United States two great traditions have been in competition: (1) The industrial—rapidly driving toward mechanized production and mechanical control; (2) the popular, based on life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The grind between these two great urges has produced most of the conflicts so characteristic of this era. I believe that a good case can be made for the contention that Germany has built upon the rationalism that first made its appearance in America as early as 1870. It is this deep-seated conflict, that is, between mechanized control and the will to happiness of the individual that has frequently shown itself in politics, that produces such phrases as soulless corporations, economic royalists, Wall Street, and the good life, social security, and democracy. Surely those citizens who have been concerned with creating a great industrial machine have conferred blessings upon this Nation. And surely those rebels who declare that the basic commodity of a nation, sound at heart, is its citizens, have conferred blessings also upon this Nation. But it is this hitherto irreconcilable conflict which is the chief barrier to the proper utilization of morale and which strikes at the very foundations of the Nation's existence.

I ask for agreement on this point: Adolf Hitler has carried to the extreme the logic of mechanized control. Marked evidence of this fact is revealed in feeding of boy soldiers with drugs which produce an exalted sense of courage and deaden the primitive forces of fear. Here is something new in warfare, the scientific, if momentary, production of morale on the battlefield by means of dope pills. And so the question of morale renews itself into this question, Can robots, mechanized soldiery, prevail over the natural courage and will of free men?

Let us suppose, therefore, that this conference should resolve itself into a meeting of a general staff to determine the things this Nation should do and must do to meet the robot army that stands mobilized on our horizon. Let us, as members of this general staff, adopt the principle that a condition confronts us; not a theory. I take the liberty of arising in this meeting and saying: "Gentlemen, we must plug the psychological holes in our defense. We must rid ourselves of three great illusions. We must smash three great fallacies and we must accept three simple primitive principles."

The first great illusion that we must forego is that we live in a big world physically. This illusion is increased for us in America by the fact that we live on a continent and we travel frequently and know the great spaces that lie between New York and San Francisco. Surely 99 percent of Americans still think that London, England, is 7 days from New York when in reality it is only 18 hours. We are unaware of that. New York is many times nearer to London than Charlottesville was to Washington in the time of Thomas Jefferson. It is this illusion of living in a great world rather than a small world that is at the base of the doctrine of isolation.

The second great illusion which must be foregone is the sense of inevitability. Inevitability has been part and parcel of the mechanistic philosophy that has developed along with our drive for mechanistic control. Hitler has played upon it with shrewd and remunerative results. With his intuitive genius for fingering out the holes in democratic armor, he understands how responsive Americans are to the idea that the next step is inevitable. He, as well as the Communists, has played upon the idea that history is a progress unfolding at the dictation of material forces and that it is useless to try to oppose the coming of the mechanistic state. Hitler has done this while he himself is paramount evidence that the human will is still the determining factor in human affairs. Hitler and the dictators have smashed forever the mechanistic theory of history, and it is that theory that is going on the scrap heap and not the theory of choice, so close to the life of Americans. There could be no greater antithesis as between human types than the antitheses between Adolf Hitler, the leader of the robots, and Daniel Boone, Kit Carson, the heroes of the Alamo, the pioneer leaders which belong so intimately to Americans.

The third great illusion is the illusion of our technological superiority. We Americans believe fervently that we are the greatest industrial nation in the world. The trouble with that idea is that it is compensatory. It has probably arisen out of our sense of incompletion, of unfulfillment, because we have not lived up to the fullest attainment of our subconscious powers. War gives the acid test to machinery as well as to men. The airplane engine that fails on the last heartbreaking 1,000 feet of the 6-mile altitude simply cannot be saved by sales talk, propaganda, or illusion. If we have been, up to now, a nation of drummers, salesmen, shopkeepers and not a nation of technicians, pioneers, the last 1,000 feet of the 6-mile climb will tell.

And so we must clear away our illusions and we must give up certain fallacies. First, we must give up the fallacy that the Nation owes the individual everything and the individual owes the Nation very little. The Santa Claus concept is not productive of morale. Sometime or other the individual citizen must stand up on his own two legs and say, "By all that is holy this thing must stop and now." And he must be willing to stop it.

Second, we must give up the conception that democracy is a kind of system based upon the mob. As a matter of fact it takes more individual intelligence, more individual discipline, more individual loyalty to operate a democracy than it takes to operate an autocracy or any other of the ephemeral forms of organized society.

Third, we must smash the fallacy that material things bring happiness. In the last 75 years we have been engaged in erecting the greatest industrial system on earth. We have been animated by the notion that a bathtub, an automobile, and an airplane, if possessed by the individual citizen, will produce the good life. Most of the internal conflicts in America during the last three generations have been fought over the possession of things. And it will seem strange to many of you that I, a representative of organized labor, will say that this is a spurious fallacy judged by a national emergency that involves the preservation of our common life. Organized labor has offset its drive for material things by individual sacrifice to the union, and though unionists do not talk much about moral values, a good unionist is he who gives up more for his organization than he gets, and this is a formula by which you must test a good citizen. He must give up more for his country than he receives in the hour of his country's need.

Now, then, if we utilize the morale I am convinced lies deep in the vitals of America, we must turn to three simple primitive principles. In a crisis the individual owes everything to the group. We have got to reverse the prevalent theory that organized society owes the individual much. I have heard from the radio and read in the papers the repeated statement that some Americans are willing to defend democracy if certain great reforms are put into operation. For us who are sitting here as a general staff, this is the greatest barrier in the utilization of morale. If America is worth defending, it is worth defending as it is and now. It is my earnest belief that the standard of life, when we include the imponderables of liberty, is higher in America than in any other country in the world. America is worth defending now as it is.

Second. The difference between democracy and the totalitarian countries is not so much what as how. Democracy is a way of doing things, not a mere collection of principles. The how in this crisis turns upon two stipulations: (1) all advantages and all hardships must be shared alike by every section of the population. There shall be no privileged classes in this hour of emergency. If we are to have equal sharing, then we must have some tribunal to determine what equal sharing is. That tribunal should consist of joint committees between government, employers, and labor. And it should be remarked that advisory committes are not joint committees. Joint committees imply equality of authority. (2) Voluntary doing of what should be done is not a loss of democracy. Here the question is whether Americans are intelligent and loyal enough to do the necessary things to meet the national emergency without the compelling power of force. If, then, we can rid ourselves of three great illusions, destroy three great fallacies, and adopt three great principles, we utilize the powerful forces at work among our population which will preserve our Nation in its pristine unit.

Utilization of morale, however, depends on the tapping of these great forces and this reaching down to these forces depends upon certain symbols, the symbols of words and the symbols of men—leaders. Words are powerful forces and I hope none of us organized here this morning as a general staff will seek to create slogans for the winning of defense. Slogans must arrive out of the agony of the people and out of their subconscious life. "There shall always be an England," takes hold of the depths of English psychology and utilizes that instinctive allegiance to the compact little island which has been the English heritage for more than a thousand years. "This time all are in the front line," adorning every railroad station, post office, camp, street corner in Canada and England and its widefiung holdings, arrived out of England's ordeal and fulfills the principle of equal sharing and democratic effort. These are good slogans because they were lived before they were uttered.

Leaders are important. The leader must embody somehow the qualities of the nation. Winston Churchill and Ernest Bevin, in origin far apart, are as like in physical contour, habits of thought, and determined will as two peas in a pod. Fortunate it is for a nation to have two such leaders expressing so profoundly the nation's temperament. Bevin calls Churchill "Mate." Together they symbolize the whole nation. They are the synthetic Englishman. John Bull still broods in Downing Street.

And so it comes down to this. The war machinery of the enemy has been geared to take advantage of the customary faults of democracy. It would seem wise, therefore, for us in our effort to prepare for invasion to correct these faults. It seems reasonable to declare, therefore, that the labor unionist who believes that the objective of his union is to follow the policy of the class struggle and fight the boss is helping Adolf Hitler. The employer who believes that this is the time to liquidate trade unions is helping Adolf Hitler. The bureaucrat who sees in this an opportunity to widen the powers of government when such widening powers only produce conflict is helping Adolf Hitler.

What do men fight for? I do not believe any man will die to defend his country because it has a 5-year plan. A man will die to defend his country because he recalls the way the American flag looked flying above the little red schoolhouse; he will die to defend his country because he loves the way the tugboats look in New York Harbor; he will die to defend his country because he likes Main Street in Oshkosh or Kokomo; he will die to defend his country because he recalls the smells of a Thanksgiving dinner in his mother's kitchen; he will die to defend his country because he recalls with peculiar poignancy the way his high-school graduating class sang Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory of the Coming of the Lord, or America, the Beautiful; he will die to defend his country because he likes a memory of a rail splitter or a man praying at Valley Forge; he will die to defend his country because of a mother or a child, but he will not die to defend his country for mere abstractions.

The basic of morale is feeling—collective feeling—and as America emerges from a long period of self-criticism and reform, it is likely to forget these deep emotional associations which produce unity, and the problem of utilization of morale is to begin to recover these national memories.

It is my impression that we as a people have not yet begun to call upon the subconscious forces which are our greatest strength. We have carried on our defense effort as we have carried on our peace effort, by a series of explosions and by conflict. We have not been any too successful. I am not discouraged. I am confident that fully 90 percent of our great population are essentially aware of the issue now before us and are willing to make the needed sacrifices to preserve our culture. I have said that morale exists—it is not created—it is only utilized. I believe that the needed morale is here. It has been slowly and painfully created on the prairies, in the workshop, on the farm, in the mining camp, in the wilderness, on the high seas during the last two centuries.

I have been told by physicians that a person suffering with typhoid fever can secure very little aid from medical science, that his recovery depends upon his physical heritage and his moral courage. Every cell of a typhoid patient must be re-created before the patient can get well. That will to live must be dominant in the ailing man before he can live through the agonized weeks of burning fever and reach health and safety.

A nation in time of war is not unlike this typhoid patient. Whether it weathers the ordeal depends on its heritage, on the centuries of life that preceded the life of the individual generation. I have confidence in America's past; I have confidence that the right words will be said and the right leaders will arise to direct this tremendous latent power when the need arises.

Minnesota W. P. A. Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

LETTER FROM S. L. STOLTE, STATE ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION,
St. Paul, Minn., May 19, 1941.

Hon. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

Subject: Certain facts about the Minnesota W. P. A. program.

DEAR MR. PITTENGER: As you requested when I had the pleasure of visiting with you in your office last week, I am forwarding herewith certain facts about the W. P. A. program in general and particularly as such relate to Minnesota and your congressional district.

In my letter to you of February 4, 1941, I gave you pertinent information as to employment expenditures and accomplishments in your congressional district and the State. My purpose at this time is to give you certain current facts about the W. P. A. program in this State as it is operative at this time.

In Minnesota we have not experienced the impact of national-defense employment indicated in some of the other States. This is undoubtedly true because we do not have the concentration of heavy defense industries or large military or Navy training centers. Should additional defense plants be located or expanded in Minnesota, or should Camp Ripley be taken over as a military training center, the future need for employment relief would, of course, change in proportion. However, we too often forget that more than 70 percent of the persons now employed on W. P. A. are in the so-called unskilled classification and if adaptable will require training before any large proportion of these persons become suitable for defense industry employment. The Selective Service Act and Navy recruiting are using a considerable segment of the younger persons, and it is true that persons with skills of value to defense industries are being employed and sought after daily. Many persons, however, are not mobile and able to move to defense employment opportunities due to personal responsibilities, health, finances, and other similar reasons, and unless such employment is moved closer to their homes, they are still stranded for employment opportunities.

We also know that the average age of a W. P. A. worker is slightly over 43 years, and we find, as of April 1941, that approximately 46 percent are over 45 years old and approximately 58 percent are 40 years of age and over. In comparison with March 1939, similar figures were approximately 38 percent over 45 years of age and 50 percent over 40. A study of the current composition of the labor force in the United States shows currently that 22 percent are under 25 years, whereas in W. P. A. it is only 8 percent, and there are approximately 30 percent more persons in proportion on W. P. A. 55 years of age and over than there are on the regular labor force.

From the standpoint of enlisting all the human resources of the Nation for maximum use either from the standpoint of morale or actual production for national defense, it does seem to me that if employable persons are going to require direct relief that it is better that these persons be engaged in work on projects of importance to the welfare and needs of the community or engaged on projects actually certified as important to national defense such as airports, roads, armories, and similar work.

As of May 14, 1941, there were employed on the Minnesota W. P. A. 39,410 persons. Our May quota is 39,700. In May 1940 there were employed in the State 39,565 persons. In May 1940, however, there were 17,248 persons in the awaiting assignment file as compared with 1,162 persons today. These last figures when added to the number of persons at work makes a net decrease of 28 percent in the total load certified as in need of employment. As of April 30, in your Congressional District No. 8, there were 5,876 persons employed.

As you know, persons are continuously moving to and from the program in their movement to private employment opportunities. Our experience in the past year has been that 2,000 to 3,000 persons have been so affected each month by such movement. In April 1941 there were, however, 6,181 persons terminated from the program primarily due to private employment opportunities. The figure, however, was increased at this time due to some 2,000 forced separations in compliance with the 18 months' provision of the E. R. A. Act.

The consideration of the next fiscal year's appropriation for W. P. A. will undoubtedly resolve itself in a major degree to the amount of such appropriation. You will find enclosed a tabulation of the employment experienced during this year and what it will have to be in the next fiscal year in the event the average monthly employment is based on 1,300,000 persons or 1,000,000 persons for the continental United States. The difference between the 1,300,000 and the 1,265,000 figure listed is the amount estimated in other Federal Agency employment financed out of the E. R. A. Act. You will note that the average in the State would have to be reduced from an average of 40,389 for this fiscal year to an estimated average of 27,300 in the event $975,000,000 in the President's Budget message to the Congress in January prevails. The 1,300,000 average national quota would require $1,150,000,000.

The only additional information that seems pertinent at this time is that which was revealed in a study of how the W. P. A. Federal dollar was spent in Minnesota in 1940. We found that of every dollar 82 cents went to pay the earnings to W. P. A. project wage employees, 7 cents to pay the earnings to supervisors exempt from the schedule of monthly earnings, 8 cents for project materials, supplies, and equipment, and 3 cents for administration. For every dollar provided by W. P. A. for the public-work program in 1940, Minnesota sponsors added 41 cents in the form of cash expenditures or credits allowed for material or sponsor-owned equipment and services made available to assist in project operations.

I trust that you will find these facts of value, and will, of course, be only too pleased to furnish you with any additional information not available to you at this time regarding the general subject of W. P. A. Further, do not hesitate to call on our Washington W. P. A. office for any information which you may need immediately and where inquiry to this office would take too long.

I have just learned today that the Bureau of the Budget has recommended an $875,000,000 appropriation for the W. P. A. bill, which would mean that an average monthly employment of slightly under 900,000 persons would be financed for the continental United States. This in turn would provide for 26,000 persons in the State of Minnesota, and would mean that your employment as of April 30, 1941, in your congressional district would have to be reduced something over 2,000 persons. You may verify this condition with Mr. Robert L. MacDougall, of the Washington W. P. A. office in the Walker Johnson Building.

Let me at this time express my sincere appreciation of your courtesies during my visit with you at Washington, and I trust that these facts as here presented will be of some assistance to you in your deliberations.

Yours truly,

S. L. STOLTE, Administrator.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincerity and concern that I call the attention of my colleagues to an editorial by David Lawrence in the United States News of June 13, 1941. It is a tribute to a public servant and a farewell to a great Chief Justice, that is, Charles Evans Hughes. The editorial so ably expresses the interest and concern of the judiciary, the lawyers, the laymen, of every citizen—and the respect, veneration, and importance of our Supreme Court and its tremendous function in our Government; also, the imperative necessity of a continuation of that respect and confidence in the courts.

I am sure that President Roosevelt appreciates the grave responsibility that is his to fill the vacancies on our Supreme Court with men of honesty, character, legal training, and ability regardless of their political philosophy; men who will be responsive to their oath of office and their consience, and actuated solely by a zeal that the ends of justice may be served.

The editorial follows:

[From the United States News of June 13, 1941]

FAREWELL TO CHARACTER?

(By David Lawrence)

We say farewell to Charles Evans Hughes, public servant.

We say farewell to the greatest Chief Justice of our times.

We say farewell to a Secretary of State who, in the last post-war period, steered the foreign policy of the United States through troublous waters.

We say farewell to the man who, without lifting a finger or giving an encouraging nod of the head, was drafted as the nominee of his party for the Presidency of the United States.

We say farewell to the popular Governor of the State of New York who fought race-track gambling and exploitation of the people by selfish business groups.

We say farewell to a great lawyer and a great scholar.

But we say more as we welcome into well-earned retirement a man of character who stood up through thick and thin, through the pressures of politics and the passions of partisans, and never swayed.

It seems fitting that we should pay this tribute now. It is not just the customary applause for a job well done or for an individual who has performed a valuable service. It is rather a needed emphasis on a force that has gone—for the moment—an influence that can be dimmed and even frustrated in public life but which, we hope, will never perish from the chambers of justice. It is the force of character—a force that is not acquired simply by elevation to high office or to the pinnacles of financial or business success, but a force that emanates from the man himself, widening his ever-growing orbit of influence upon the citizens of his time.

JUSTICE—AN ALLEGIANCE TO TRUTH

Mr. Hughes might have been President of the United States. He would have made a great President. But he has not achieved less because he was never our Chief Executive. For he became in time the Chief Justice of the United States. What a world of meaning our forefathers conveyed when they created that title. They thought of justice as no counterpart of the vengeance of the crusader or the partisan. They thought of justice as no legislative panderer to votes. They thought of justice as no vehicle for exhibitionism or the self-conscious vanities that go with flourishes of the pen in legal opinions. They thought of judicial opinions, whether in assent or dissent, as the expression of a man's heart seeking in conscience to interpret the soul of justice itself.

For justice is not a strained effort to balance right against wrong, equity against equity, or precedent against precedent. It is a quality that emerges from selfless people whose honesty is not a rationalized piece of self-persuasion. It is a quality that can be stoically indifferent to the wounds of a temporary unpopularity. It is a quality that comes only with a sense of responsibility and with a sense of allegiance to truth.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS OF TRADITION BACK OF SUPREME COURT

Justice needs emphasis now when character, like tradition, meets the cynicism of the superintellectual who is inclined to mistake the throb of his own ego for the throb of a good society.

Justice has sat for more than 150 years in a tribunal revered by the American people as almost sanctified in its fairness in arbiting the disputes of human life. The traditions of the Supreme Court of the United States have been carried on through decades—traditions of independence in relation to other branches of the Government, traditions in defense of human rights, in defense of savings honestly acquired, in defense of labor's rights to organize, in defense of the rights of the human being to the fruits of his toil, in defense of liberties challenged by tyrants local or national, in defense of the rich and poor alike.

Today the man who, as Chief Justice in the turbulent 4 years since February 5, 1937, saw a President of the United States launch a public attack on the Supreme Court because its decisions did not happen to conform to his political philosophy as a party leader in another branch of the Government, passes from the scene. What memories of that bitter strife Mr. Hughes carries into retirement we cannot know. For he did not allow himself to be swept into the maelstrom of debate. If the institution itself could not be persuasively defended by the people themselves against unwarranted attack, his logic was that it ill became a member of that tribunal to play the role of defender.

True the Congress refused to pass the President's bill attempting to coerce the sitting judges into retirement by enlarging the number of new appointees. True the Congress, though composed of a two-thirds majority in both Houses of the members of the President's own political party, responded to an aroused public opinion by repudiating the President's proposal. But the struggle has not ended. Fate has given Mr. Roosevelt power to fill seven vacancies—more than a majority of the Court.

Have we today, instead of the "nine old men," a set of five "yes men"? And is this number now to be increased to seven "yes men"?

This is a question made pertinent because of the nature of the decisions rendered by what one of its conspicuous members recently in a formal opinion chose to term "a reconstructed Court." The opinions handed down in the session of the Court just ended are amazing in their deviation from accepted principles of constitutional law. Words not written in the statute have been supplied by the justices. What Congress meant to say or did not mean to say—though not revealed in the statute—are glibly interpolated through judicial legislation. Principles that have stood the test of time in their thoughtful balance of relationships between the Government and the citizen are demolished overnight. The lower courts are bewildered. The bar is stunned. The basic guide to human intercourse—that principles once settled are immutable but that details and applications of principles in specific cases alone may change—is now brushed aside.

MR. ROOSEVELT QUOTED ON "COURT PACKING"

Has the Supreme Court been "packed"? Let the words uttered by President Roosevelt in support of his bill for enlargement of the Court be cited now to clarify what has happened since. He said in a Nation-wide radio broadcast on March 9, 1937:

"What do they mean by the words 'packing the Court'? Let me answer this question with a bluntness that will end all honest misunderstanding of my purposes. If by that phrase 'packing the Court' it is charged that I wish to place on the Bench spineless puppets who would disregard the law and would decide specific cases as I wished them to be decided, I make this answer—that no President fit for his office would appoint, and no Senate of honorable men fit for their office would confirm that kind of appointees to the Supreme Court.

"But if by that phrase the charge is made that I would appoint and the Senate would confirm Justices worthy to sit beside present members of the Court who understand those modern conditions—that I will appoint Justices who will not undertake to override the judgment of the Congress on legislative policy—that I will appoint Justices who will act as Justices and not as legislators—if the appointment of such Justices can be called 'packing the Court,' then I say that I and with me the vast majority of the American people favor doing just that thing—now."

A GREAT PUBLIC SERVANT MOVES INTO THE RANKS

The record of the five "yes men" speaks for itself. With not a single exception, the five appointments were made not from the bench or from a list of the ablest members of the bar but from the small political group of new dealers who have been intimate advisers or personal appointees of the President in administrative offices. Other Presidents occasionally have elevated an Attorney General to the bench, but no President has selected almost an entire Supreme Court from a political clique steeped in the advocacy of a partisan cause.

The members of the bar who have been reading the decisions of the five "yes men" stand aghast. For they see a Court packed with men who are engaging in the very practices Mr. Roosevelt so vehemently condemned—the writing of legislation. They see a Court upholding almost every arbitrary order of the executive or administrative agencies no matter how capricious or ill-conceived. They see the Court voting almost always as a unit on New Deal issues, and they see a great Chief Justice in dissent after dissent, finally moving on in silence into the ranks and leaving it again to us to defend the institution he strove so nobly to preserve.

Farewell, Mr. Chief Justice. Farewell to a great public servant. But we shall not say farewell to character. For you have left behind a living ghost on that bench. And that ghost—the attributes of honesty, unselfishness, purity, and character—will remain always to haunt the zealots who in the name of virtue dare to ignore justice.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

LETTER FROM JAMES M. DAVIDGE, PRESIDENT OF BINGHAMTON JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Mr. James M. Davidge, president of the Binghamton Junior Chamber of Commerce:

BINGHAMTON JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Binghamton, N. Y., June 6, 1941.

Hon. EDWIN A. HALL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED: The Binghamton Junior Chamber of Commerce wishes hereby to express its considered and unqualified opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway project, funds for which today the President asked congressional approval. Our position is taken in consideration of the following facts which, we believe, are incontrovertible:

1. The project could not be completed in time to be of service in the present emergency. Most experts agree that 1947 is the earliest date at which completion may be expected. On the contrary, it would divert manpower and material from our defense effort.

2. Steam plants for electric generation can be constructed in much less time and at a fraction of the cost.

3. There is 177,000 horsepower or idle generating capacity at Niagara Falls which can be used for expansion of our defense industries.

4. As a seaway the project cannot be defended as an advantage to American interests.

5. The expense would have to be borne almost entirely by American taxpayers.

6. It would seriously affect railway labor and coal miners in this country.

We respectfully urge that you use every means in your power to defeat the issue when presented before your body. We feel you should have no hesitancy in expressing your disapproval of a scheme which will add several billions to the staggering load which taxpayers are being asked to carry.

However, we do approve modification of the treaty of 1909, looking to a revision of water diversion rights, so that idle generating capacity at Niagara Falls may be put to work as needed. We urge you to exert your efforts to that end.

By order of the board of governors:

JAMES M. DAVIDGE,
President.

Progress Made by Farm Security Administration Borrowers of the Third District of Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

LETTER FROM THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by me from Hon. C. B. Baldwin, Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, telling of the splendid record of the farmers of my district in discharging their obligations and the substantial gains which they have made as a result of the aid extended to them by the F. S. A.

The letter referred to follows:

JUNE 2, 1941.

Hon. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CARTWRIGHT: Since the beginning of the present emergency it has been generally recognized that the health, welfare, and morale of our people are vitally important to national defense. Providing for these needs among low-income farm families has been one of the essential contributions of the Farm Security Administration to the Nation's defense efforts during the past year.

We have just completed a special survey undertaken last winter to measure the progress being made by borrowers from the Farm Security Administration. It indicates the gains in terms of money, living standards, and capacity for self-support which have been made during 1940 by handicapped and low-income farm people all over the country. It occurred to me that you might be interested in seeing the figures for your district.

In the Third District of Oklahoma there were 3,161 active standard rehabilitation borrowers at the end of 1940. The survey showed that the average borrower earned a net income of $603 during the year, as compared with $398 in the year before he borrowed from Farm Security. In other words, the typical family increased its annual net income by 52 percent.

Also significant are the gains which these people made in net worth, since that is one of the best measures of permanent improvement in living standards. Borrowers in your district increased their average net worth—over and above all debts, including their obligations to the Government—from $440 before they came into the Farm Security program to $644 at the close of the 1940 crop year. This is a gain of 46 percent.

These figures mean that Farm Security borrowers in the Third District have added a total of $644,528 to the wealth of their communities, and have increased their total annual incomes by $649,080. Naturally this growth in prosperity and purchasing power has been reflected on the books of merchants and other businessmen of the district.

We were pleased to find that borrowers in your district are rapidly repaying their rehabilitation loans. Already $1,007,824 has been repaid on loans totaling $2,910,309, although much of the money does not fall due for 4 or 5 years. Throughout the entire country, rehabilitation loans totaling $420,865,050 had been made as of December 31, 1940, and $149,026,442 of this sum had been repaid. As you know, loan funds currently are advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, instead of coming from direct appropriations.

In view of the fact that none of the borrowers from Farm Security was able to get adequate credit anywhere else, and that many of them formerly were on relief, we feel that this repayment record is a tribute to the honesty and industry of these needy farm people. There is ample evidence that the great majority of them are getting back on their feet and becoming permanently self-supporting. In large measure, this progress is due to the advice and technical guidance in sound farm and home management which accompanies each Farm Security loan.

For example, we encourage our borrowers to get away from one-crop farming—particularly of surplus crops, such as cotton, tobacco, and wheat—and to raise as much as possible of their own food and feed for their livestock. During 1940, the average Farm Security family in your district produced $342 worth of goods for home consumption, as compared with $170 before they came into the F. S. A. program. This produce for home use included 420 gallons of milk per family, 416 pounds of meat, and 383 quarts of vegetables and fruit canned for the winter. This increased production of food did not, of course, add to the supply in the commercial markets, since virtually none of it was offered for sale. It simply meant a better diet, better health, and a rising standard of living for these families.

Often it has been necessary to work out an adjustment of the family's old debts, before rehabilitation could be successful. Local farm-debt adjustment committees have been set up for this purpose. They have no legal authority to compel adjustments, but by bringing the farmer and his creditors together for a friendly discussion, they usually are able to arrange a scale-down of the obligations, reduced interest rates, or extension of the payment period. Such adjustments frequently save the farmer from foreclosure, and at the same time enable the creditors to get substantial payments on what might otherwise have been bad debts.

This service is available to all farmers, whether or not they are rehabilitation borrowers. Altogether, debt reductions totaling $531,287 have been negotiated for the farmers in your district. This represents a scale-down of 34.8 percent. As a direct result of these adjustments, $59,429 in back taxes has been paid to local governmental agencies.

In making this special survey, our field employees reported that there are 3,559 families in your district who are eligible and in need of rehabilitation loans, but have been unable to get them because of the limited funds available.

In addition to the rehabilitation program, Farm Security is carrying out the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, which provides a limited number of loans to competent tenants to enable them to buy family-type farms.

During the first 3 years of this program, we made 98 such loans in your district, totaling $497,669. This year we expect to make about 67 Bankhead-Jones loans in the Third District, amounting to approximately $306,769. Throughout the country, delinquencies of these loans have amounted so far to only 2.6 percent, or $23,658; and this has been more than offset by the fact that other borrowers have been able to make advance payments totaling $196,765, as the result of good crops and management.

I am hopeful that this rather detailed report may be useful to you; and if you would like to have any further facts about our program, I shall, of course, be glad to supply them. Sometime during the year, I hope that you may find an opportunity to visit some of the borrowers from F. S. A. in your district and see for yourself the efforts they are making to get a new start as independent, taxpaying citizens.

Sincerely,

C. B. BALDWIN,
Administrator.

ARTICLE BY ARTHUR KROCK ON THE EDITORIAL PAGE OF NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, in these days of great stress and excitement, many statements are made by men occupying responsible positions that are often misleading. It is surprising that there is not more confusion when one considers the huge amount of propaganda poured forth each day over the radio and printed in the daily papers. I recommend that the Members of the House read the statement by Mr. Krock because I believe it demonstrates how difficult it is for the average citizen to determine the difference between true and false announcements.

The article follows:

UNCOORDINATED IS BRITISH-AID PUBLICITY

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, June 9.—In round terms, the task assigned by the British Government to Sir Gerald Campbell is to bring American aid to his country up to the essential scale, insofar as publicity concerning the British war position can effect that. For at least three reasons this assignment is most difficult:

1. From the beginning of the war Sir Gerald's own Government has not been able to decide whether essential American aid can best be secured by optimism, hard realism, or pessimism in reporting the facts of the war.

2. The American Government, addressing Congress and the people, has wavered from the first position to the second, to the third, and then back again.

3. At no time have the two publicity policies been coordinated.

One illustration of the confusion is to be found in the reports concerned with the current visit of Ambassador Winant to this country. Since he had been only briefly at his post, his return was at first represented as impelled by an urgent errand. The newspaper correspondents on both sides of the Atlantic who so represented it did so because (a) for many weeks important administration officials have been saying that any further delay in all-out aid might be fatal to Great Britain before the year was out; (b) in the British Embassy here and in London Government and military circles (not from Nazi agents) correspondents have long been hearing the same thing; (c) Labor Minister Bevin, of Great Britain, had made the public statement that Hitler himself sent Rudolf Hess to Scotland, which could only mean that in Mr. Bevin's opinion Hitler had a proposal to make.

IN A RAIN OF CONFUSION

The effect of "a" and "b" was to invest the situation with a sense of acute urgency, which conforms to the wish of the British Government and many Americans in and out of official life. But the effect of "c" was to give life to the rumor, whether or not Nazi-encouraged, that some negotiation was being attempted. For none of this, or for the collision and confusion, was any reporter responsible; officials, on and off the record, were.

Mr. Winant came in a shower of such speculation and deduction. The President at last Friday's press conference struck out hard at the talk of peace negotiations, which had been evoked, in some measure at least, by Mr. Bevin's charge. When he was asked if Mr. Winant had brought a peace offer, whatever the source, the President replied: "Not even a tenth cousin of a peace offer, or anything like that, or any discussion of peace. Absolutely nothing like it."

This was good publicity for the British cause and for that policy of the administration which is termed "all necessary aid." It fitted perfectly into the pattern of what Sir Gerald is trying to accomplish. Intended as it was to rout the propaganda in this country that we should reserve all our armament for ourselves, it doubtless had that effect upon very many citizens.

But at the same press conference the President said no responsible source had reported that Great Britain could not continue the war more than a few months without greatly increased American aid. When asked if Sir Gerald had not made the public statement that Great Britain's situation was "very serious at the present time," he said this was one sentence lifted from its context and that if the whole statement were read a different idea would be obtained. The only logical presumption was that, in the President's opinion, a reading of the whole statement would produce the idea that Great Britain's situation is not "very serious at the present time."

WINANT'S CAPITOL CONFERENCE

Next day Ambassador Winant had a private conversation at the Capitol with four Senators. The Washington office of this newspaper made a most painstaking check on what Mr. Winant had said and reported it to have been this: Great Britain is in an "extremely grave position," both at sea and at home, but does not face "any immediate or impending disaster"; there is a "pretty good chance" to hold Egypt and Suez; Gibraltar can stand "any conceivable attack from the land"; the American Navy's Atlantic patrol is reducing shipping losses; the British have air superiority over the Channel and can stave off any invasion from the "near ports."

Another report of what Mr. Winant told the Senators was more optimistic: Britain's chances of victory are still favorable; there is no necessity for American intervention "provided this country intensifies its present aid program" (to what degree not indicated). Summing up, one Senator said: "It was not a gloomy picture at all," which would be true of both accounts. At the same time it was the description of a "very serious situation," as Sir Gerald said it was in the quoted sentence, and the President implied it was not.

The effect of all this is to strengthen congressional and public resistance to stronger military measures in aid to Britain, and that is bound to have a diminishing effect on some of the activities concerned with the defense program. Also, it dwindled the impression of urgency which Secretaries Hull, Knox, and Stimson gave in very recent speeches.

The British Embassy seemed to be upset by the mix-up, and no wonder.

Lady Eleanor—Veni, Vidi, Vici. Or Did She?

REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, at the invitation of the ladies of the Mary Fletcher Hospital Auxiliary of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt visited Vermont last week, ostensibly to help, aid, and assist the above-named organization in its effort to raise a substantial sum of money for the support and maintenance of the Mary Fletcher Hospital.

The First Lady kept her agreement, arrived on time, made her speech in good form, and left as per schedule, but with all the proceeds from the sale of tickets in her pocket. She did not leave a cent for the auxiliary.

Incidentally, it is reported that she took with her approximately $100 more than was paid in by those who took advantage of the opportunity to see and to hear her and thus to contribute to a fund for the aid of the hospital.

The Barre Times of June 7, in its column "Vermont Affairs in Prevue and Revue," carries the following significant statement:

According to the best advices from Burlington, the address by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt in that city Monday night was not very remunerative to the treasury of the Mary Fletcher Hospital Auxiliary which sponsored it. A report relayed from a reliable source is that after the expenses—including the stipend of $1,000 Mrs. Roosevelt is understood to have received—were paid, the deficit was somewhat over $100. Many had the mistaken impression that Mrs. Roosevelt's appearance was gratuitous.

S. J. R.

As a charitable venture to raise money for the hospital, the affair was a minus quantity. As a revenue producer for the First Lady, it was a success to the tune of the $1,000 she charged the ladies of the auxiliary and which they paid her for her efforts to "help, aid, and assist" this worth-while eleemosynary institution.

If reports received by interested parties are to be relied upon, the First Lady was running true to form.

Obviously, she believes that "charity begins at home," meaning, in the premises, in her bank account.

With Mrs. Roosevelt it would seem to be a question of how much she can get and take away, not how much she can do for the institution which sponsors her appearance.

But you make your own comment.

I know what I think.

I had better not tell you.

Convoys Urged and Strikes Condemned at Mass Meeting of Pittsburg County Citizens

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE McALESTER (OKLA.) NEWS-CAPITAL AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT PATRIOTIC MASS MEETING OF PITTSBURG COUNTY CITIZENS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the McAlester News-Capital telling of the patriotic mass meeting held recently in McAlester at which resolutions were adopted pledging loyal support to the President and the Congress, approving all-out aid to Britain, and urging that strikes be prohibited during the emergency.

This is the fifth such meeting held in counties in my congressional district and it is very gratifying to know that Oklahoma democracy is so overwhelmingly in favor of a program of total defense of America and keeping the horrors of this war removed from our shores by providing the necessary munitions of war to England and her allies.

The article and resolutions follow:

CONVOYS URGED AND STRIKES CONDEMNED AT MASS MEETING — PATRIOTIC GATHERING ADOPTS SEVERAL RESOLUTIONS—F. D. R.'S POLICIES APPROVED—DR. S. R. BRADEN SPEAKS

A patriotic mass meeting that was lightly attended last night because of numerous counter attractions, went on record with a pledge of loyalty to the national administration, and with some suggestions to Congress on means of handling labor problems in defense industries.

Mayor Robert J. Bell presided. The key address was delivered by Dr. Samuel R. Braden, who stressed the duties of citizens in the time of crisis. He cited the responsibilities and the part that the youth movement holds with its very important bloc of citizens.

Dr. Braden shunned controversial issues while pointing to the danger that exists. He urged that the ideals of those who founded the Republic be adhered to and that the principles of the democratic form of government be kept alive.

THREE OTHERS SPEAK

Among others who spoke briefly during the meeting were W. A. Lackey, Pres Lester, and Melven Cornish.

A resolution committee was composed of R. L. Crutcher, John Malloy Lester, Gould Bryan, and Tom G. Haile, the latter chairman.

Resolutions as submitted were later amended on the motion of Cornish to cover the recommendation to Congress on the rights of labor during the present national emergency.

The adopted resolutions expressed sympathy with the British Empire. It was urged that all possible assistance be given as quickly as possible.

SUBORDINATE PERSONAL GAIN

The President's policies and acts of Congress were approved and it was asked that all persons willingly subordinate personal gain to the public good during the emergency.

Divine guidance was invoked.

It was further resolved that the universal draft be approved, the lease-lend bill be endorsed, and that it be made 100-percent effective by the use of the United States Navy in convoying American and allied vessels carrying American-made goods on the high seas.

"We favor," said the resolution, "efforts to speed up production in our factories and workshops. We believe the Government should continue to recognize the rights of labor, organized and unorganized, to a fair share in the industrial war profits by equitable increase in wages; but once such increase, measured by the demands of labor and therefore won by strikes, has been attained, then and thereafter both strikes and lock-outs should be prohibited during the emergency."

Copies of the resolutions are being sent to the President of the United States, the two Oklahoma Senators, and to Representative WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, of this district.

RESOLUTION

Whereas there is now raging in Europe a devastating war that seems destined to engulf the whole world and has already disturbed the domestic tranquillity of this and all other nonbelligerent nations; and

Whereas the patriotic citizens of Pittsburg County, alarmed at the threat of war, have been called into mass convention upon the petition of some 40 or more representative citizens of this community; and

Whereas we sincerely sympathize with our sister democracy, the British Empire, that is fighting single-handed the battle of democracy against the aggressor nations; and

Whereas we believe that all possible assistance should be given to her as quickly as possible; and

Whereas we believe our President and Congress are making every effort to protect and defend the freedom of the seas, a time-honored policy of this Nation, to the end that our aid may be effective; and

Whereas we believe that all our people are patriotic and that all those engaged in the defense program, both capital and labor, will willingly subordinate personal gain to public good during the emergency: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the citizens of Pittsburg County in mass convention assembled, That we invoke Divine blessing on and Divine guidance for our people, the President, and Congress; that we pledge to them our patriotic and loyal support in their efforts to see that the liberties of the people do not perish from the earth; and be it further

Resolved, In order that the President and Congress may know the sentiment of this community—

First. That we approve the universal draft that has called our youth to the training camps to prepare them to become effective defenders of our liberties;

Second. That we approve the lease-lend bill designed to give all-out aid to Britain, and to make our aid 100 percent effective; we favor the use of our Navy in convoying American and Allied vessels carrying American-made goods upon the high seas;

Third. We favor and commend the efforts being made to speed up production in our factories and workshops. We believe the Government should continue to recognize the rights of labor, organized and unorganized, to a fair share in industrial war profits by equitable increase in wages; but once such increase, measured by the demands of labor heretofore won by strikes, has been attained, then and thereafter both strikes and lock-outs should and must be prohibited during the emergency; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge Pittsburg County, Okla., to join hands with all liberty-loving people everywhere to the end that democracy may survive to bless and protect generations yet unborn; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, to our two United States Senators from Oklahoma, and to our Congressman from the Third Congressional District.

Respectfully submitted this 16th day of May 1941.

TOM G. HAILE,
Chairman.

Cardinal O'Connell Reiterates His Opposition to United States "Participation in the European Chaos"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE PILOT, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from The Pilot, of May 17, 1941:

[From the Pilot, Boston, Mass., of May 17, 1941]

CARDINAL URGES WORK FOR PEACE IN PRESENT CRISIS—ADDRESSES K. OF C. COUNCIL MEETING ON TUESDAY, MAY 13—HIS EMINENCE SAYS THAT UNITY IN DEFENSE EFFORTS WITH ISOLATION FROM DIRECT PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN CHAOS IS RIGHT PATH OF ACTION

To the Massachusetts State Council of Knights of Columbus, holding their forty-seventh annual meeting at the Copley Plaza Hotel Tuesday of this week, His Eminence the Cardinal spoke in vigorous condemnation of the false war propaganda rife on all sides at the present time. His Eminence reiterated his statement made in a previous address that this country ought to keep out of foreign entanglements which must lead directly into war, and that the people of this country do not want to go to war.

The cardinal spoke with impressive sincerity which imparted the strongest conviction to his words. Eight hundred delegates, together with many of their relatives and friends, listened to the address of His Eminence, which was, in part, as follows:

CARDINAL'S ADDRESS

I don't intend to go into the big crisis in the world of today and the crises going on all over the world. I have said what I wanted to say on that subject, and I don't see any particular purpose in repeating it. In fact, repetition very often weakens rather than strengthens your statements.

I have good reason to know that what I did say on prior occasions went all over the country and, indeed, I think over a good part of the world. Now, that position I hold and I will still hold as being one of conviction for me. I will not repeat what I have already said two or three times. That, I think, is unnecessary.

You know where I stand on this matter of participation in the European chaos and you know also, as I am sure all America must know, that we are all entirely united on the question of defense. On the question of defense there is no disunity in this country, as far as one can see. Of course, I think there are always elements in every country that one has to watch, but they are infinitesimally small compared to the vast majority of the American people who stand for the defense of our Nation, and who also have gone on record again and again and again as being opposed to participation in foreign wars.

It seems to me that this has been announced and repeatedly said by men in the most eminent positions of state. Therefore, I wonder why anyone else should be surprised at the open statement of that position.

A GLORIOUS TITLE

Our duty as Catholics and Christians is to help to bring back peace to the world. When has that become a sin? Christ himself said, "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God."

Yet to say the word "peace" nowadays would be almost to bring down upon your head a torrent of abuse. Is that rational or is it just hysterical?

There is no question about the fact that there is over the world some miasma that is producing disastrous effects. Indeed, sometimes it seems to be taking away the power of reasoning. People are now in such a tense, nervous mood that they get frightfully excited about nothing at all. Well, I think that is a part of the madness of war. Just for that very reason one has to be doubly on his guard and keep cool, keep calm, keep reasonable, keep rational.

Of all things in the world I think what we have to guard against are these slimy slogans that mean nothing. They are insults to one's intelligence. And worse than that, they are dishonest. "Make the world safe for democracy." "The war to end wars." Oh, how slick that is. It sounds so nice. "The war to end wars."

Of course, everybody wants to end war so they rush in to end the war that they begin. We have had wars ever since, and the worst one the world has ever known has come about since this slogan was manufactured to fool the people.

"The war to end war," "Safe for democracy." And you have heard some more. I won't repeat them. Freedom? Freedom for whom? Freedom of speech? Well, if this smearing goes on, it will be freedom of speech for only the deaf mutes who can't talk. Freedom. Oh, the great freedom of the Son of God, the great freedom of obedience to His laws. If the world would turn away for a moment to the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount and stop all these silly slogans, which mean nothing but deception, the world would be a great deal better off.

A FIRM CONVICTION

And that is why, my dear Knights, you Catholic men who believe in principles must stand firm, unafraid, to love your God, to love your church, to love your country. You have helped to build it; you have helped to bring about its welfare. You are willing to give your life for its defense. Very well, then stand straight. And never mind the silly, slimy slogans that are being poured out merely to create confusion and to deceive people.

Now, I am not talking pointedly; I am talking generally. If it applies, I cannot help that. I don't make any application.

There is one thing certain. We cannot and we should not try to impose our form of government on the whole world. Why, other peoples don't want it. If you are going to impose it upon them, then you are doing an act of tyranny. Teach them by example; yes. Let them all learn to look to America as a great country where people are contented and happy and are working day in and day out for the welfare of their family, and their Nation—contented, honest, upright, obedient to the law of God and country; let them learn that.

By that example show the world what a great big united country this can be—made up as it is of all the different races of the world—united by love of country.

To try to impose our form of government on the world is a thing, of course, utterly impossible. I wonder if anyone really believes he could do that. If he doesn't believe it, why should he say it? It is not honest to attempt to deceive a whole people, much less the whole world. They know perfectly well what the American Government is, and many of them don't want it. Their traditions are all the other way. Very well; it is for them to decide, not for us.

But as for our going out and trying to impose our method of life on the whole world, it is not only nonsense and impossible but it is utterly wrong; it is tyranny. If they are happier in their way of life, let them alone. * * * That is the leadership America ought to have.

I remember well the story of a farmer who, whenever the fire bells sounded, left his plow and ran to the fire, even though sometimes the fire was miles away. One day he went to a fire and came back to find his own house in ashes and his family on the street.

Now, is America going to play this sort of silly game, running around to everybody's fire trying to extinguish all the blazes, and come back to find its own house in ruins? God forbid. That is what we mean when we say "defense." Yes; all out for defense, and then keep out of these foreign wars.

CONVENTION EXERCISES

The delegates attending a mass celebrated at St. Cecilia's Church on Tuesday morning. Rt. Rev. Richard J. Quinlan, diocesan supervisor of schools, gave the sermon. Msgr. Quinlan spoke in particular of the work which the Knights can do for the youth in an age when they are surrounded by many temptations and are peculiarly open to the influence of modern evils.

The reelection of the State council officers brought the convention to a close. They are Walter G. Powers, of Taunton, State deputy; Judge Frank W. Tomasello, of Boston, State secretary; James H. Flanagan, of Boston, State advocate; Edward A. Hurley, of Boston, State treasurer; William F. Brennan, of Chicopee, auditor; and Michael J. Hegarty, of Reading, State warden. The last office presented the only contest.

Other speakers at the business session were the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Francis L. Phelan, S. T. L., chaplain of the organization; Governor Saltonstall, and Judge John E. Swift, deputy supreme knight of the national order.

Put Your Finger on Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House frequent statements were made to the effect that employers are not doing their part toward national defense. That statement has often been made on the floor, and it is about time that at least someone of those who make it point out definitely just which industrialist or employer is refusing to go along with the national-defense program.

I am not referring now to employers who have been charged with unfair labor practices under the N. L. R. A. nor with failure to meet the wage or other demands of unions. I am asking some Member of the House to tell us one specific instance where an employer has refused to cooperate with the Government on the national-defense program.

It would not be polite to say "put up or shut up," but the information is requested.

This request is suggested by an editorial from the Detroit Free Press, headed "No miracle needed." It is as follows:

Col. Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy, in addressing a group of American shipbuilders in Washington, told them that they must "bring about a miracle" to furnish the ships necessary for the administration program.

"This war will be determined by a combination of sea and air power," he declared. "You have in your hands the responsibility for the success of one-half of this combination. Through you the democracies are going to win or lose."

The shipbuilders solemnly promised to do their best to perform the "miracle" demanded.

It is to be regretted that there was not one among them who had the courage to stand up and ask the Secretary why the administration should continue to maintain a condition so difficult of solution that "only a miracle" can solve it.

The dictionary says that a miracle is an event which deviates from the known laws of nature; or, transcending our knowledge of these laws, is brought about by some superhuman agency as a manifestation of its power. Colonel Knox is asking a lot of hard-boiled and altogether human manufacturers to perform something akin to the "miracle of the loaves and fishes."

He may be right in hoping for this. Only a miracle can overcome the handicap placed upon management by President Roosevelt himself in keeping such an incompetent as Frances Perkins in a position where she can hamstring all efforts to solve the problem of labor unrest.

There was a time in the beginning of civilization on this continent when the Pilgrim Fathers were inclined to look for miracles to save them. But hard-headed old John Eliot, Puritan preacher to the Indians, knew better.

"We must not sit down and look for miracles," he told them. "Up and be doing and the Lord will be with thee."

The Free Press is of the belief that the time has come when the people of this Nation have grown weary of the long-continued farce over our national-defense program at Washington.

While Secretary Knox is telling the shipbuilders to go out and perform miracles, 8,000 workers in the Great Lakes Steel Corporation at Ecorse walk out to the "surprise" of the union leaders who call a "spontaneous stoppage." The shipyards on the Pacific coast still remain idle unto the fourth week. Pittsburgh is threatened with complete paralysis in its steel production. And so it goes across the country.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD, of Virginia, hard-headed and practical statesman, before the Senate Tuesday said that on May 31 there were 74 strikes against industries filling Army and Navy orders and only 3 of these had been certified to the National Defense Mediation Board by Secretary Perkins. These figures did not include, he said, the 21 strikes and threatened strikes in industries working on merchant ships.

Since the fireside chat of 1 week ago, as Raymond Clapper points out, the strikes have grown steadily more serious, despite the appeal of the President for peace in industry.

In his more than 8 years in the White House Mr. Roosevelt has not only been the friend but the stanch protector of labor, until the time has come when his administration is accepted as a labor government. In all his time in office he has never uttered one word of criticism of the unions except the famous "plague on both your houses" remark, when the war between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. flamed forth more bitterly than usual.

Not in one instance has there been any specific proof of any manufacturer of any consequence who has refused to conform to the Government's demands for production. Yet management, day after day, takes the abuse of administration spokesmen and not one word is ever uttered against the union leaders who openly defy the administration's pleas for their return to work.

Not only labor but the American people as a whole look to Franklin D. Roosevelt as the real leader of this American labor movement.

The responsibility for the present condition, therefore, is his and his alone as long as he prefers to remain silent.

The miracle for which Secretary Knox pleads must come from the White House.

And it requires no supernatural powers but just some plain, straight talk followed by action where it will do the most good.

Japan—Friend or Foe?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE STURGIS (MICH.) DAILY JOURNAL

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, home folks are inquiring. They would like to know. With the administration threatening Japan, but at the same time permitting the shipment to her of oil and other essentials for a nation at war, some of the home folks would like to know whether the administration regards Japan as a friend or a foe.

Note this editorial from the Friday, June 6, issue of the Sturgis Daily Journal, published at Sturgis, Mich.:

[From the Sturgis (Mich.) Daily Journal of June 6, 1941]

JAPAN—FRIEND OR FOE?

The people of Michigan have ample reason to be grateful that one of the few sane voices that is being heard in Washington is that of its senior Senator, ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG.

There can be no doubt that Senator VANDENBERG has correctly appraised the temper of his constituents. He understands that an overwhelming majority of Michigan citizens are opposed to the efforts now being made to rush the Nation into a European war for which we are not prepared and whose result, it becomes increasingly apparent, we cannot control.

The sentiment of the people of this State was made evident in the vote on the lease-lend bill when 14 out of Michigan's delegation of 17 Congressmen opposed giving the President blanket authority to shoot craps with the Nation's destiny.

In his most recent speech in the Senate Senator VANDENBERG urged the Roosevelt administration to upset the strategy of the Axis powers and eliminate the threat of a two-ocean war for the United States by making an agreement with Japan which would realistically assess the new situation in the Far East. The Michigan Senator pointed out that such a step would do more to simplify and sustain our own defense preparations than literally months of frantic efforts in speeding up our production of ships, guns, tanks, and planes.

About the time Senator VANDENBERG was making his suggestion Secretary of the Navy Knox was begging for a miracle from the shipbuilders to provide the United States with warships to protect the country from attack in two oceans.

Why has the United States gotten itself into such a predicament that it is exposed to attack from both the east and the west? There is ample evidence to support the belief that Japan would have welcomed an anti-aggression treaty with this country in preference to the deal she was forced to make with her ancient and logical enemies, Russia and Germany. Such a pact would have relieved the United States from all fear of attack in the Pacific and enabled it to concentrate what is now the world's most powerful navy in the Atlantic to block any plans Hitler might have for this hemisphere. Incidentally, such a concentration of our naval power would be enormously reassuring and helpful to Great Britain.

By our lack of diplomatic gumption we have allowed ourselves to be maneuvered into a desperate plight where it becomes necessary to depend on shipbuilding miracles to protect us from attack on two fronts.

Germany set an example that would have been sound sense for us to follow. Before Hitler launched his campaign for the conquest of Europe he made certain that Germany was not exposed to attack from the rear by Russia. Without the nonagression pact that Hitler's diplomats wangled out of Stalin, Hitler would never have dared to start his military adventure against France and England.

There will be those who will oppose Senator Vandenberg's suggestion by pointing out that Japan cannot be trusted to keep any agreement that it makes with the United States. Yet Germany has far more reason to distrust Russia than the United States has to doubt Japan's motives. There is the further factor that Japan needs our help even more than we need hers.

Japan is a nation of realists and it knows where its interests lie. There was a time when it would have welcomed a gesture of friendship from the United States, but all it has had from the Roosevelt administration is a series of insults and ultimatums that have forced it into the arms of Russia and Germany. There is no reason to believe, even now, that Japan is happy in this company. Even at this late date it might be possible to wean her away from the Axis Powers. It's worth the effort.

Rules Committee Requested To Hold Hearings on Resolution Exploring Need for Unified Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks on the floor at the beginning of today's session, I am reprinting in the RECORD at this point a copy of my letter to Chairman ADOLPH J. SABATH of the House Rules Committee. I do this because of the widespread interest which has been expressed by Members of the House in the important problems with which my resolution—House Resolution 228—deals, in its relationship to proposals for modernizing and strengthening the air forces of the United States. The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1941.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
Chairman, Rules Committee,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On June 5 I introduced House Resolution No. 228 which was referred to your committee. The purpose of this resolution is to authorize the Speaker to appoint a nine-man committee to hold an inquiry to determine whether our present arrangement of having separate air branches in the War and Navy Departments best serves the defense interests of the United States or whether our defense can be strengthened and modernized, in view of experiences observed in this war, by setting up a separate air department, or by the consolidation of our air, war, and naval forces under a single Department of National Defense, with each divisional chief having coordinate ranking.

I am sure that you and your committee are fully aware of the growing concern throughout America about this problem. Several resolutions and much newspaper and radio comment favor the immediate creation of a sensible policy to provide an inquiry such as I suggest to determine all the facts before any abrupt changes are made. Such an inquiry will present an opportunity to secure all the facts and its findings will be accepted by the country as authentic and thus set at rest the discontent and growing criticism resulting from simply continuing the present policy without giving Congress an opportunity to be certain that some other method of utilizing our air forces is not superior.

Yesterday we appropriated nearly $10,000,000,000 for additional defense for America; much of it is connected with the aviation aspects of national defense. Let us now complete our task in Congress by authorizing this inquiry so that we can be sure that we have the most modern methods as well as the most modern equipment with which to defend the Western Hemisphere. In this spirit, I am writing this letter to respectfully request that your committee grant me an early hearing on House Resolution 228 to determine the wisdom of permitting Congress to vote upon the authorization of such an inquiry as I propose. If my request is granted, I shall appreciate it if you will notify me in advance of this hearing as several Members of Congress, in addition to the writer, would like to present some additional data to your committee at that time.

I trust your prevailing sense of justice and your frequently demonstrated interest in the improvement of our national defense will cause you to grant an affirmative reply to this request.

Cordially yours,
KARL MUNDT, Member of Congress.

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER SUPPORTS SINGLE OVER-ALL DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. Speaker, I also include a few passages from the recent book, Across the Busy Years, by President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, which indicate some possible increases in efficiency which might come from the consolidation and coordination of all defense services of this country in a single Department of National Defense with Under Secretaries of equal rank in charge of the divisions of air, army, and navy. These quotations are from page 358 of volume 2 of President Butler's work:

My attention was first drawn to this subject (single Department of National Defense) when reading the history of our Civil War. Its importance was greatly increased when in later years I read the very illuminating story of the details of that war as seen by a member of Lincoln's Cabinet, his Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, of Connecticut, who lived until 1878. Later on, John W. Weeks, of Massachusetts, who was Secretary of War both in the Cabinet of President Harding and in that of President Coolidge, discussed with me in great detail and was most insistent that the relations between the Army and the Navy must in the public interest be quickly improved. He said there was but one way to accomplish that, which was to establish a single Department of National Defense, with an Under Secretary for the Army, an Under Secretary for the Navy, and an Under Secretary for the air force. Secretary Weeks told many stories which were certainly extraordinary in revealing the rivalry and friction which had grown up between the several military establishments.

Mr. Speaker, America's defenses must be second to none in the world either in the matter of modern methods or modern material. An inquiry such as I have proposed in House Resolution 228 will give all parties concerned an opportunity for a fair and unprejudiced hearing to the end that we can all be reassured that nothing is being overlooked in the important job of making this country and this hemisphere an invincible citadel of freedom.

Cardinal O'Connell Insists That the United States "Must Keep Out of This Madness Created by Hate"

TELEGRAM FROM CARDINAL O'CONNELL READ AT AMERICA FIRST MEETING IN NEW YORK

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following copy of telegram read at America First meeting held in Madison Square Garden, New York, May 23, 1941:

JOHN T. FLYNN,
New York, N. Y.:

Your touching appeal to me compels me to repeat once more the cry of a Christian heart to God begging Him, in His great mercy, to open the minds and hearts of those entrusted with the government of nations to the real horror of the present insensate conflict and make them realize the crime of continuing this inhuman slaughter and the utter desolation, material and moral, which threatens all civilization and civil order. To deny the possibility of immediate peace is to deny the presence of intelligence and good will on earth. Millions and millions are praying daily and working for peace among the nations. Practically the whole population of our dear country is averse to the continuation of this stupid and insane war. Nearly all the people of this country have decided already and still hold to their decision that the United States must keep out of this madness created by hate. Our country wants two things above all—the defense which makes it strong against its enemies and the peace which makes it strong at home. Christ blessed the peacemakers and therefore since the purpose of this meeting is to further peace and good will on earth Christ will bless you and aid you in your holy efforts to bring an end to this conflict. And I, in my humble capacity as a priest of God, send you my most cordial best wishes and blessing.

WILLIAM CARDINAL O'CONNELL,
Archbishop of Boston.

Poll of Citizens of Neosho, Mo., on Intervention of the United States in the European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. BENNETT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, a few of us from the Midwest who have been telling the Nation that our section of the country is for strong national defense and opposed to taking part in the European war were greatly surprised by the contents of an article printed in Life magazine of May 26, 1941. According to that particular issue of Life, we did not know the sentiment of our own people. I am pleased to say that we have been vindicated.

There has been much comment to the effect that the public press is trying to sell the American people upon the desirability of intervention in the current European war. In its issue of May 26 Life magazine printed an interesting article seeking to show that a typical midwestern town, typically American, was in favor of intervention. The town chosen as guinea pig was Neosho, in southwest Missouri. The conclusion of the Life correspondent was, I quote: "Most of its citizens are for intervention."

The America First Committee refused to accept this conclusion and paid for a poll which was conducted by Springfield Newspapers, Inc. The question asked was, "Do you favor United States entry into the European war?" Ballots were mailed to all Neosho citizens listed in the city directory of that town. Returns of the poll show that 69.6 percent of the people are opposed to intervention.

It is such observations as this that remind us of the serious responsibility the public press has to the people in giving fair and impartial statements on the crisis in international affairs. Loosely worded and haphazard calculations, such as made by Life magazine in this instance, tend to undermine confidence in the press and all publications which seek to give a news coverage.

The people of this Nation are not going to be frightened into another futile overseas expedition. They are for national defense and will fight to the last man for defense of our country. National defense is not served by provoking attack before we are adequately prepared to defend our own shores. National unity is not served by biased, prejudiced, and inflammatory articles which seek to make beliefs of a loud minority the policies of the majority.

Mr. Speaker, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two articles concerning this poll from the Springfield (Mo.) Leader and Press.

[From the Springfield (Mo.) Leader and Press of May 30, 1941]

ALL NEOSHO TO BE ASKED TO VOTE ON INTERVENTION

How does Neosho, Mo., stand on United States intervention in the war against Hitler?

Seeking an answer to the question of how the Middle West stands on the subject, Life magazine chose Neosho as a sample—reported, "Most of its citizens are for intervention."

But the America First Committee refused to accept such a conclusion; its spokesman here, O. K. Armstrong, visited Neosho and reported a prevailing sentiment against intervention.

To establish the facts of the matter, the Springfield newspapers will poll the entire city.

Sometime over the week end, every citizen of Neosho who is listed in the city directory will receive the following letter:

SPRINGFIELD NEWSPAPERS, INC.,
Springfield, Mo., May 28, 1941.

DEAR CITIZEN: An article in the May 26 issue of Life discusses the attitude of the citizens of your city, Neosho, as observed by a reporter for that magazine. The subtitle of the article reads:

"Visiting this small and peaceful town in Missouri, Life's reporter investigates its feelings on the war and finds most of its citizens are for intervention."

In the article, the reporter says: "In talking to businessmen, shopkeepers, lawyers, factory workers, and farmers in Neosho, I find a unanimity of interventionist sentiment that surprised me."

It surprised quite a few others, too—some so much that they have sharply challenged the conclusion.

As a result, O. K. Armstrong, representing the America First Committee, visited Neosho this week and brought back an opposite report. He said he talked to about 20 Neosho people, and got the impression the town is 80 percent against intervention.

Life, of course, has long crusaded for America's more active and aggressive participation in promoting the war. America First is an organization which equally strongly opposes the entry of this country into war.

The Springfield Newspapers, Inc., do not know which report is the more nearly accurate. It looks to us as though an interventionist in Neosho found interventionist sentiment; and a noninterventionist found noninterventionist sentiment. Each seemed to find what he sought.

Neither side really answered the important question: Do the people of the United States, as represented in a typical midwestern town, Neosho, want this country to enter the World War?

To determine the answer as impartially and accurately as possible the Springfield newspapers are taking a poll of all Neosho citizens, mailing ballots to every adult person listed in the latest city directory.

In order to make this poll as complete and true as possible, will you please mark and mail immediately the enclosed card. It is not necessary to sign it. We shall be grateful for your prompt cooperation.

Sincerely yours,

SPRINGFIELD NEWSPAPERS, INC.

P. S.: Where two cards are enclosed, one is for husband and one for wife.

Enclosed with the letter will be post-card ballots bearing the one direct question: "Do you favor United States entry into the European war?"

NEOSHO 69.6 PERCENT OPPOSED TO AMERICAN INTERVENTION IN WAR—ARMSTRONG THINKS POLL SHOWS SENTIMENT THROUGHOUT STATE

(By Docia Karell)

By a vote of 69.6 percent "No" on the question, "Do you favor United States entry into the European war?" the Springfield newspapers' poll of Neosho has disproved Life magazine's conclusion that there is "a unanimity of interventionist sentiment" in that typical Ozarks city.

The poll ended yesterday with a return of 994 ballots marked as follows:

No, 692; yes, 276; uncertain, 26.

Of 3,153 ballots mailed out to every Neosho citizen listed in the latest city directory, 99 were returned undelivered, apparently because the addressees had moved from the community. That leaves 3,054 ballots for which to account—and 994 is practically one-third of that many. A one-third return on any such poll is considered average and satisfactory.

BALLOTS TO EVERYBODY

Most polls, to being with, pick only a limited number of typical persons to question, and consider the result representative. This one was all-inclusive; ballots were mailed to all, regardless of status or vocation.

The America First Committee paid the expenses, the poll having been suggested by O. K. Armstrong, America First worker, who questioned Life's report, and, after a visit to Neosho, made an estimate that 80 percent of the population opposes intervention.

Cost of the poll, paid by the America First Committee, was about $135, including postage, printing, and stenographer's fee.

Of the results of the poll, Mr. Armstrong said yesterday, "I am gratified. I believe it represents fairly accurately, not only the sentiment of Neosho, but also the sentiment of Missouri citizens as a whole throughout the State. Taking the entire Middle West, and including States like Wisconsin, where anti-interventionist feeling is very strong, I believe the same sentiment would run 5 to 10 percent higher.

"Life did select a typical small city in the Midwest," conceded Mr. Armstrong. "But Life started out with a purpose—it intended to show a majority in favor of intervention. We have presented accurate results (through the poll) correcting the misleading impression which Life gave."

"After all, the issue that has got to be settled is: Shall this country go to war? And I think it will be settled very, very soon.

"The fact that the Springfield newspapers conducted the poll, insured that it would be fair and impartial in every way."

The Springfield newspapers also considered the question on the ballot perfectly fair.

Their only purpose in taking it was to find what the real facts are—no effort was made to influence it; and, on the contrary, every effort was made to be impartial and fair to both sides. From the newspapers' point of view, it was strictly a news project—to report as accurately and completely as possible, what the sentiment is; not to promote either side.

It is probable that a few late, straggling ballots may still come in, but officially the count was completed yesterday. A few votes more or less would not change the result, anyhow, since the percentage—about 70 percent "noes"—has been running the same each day since the first returns began to be received.

Economic Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an interesting and provoking summarization of the principles of economic freedom, prepared by a constituent of mine, Mr. C. T. Habegger, of Berne, Ind.

Mr. Habegger, a small-town businessman who has earned national recognition as a champion of local ownership and free enterprise, believes that there should be a clarification of the fundamental rights which go to make up "the American way of life."

Mr. Habegger goes straight to the point when he asks:

Just what are those fundamentals we talk about?

Why not begin with a clarification of those fundamentals so that we know what we mean by democracy in business, democracy in religion, democracy in government, and democracy of thought?

That's another way of stating the four freedoms—economic, religious, political, and intellectual.

To me it seems that we have a fairly clear picture of the last three, but an altogether blurred picture of the first. And yet the last three are dependent upon the first, for without economic freedom—democracy in business—the masses will demand a form of public socialism which immediately begets governmental dictatorship which becomes an octopus that can thrive only by destroying religious and intellectual freedom.

Mr. Habegger then proceeds to summarize what economic freedom means to him, admitting that it needs to be refined, polished, and perhaps shortened. His summary can be studied with benefit by all of us, and I am sure Mr. Habegger would appreciate your comment on it.

The article follows:

AN APPROACH AT THE SUMMARIZATION OF THE PRINCIPLES OF ECONOMIC FREEDOM

(By C. T. Habegger)

1. Men must be esteemed as sacred personalities—as inviolable souls, born with the undeniable right to live as freemen, economically, politically, and spiritually.

2. John Stuart Mill's definition of freedom, "That of pursuing our own good in our own way so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it," is still correct.

3. Individual and family welfare comes ahead of institutional welfare. The institution is created by man to benefit man, rather than man to benefit the institution.

4. The best form of government yet designed for a good society of freemen is a benevolent, capitalistic, representative democracy, providing freedom, opportunity, and rewards commensurate with the intrinsic worth and effort of all citizens.

5. Such a government voluntarily wins the loyal support of worthy citizens in its permanent welfare by providing a genuine opportunity to possess a deserving personal stake—not too little, nor too much—in its economic, political, and spiritual benefits, permitting any citizen, regardless of his position at birth to rise by the route of merit to the highest honors in the land.

6. The highest concept of general welfare is not based on wealth, but contentment; not greed, but culture; not hoarding, but giving; not privilege, but justice; not servitude, but freedom; not efficiency, but happiness; not war, but peace. These intangible assets are priceless in comparison to any materialistic assets.

7. In the eternal struggle between the forces of materialistic domination (might) and the forces of humanitarian freedom (right), the former must yield always.

8. Our standard of living must be appraised by the quality of informed free men a government develops, rather than by the cheapness or the abundance of the goods its machinery can produce. Abundance with happiness comes only when free men can see and feel an incentive to work and venture under rules which guarantee equal opportunities for each generation.

9. Next to ignorance, we must recognize monopolistic, regimented enterprise, characterized by excessive absenteeism, as the greatest enemy of a free people. Absenteeism is a reactionary force, nullifying and disavowing democracy itself. It begets dictatorship in government.

10. Local control of local affairs, economically, politically, and religiously, is the foundation of freedom and democracy.

Post-War Plan Urged To Taper Off Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

Tuesday, June 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following timely article by Mr. C. B. Allen from the New York Herald Tribune of June 7, 1941:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 7, 1941]

POST-WAR PLAN URGED TO TAPER OFF PRODUCTION—MANUFACTURERS WANT UNITED STATES TO LET CONTRACTS RUN ON AS ANTISLUMP PRECAUTION

(By C. B. Allen)

As a long-range move to forestall as far as possible the disastrous economic slump that has followed forced-draft production in every previous national emergency, a number of defense-equipment manufacturers, it was learned today, are urging the Government to modify the War and Navy Departments' standard end-of-the-emergency cancelation clause in their contracts with industry.

Defense officials are said to favor the suggestion, the purpose of which is to taper off war-material production over several months or a year instead of bringing it to an abrupt halt when hostilities end.

Proponents believe the move would do much to cushion the country through the inevitably rocky period of readjustment to peacetime production which they foresee upon cessation of the present all-out demand for war supplies. Unless such action is taken, many of them feel that post-war unemployment conditions may attain chaotic and possibly disastrous proportions.

JOB AMORTIZATION

They point out that the Government, through its plant-expansion amortization and allied legislation, has already taken steps which safeguard capital to a certain degree against the heavy load it has been asked to carry in the national-defense and aid-to-Britain program. It is therefore logical, they maintain, that the Government should undertake what amounts to a job-amortization program for the millions of men and women who would almost immediately be thrown out of work if all defense contracts were summarily terminated as provided under their present end-of-the-emergency basis.

Specific proposals have been made that defense production be tapered off on a percentage basis, month by month, in order to give manufacturing concerns an opportunity to return to normal business, gradually absorbing the workmen thrown out of defense jobs.

One of the greatest advantages argued for such a program is that it not only would reduce to a minimum the discontent and other psychological factors which have attended the mass cessation of all previous war production efforts, but also would maintain the productive skill of factory employees up to the moment of their transfer to other jobs.

WOULD BAN DUMPING

One thing implicit in the proposal, however, is that military services agree to hold in reserve even those war materials such as airplanes, trucks, tractors, and similar equipment which might be turned to peacetime use, agreeing not to paralyze industry by dumping them on either the domestic or foreign market at sacrifice prices.

According to Labor Department estimates of last fall, from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 previously unemployed men and women will have been absorbed in national-defense jobs by the end of this year. This gives a good indication of the total number of workmen now engaged in the production of war materials.

Indications are that the proposal will be laid before Congress before the end of the present session, either by the industrialists who conceived the plan and are rallying behind it or by the Government's own long-range planning experts. The plan is said to be gaining favor in the latter quarter because it is realized that the Government will have to take care of the post-war unemployed either by direct relief or by some other means such as the job-amortization scheme, and that this seems to be a much more constructive procedure than the dole.

STATEMENT OF CITIZENS OF FAIRBURY, NEBR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a statement to the Members of Congress from a group of patriotic, Christian women of Fairbury, Nebr. These women are to be commended for their interest in and concern for the youth of America.

The statement follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned citizens of Fairbury, of the county of Jefferson, of the State of Nebraska, do respectfully petition you to help promote the welfare of the people of the United States by securing the passage of legislation which will stop, as far as possible by Federal law, the great advertising campaign for the sale of alcoholic beverages now going on by press and radio.

The States cannot adequately regulate or prohibit the advertising of liquor so long as Congress permits such advertising through the medium of interstate commerce: Therefore

We most earnestly urge your assistance in securing this proposed legislation, in order that State regulations and laws upon the subject may thereby be made more adequate and effective and that radio advertising of alcoholic beverages may be stopped entirely.

The Nation has called its young men to defend the flag, and we citizens do ask that these young men may be defended from alcohol, an enemy which will undermine their health, their physical strength, their mental faculties, their efficiency, and thus unfit them for the task to which they are called.

These young men, many no more than boys, come in large numbers from homes of high morals and religious standards, where alcohol is banished. Alcohol in the smallest quantities affects the brain and would unfit them for the high work they will be called upon to do; therefore

It is highly important that no alcohol be allowed to be served in their quarters, or where they can get it.

Our protection and our safety lies in a sober Army and Navy, and we call upon our Congress to see that our boys are kept free of the curse of this enemy of mankind.

(This is followed by the signatures of 22 ladies.)

EDITORIAL FROM THE TABLET, BROOKLYN, N. Y., AT THE REQUEST OF RICHARD M. KEENAN, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Tablet, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

[From the Tablet, Brooklyn, N. Y., of May 31, 1941]

MEMORIAL DAY, 1941

To the Tablet and the overwhelming majority of the people can fully appreciate how Pope Pius XII has felt on the war in Europe. Many months before the conflict commenced, the Holy Father warned the nations of the coming catastrophe. Just when the conflict started he cried out for peace and at every opportunity since he has set forth the cry our Saviour would make to end this unnecessary and devastating war.

The Tablet has followed the lead of the Pope in appealing that the war be not spread. Like the Holy Father this paper sorrows that world leaders seemingly desire to carry to disaster the masses of the people who do not want war. And like Pope Pius, it will continue to pray for, work for, and talk for peace, realizing that God alone seems able to save the nations of the world and having confidence that the voice of the people will some day be heard.

As far back as 1938, this paper said: "Another war will come. The propagandists from abroad—notably Lord Marley and Pertinax—are here. You may call us alarmists but when war breaks out in Europe, the United States will be asked to take sides. First it will be sympathy, then money and war implements and finally men. From here on let us declare for peace." The program for war was arranged on a time table. It was for this reason we opposed every step, the changing of the neutrality legislation, cash and carry, conscription, the transfer of destroyers, and the lend-lease bill. We hesitated to believe those steps were meant to keep us out of war.

Millions of Americans gathered close to their radios on Tuesday evening last in anticipation of a speech from the President of the United States that would rank as one of the most momentous and epoch-making in the history of our country. We feel that many were disappointed. The President gave us no new facts on the national crisis; he emphasized as dangers what we have known for several years; he held up as ends to be fought for, if necessary, the same ideals we have been insisting upon; he called for a courage that Americans have always had; he asked for a realism that we have been pleading with our Government to adopt for the past several years; he pleaded for unity to a people who have been pleading with him for national unity of purpose and for an end to international comradeship with foreign belligerent governments.

The President disappointed also the millions who hoped that he would give some sign of recognition of the validity of their pleas, which have been flooding the White House. He lauded traditional American heroism and said we would be helpless if the Nazis gain control of certain air and naval bases: "When our enemy comes at you in a tank or a bombing plane, if you hold your fire until you can see the whites of his eyes, you will never know what hit you." He dedicated the Nation to the aim of preserving freedom of speech and unfortunately grouped the millions who oppose his belligerent policies into three unfair and unjustly attributed categories: Those who say we are disunited and cannot act; the timid; and those who "shut their eyes to the ugly realities."

We cannot but agree with the President upon his aims, insofar as they concern our national welfare and safety, but we do not approve of many of the means which he would adopt to attain those aims. For instance, we do not believe that upon the fate of Britain and China rests the fate of America, and that, therefore, we must disperse our already inadequate strength in Europe, Asia, and Africa lest we are to see Hitler in control of our industries, our farms, and our worship. We have a faith in American people which the President must share with us. We believe that the intelligence of the American people is above being stirred by emotional and imaginative fantasies. We believe that the American people are realistic enough to realize that America's immediate danger is one which the President overlooked, namely, the discontent and the disunity being fostered by small, powerful, and highly financed individuals and groups who are seeking to destroy within our own borders the very freedoms which the President himself so nobly expressed such solicitude for in foreign nations.

But one grim reality the President did not mention, one grim reality that the American people realize only too well and probably the one foreign issue on which the President could rally his people behind him: The reality of a Soviet that sprawls across Europe and Asia, which has almost a third of China under its control and which has a scientifically organized network of "fifth columnists" and saboteurs in every strategic unit of our own Nation.

We stand with our President in full loyalty in the national emergency that he has proclaimed. We will play our full part "without stint and without selfishness and without doubt that our democracy will triumphantly survive." In turn, we confidently expect our leader to support the wishes of the people that, to use his own words, "we will not participate in foreign wars and will not send our Army, naval, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas except in case of attack."

We are just past Memorial Day for 1941. This is an occasion when we go to the graves of our departed fellow citizens who died for America's safety. To them the United States was everything and from Europe's recurring wars they kept aloof. We pray that their spirit may live again and we pray for the living, that American mothers will not be asked to sacrifice their sons in distant lands and far-off seas in a war which they do not want, which is not their war. Even our President must join in such a Christian prayer.

Administration of Poor Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ROBERT L. RAMSAY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

AN ARTICLE BY CHARLES McCAMIC, OF WHEELING, W VA

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by the Honorable Charles McCamic, of Wheeling, W. Va.:

ADMINISTRATION OF POOR RELIEF IN THE VIRGINIAS

(By Charles McCamic)

The poor have been a problem since men have lived together. Biological inequalities among men, chance, political, industrial, and social organization of the particular community, religious beliefs, war, and devastation are among the principal causes, the forces of which are at times clearly discernible and at other times mingled and meshed in an inextricable confusion. Poverty is not a disease, the cure for which is a single specific. Throughout the ancient world, in the Middle Ages—wherever man has left a record—a part of it concerns the unfortunate and destitute. As with most problems that go beyond individual control affecting groups, a community, or a nation, there has never been a rational approach to the difficulty.

In some instances a poor man was regarded as a degraded creature, his poverty symptomatic of his want of character; in other instances, an object of alms; in others, a sacred obligation. The ancient Jews apparently felt that the difficulty lay not in the poor themselves but in the accentuation of advantages and differences which naturally occur among men. Hence, at periodic intervals, they had a redistribution and a leveling of men from which point they started all over again.

While such an idea has an engaging appeal, the confusion which must have resulted from its application can readily be imagined. Redistribution has not been a persistent force. The mere possession of wealth is formidable initial redoubt of resistance, and those who control society's administrations do not welcome a breaking up of the status quo. We, in America, have been imbued with the doctrine that equality of opportunity naturally exists and that the poor are such a small percentage of the total population as to be negligible. It is a human trait to dust off our consciences with the slightest concessions and mankind has been side-stepping and dodging—as with most problems—the ever-recurring specter of the problem of the unfortunate.

While the problem is universal, both in time and space, the generalizations of other times are more important than their detail. Accordingly, the historical continuity of our English-speaking peoples' approach is chosen for what, at best, must be an inadequate review.

THE POOR LAWS OF ELIZABETH

In 1601—the forty-third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth—the English poor law was first codified. The immediate occasion was acute social turmoil. There were complaints from all sides that England was overrun with vagabonds. Ex-soldiers, ex-servants, farm laborers, and many others recruited the great swarms of wandering, idle, and in a great degree vicious men and women who covered England as a plague of locusts. Action by the authorities was forced and there resulted the legislation referred to.

The great plan was to charge the 15,000 parishes of England with the care of their own poor who eventually became tied to their locality and could be returned to their parish if they left. Workhouses were established; doles paid; the poor were farmed out and apprentices were bound out. The central idea was to provide work for the able-bodied, to furnish assistance to those for whom work could not be found, and to care for the aged and infirm. Begging was forbidden except upon license in certain parishes where the magnitude of the problem overtaxed the public resources. Those so licensed were compelled to wear a badge on the shoulder so they would be known as legal beggars. The unfortunate were classified—if somewhat roughly and rudely. Order was effected and the vicious could be put down; and the rich were made to pay.

It is beside the point to discuss the efficacy of the poor laws of Queen Elizabeth. Emphasis is laid upon the elaborate attempt—through legislation—to regulate the problem. The English efforts became the inheritance of the Virginia colony.

THE VIRGINIA COLONY

The charter of the Virginia Company was granted on April 10, 1606, to "certain knights, gentlemen, merchants, and other adventurers." These grantees secured the royal charter rights in part for purposes of trade and profit to themselves. It was hoped that the plan would be attractive to the surplus population of England and emigration ensue and thus in some measure ameliorate the hard times and onerous conditions existing in England.

All land in the Colony was to be held—in the now quaint phraseology of the charter—"in free and common soccage only" which meant simply free of the obligations of military service. It was necessary in the early days to manage the property jointly for the benefit of those contributing money and those who contributed services only, and for 7 years labor and effort were pooled and everyone took out of the common store with unfortunate results. Capt. John Smith in 1624[1] described the situation very neatly:

"When our people were fed out of the common store, and laboured jointly together, glad was he could slip from his labour, or slumber over his taske he cared not how, nay the most honest among them would hardly take so much true paines in a weeke, as now for themselves they will doe in a day, neither cared they for the increase, presuming that howscever the harvest prospered, the generall store must maintaine them, so that wee reaped not so much corne from the labours of thirtie, as now three or foure doe provide for themselves."

The next step was a second charter in 1609 which made the Virginia Company a corporation, with complete governing power and authority. An allocation of lands was made—3 acres to every man. The authority of the corporation was complete until the first session of the legislature in 1619.

The first years of the Colony were full of privations and hardships. As life was hard, the laws were strict and severe. Obedience to authority was sternly enforced. The many punishments relating to stealing reflect the scarcity of food and the means of existence. Dire necessity only would nerve a man to violate the Draconic Code of the early years of the Virginia Colony.

As the population grew, as fields were cleared and regular crops planted and harvested, living generally became easier. The cultivation of tobacco early proved profitable. It soon became a medium of exchange. Church taxes and even the salary of the Governor were paid in tobacco. It also had the effect of inducing emigration.

Elizabeth's poor laws seemed incontestably to be due to the crowded condition of England. But now in Virginia, with plenty of land and a sparse population, the age-old problem of the destitute, the sick, lame, and aged bobs up again as a public problem within two score of years after the establishment of the Colony. In 1642 the relief of the poor by law was committed to the church vestry which was empowered to issue certificates to the commissioners of the county of residence of the individual "to testifie their poverty which shall free them from all publique charges except the ministers' & parish duties."[2]

THE CHURCH

In 1646[3] an act was passed reciting the passage by Parliament of various acts by which there was vested power in English justices of the peace to bind out children of the poor, and also vesting in the county commissioners power to choose two children, either male or female, of the age of 7 or 8 years, in each county, and send them to James City to be employed in public flax houses under a master or mistress in carding, knitting, and spinning, for which the children were each to "be furnished from the said county with sixe barrells of corne, two coverletts or one rugg, and one blankett: one bed, one wooden bowle or tray, two pewter spoones, a sow shote of sixe months old, two laying hens, with convenient apparell, both linen and woollen, with hose and shooes." Two houses to accommodate them were to be built, each 40 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 8 feet high, with a brick chimney in each house.

Eighty years later, the act of 1727[4] made it unlawful for the inhabitants of Virginia to entertain, hire, or employ, above the space of 48 hours, any tithable person, unless such person produce a certificate from the sheriff or church wardens that such person had paid the previous levies, or was a servant at the time of laying the levy; vagabonds were defined as able-bodied persons, fit to labor, who not having sufficient maintenance were found loitering, or begging; declared vagabonds could be committed to the common jail, and could also be whipped.

Poor persons upon complaint by a church warden of any parish were subject to be removed to their own parishes, and only those who had actually resided for 1 year in the parish were accounted as inhabitants.

If the vestry of the parish where such poor persons resided declined to receive them, the members were subject to a fine of 20 pounds—one-half to the Sovereign and the other half to the use of the poor of that parish from whence the removal was made.

Masters of ships bringing into the colony and turning loose sick and disabled sailors laid themselves liable to a 10-pound fine to the church warden, to be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, and applied to the use of the poor.

Children of parents unable or neglecting to support them could be bound out as apprentices.

A few years later, in 1748,[5] a general act was passed for better securing the payment of parish levies, the restraint of vagrants, and making provision for the poor.

The method provided was generally that of the earlier law of 1727; i. e., for a complaint by a church warden before a justice of the peace that a poor person might become a charge upon the parish. In such case, the justice could direct that such poor person be removed to the parish where he or she was last legally settled; if such could not be done, the church wardens were required to care for maintenance and cure at the charge of the parish, providing a penalty if the church wardens declined to do so, with remedy against them, and further providing a penalty against any housekeeper who would entertain any poor person without giving notice to the church wardens of the parish.

The churchwardens collected tithes which were used for the minister's salary, the clerk's salary, the maintenance and building of churches and chapels, and for the support of the poor. Tithes were assessed against all males over 16 years of age. A later act of 1776 exempted societies of dissenters from contributing to the support and maintenance of the church,[6] from which time dates the decline of the influence and power of the vestrymen of the church.

THE WORKHOUSE

The workhouse was first established in Virginia in 1755.[7] The reason given in the act for such establishment is that the number of poor people of late years increased throughout the colony, and the most proper method for their maintenance, and for the prevention of great mischief arising from such number of unemployed poor is "to provide houses for their reception and employment."

Every vestry was charged with the duty to provide "one or more house or houses within their parish, for the lodging, maintaining, and employing of all such poor people as shall be upon the parish, or who shall desire relief from the vestry or churchwardens; and to employ all such poor persons, in such works as shall be directed by the said vestry, or churchwardens; and to take and apply the benefit of their labor, for and towards their maintenance and support, and to provide cotton, hemp, flax, or any other necessary materials, implements, or things, for setting the said poor to work; * * *." The relief was confined to the resident poor in the parish, and the churchwardens were empowered to place or send such poor to the workhouses with full power to set all such poor persons as might be sent there to work or labor according to their several abilities and the rules and orders of the vestry and churchwardens.

Persons in the parish found begging also could be sent to the workhouses, where they could be employed, not to exceed 20 days, in such works and labors as the churchwardens should adjudge them able to perform, and the profits of such beggars' labor were to be applied toward their maintenance. Either class—poor persons or beggars—could be dealt with by the lash for refraction, not exceeding 10 lashes at any one time or for any one offense. If a person ordered to the workhouse declined to enter, such person was thereafter denied poor relief except, if the vestry would find that, by reason of sickness or old age, such person was incapable of labor, it could order otherwise. The names of all receiving relief were to be kept in the wardens' books.

In addition, every person receiving relief from the parish and sent to the workhouse was required to wear upon the shoulder of the right sleeve of his uppermost garment in an open and visible manner a badge of blue, red, or green cloth, as the wardens should direct, and, on this badge the name of the parish to which such person belonged was placed. If such poor person neglected or refused to wear the badge indicating such status, the churchwardens had the power to inflict punishment, either by abridgement, suspension, or the withdrawal of allowance, or by whipping the offender. Thus entered in Virginia the label system applied to beggars previously existing in England. This act also permitted the care of the workhouse to be let to contractors who had the power to set all poor persons to work.

THE OVERSEER SYSTEM OF RELIEF FOR THE POOR

In May of 1780[8] the Legislature of Virginia passed an act reciting in the preamble that "great inconveniences have arisen from the mode prescribed for making provision for the poor and other duties of the vestries, as by law now directed in the counties of Rockbridge, Botetourt, Montgomery, Washington, Greenbrier, Augusta, and Frederick." The act thereupon dissolved vestry systems existing in said counties and inaugurated the election of overseers of the poor by sheriffs of the counties. The board of overseers, which consisted of five, was given general powers previously lodged in the vestry of the Episcopal church. This in a measure was a reversion to the English precedent of having overseers.

The dissolution of the vestries in the counties of Shanandoah, Henry, Monongalia, Ohio, and Berkeley followed with the act of May 1782[9] which in terms generally conforms with the previous act of 1780.

In October of 1785, an act was passed[10] retaining the overseer system of administering poor relief, and further providing that counties within the Commonwealth should be laid off into convenient districts and that election should be held in each district for the purpose of electing overseers and that, at such election, those entitled to vote should "consist of freeholders and housekeepers only." This act invested the overseers of the poor with the same powers and duties formerly prescribed for the various vestries under direction of the different county courts.

The legislature, in the preamble to the act of October 1786,[11] recited that "the act passed at the last session of assembly, to provide for the poor within this Commonwealth, hath been found inadequate to their relief." Also the act provided that the county court was given the power of selecting overseers in places where elections had not been held to fill vacancies. The act further grouped the "poor, lame, blind, and other inhabitants of the said district as are not able to support themselves" and provided for houses, nurses, and doctors who should be paid out of the contingent fund which, if insufficient, was to be provided for in the succeeding levy. The blind and the lame, for the first time in the Virginia statutes, were recognized as distinct classes and they were grouped with the poor.

Strolling from one county to another was forbidden. Overseers were authorized to bind out poor orphans and children apprentices "until the age of 21 years, if a boy, or 18 years, if a girl," requiring that the indentures contain proper covenants to oblige the teaching of some art, trade, or business and also reading and writing, and if a boy, common arithmetic, including the rule of three.

On December 26, 1792 [12] a general act was passed providing for the poor and also declaring who shall be vagrants. This act continued the method of having overseers which, as we have seen, began in 1780. It provided that the overseers of each district "shall provide for the poor, lame, blind, and other inhabitants of the district not able to maintain themselves, and may also provide houses, nurses, and doctors, in such cases as they or a majority of them shall think necessary; the expenses of which shall be provided for in the succeeding levy."

Vagrants were also placed under the jurisdiction of the overseers of the poor with power to cause such to be employed in labor for a term not to exceed 3 months and for this purpose could be hired out for the best wages that could be procured, the wages to be applied to the use of the poor.

The administration of poor relief in Virginia, by the year 1792, had completely passed from administration by the church and its vestry to an elected political body. During the long period of the government of Virginia as a colony and Commonwealth, the Episcopal Church, through its vestries, had administered the poor relief and had also accumulated through public authority much property known as glebe lands as well as other realty. Glebe lands, generally speaking, were lands belonging to and which could be used for the benefit of the parish. The Virginia Legislature, in 1802,[13] provided for the sale of glebe lands by the overseers of the poor and that the money so received, after deducting costs, expenses, and debts existing against the same, should be appropriated by the overseers or a majority of them, "to the poor of such parish" unless otherwise directed. Properties acquired by the churches through private donations made prior to January 1, 1777, were excepted from the operation of the law.

It was further provided that taxes (called poor rates) were to be levied and collected as theretofore. The several corporate towns in the Commonwealth were to have their own overseers and make their own provision for the relief of the poor and the county courts and corporation courts were further authorized "to provide or build a poorhouse and workhouse for the reformation of vagrants," etc. Vagrants could be dealt with and the act provided for handling moral delinquencies of certain types.

A codification of the poor laws of Virginia is contained in the act of February 10, 1819.[14] The overseers were to be elected by the votes of freeholders and housekeepers only in the district. The poor, lame, blind, and other inhabitants of the district not able to maintain themselves were to be provided with provisions for houses, nurses, and doctors and the expenses to be cared for in the succeeding levy as theretofore.

Relief of itinerant persons who had migrated into the State within 3 years next might be reviewed by the overseers. The overseers were vested with the power to use charitable donations theretofore made for vestries which vestries had ceased to exist. The power was retained to bind out apprentices as formerly and to require the education of such apprentices but making it unlawful to require teaching of any black or mulatto orphans hereafter bound out.

A recent author observes [15] that the placing of the execution of the poor law in the hands of the county overseers of the poor was unfortunate since they were all too often an inefficient and politically minded group.

In the Virginia Codes of 1819, 1849, and 1860 the general system of handling the poor through overseers, places of general reception for the poor, county infirmaries, workhouses, and poorhouses continued with slight changes.

SEPARATION FROM VIRGINIA

West Virginia was separated from Virginia in 1861 and admitted to the Union as a State in June of 1863. In the first code of 1868 [16] we find substantially the same method of poor relief set up for the new State as obtained in Virginia at the time of the separation. A board of supervisors for each county of the new State supplanted the Virginia system of boards of overseers of the poor (supervisors in West Virginia later became known as commissioners of the county court). The poorhouse was retained—which detail has not yet been abolished by law. A manager was in charge.

The act further provided that the relations of a pauper, who are of sufficient ability, shall be liable to support such pauper in manner as approved by the board of supervisors of the county in which the pauper may be and pay the expenses of burial when the pauper dies. The order of liability: First, the father; second, if there be no father, or if he be of insufficient ability, then to the children; third, if there be neither father or children or if they be of insufficient ability, then to the mother; fourth, the other relatives—but no relation is compelled to receive any such pauper in his own house against his consent.

This idea of the liability of the relations of a pauper for his support was apparently gotten from the statutes of New York and Massachusetts.

As in the Virginia act taken for its model, there was authorized voluntary application for assistance by any person unable to maintain himself or by or on behalf of the family of any person unable to maintain it, if such applicant had a legal settlement in the county and such person could be kept at the place of general reception, or at the county infirmary, with authority requiring those kept at the place of general reception to work at reasonable and moderate labor. The proceeds of such labor were to be appropriated for the benefit of the poor. Also there was authority to assist the involuntary needy.

In the amended code of 1884,[17] the overseer system is continued, but the county court was substituted as the supervising body. The term "poorhouse" was dropped from the law and in its place there was established a place of general reception for the poor; also a county infirmary, workhouse, and other improvements necessary to the use and benefit of the poor. The law for the first time contained a provision to the effect that the county court may purchase land for the use of the poor, sell and convey land heretofore or hereafter acquired for that purpose, and may acquire stock and instruments of husbandry on any of said lands. The liability of relations of a pauper for his support was retained and in general it may be said that the act found in the amended code of 1884 was changed little from that contained in the code of 1868.

The Code of 1906 [18] also contains a provision first found in the act of 1901 [19] providing for the burial of indigent soldiers and sailors who have "served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Rebellion, the War with Spain or Philippines or any ex-Confederate soldiers, who shall hereafter die without leaving sufficient means to defray his funeral expenses, but such expenses shall in no case exceed $35."

The Code of 1913 [20] contains the poor law substantially as it is contained in the amended Code of 1884. There is a provision that the overseer of the district may furnish antitoxin to or cause to be vaccinated with proper vaccine matter any person in such district who is unable to pay for the same.

The supplement to the Code of 1918 [21] contains few changes in the poor law. Among others, the county court was authorized in its discretion to "pay for hospital service rendered not more than 1 year previously within the State of West Virginia to poor persons resident or found in the county, and for medical, surgical, or institutional treatment given to such persons within this State."

PENSION LAWS

There are also contained in the 1918 supplement two pension laws passed in the regular session of the legislature in 1917: These are the provisions for paying pensions to firemen [22] and the mothers' pensions.[23] Applications for relief might be filed under the mothers' pension law if the husband is dead, or if he has become permanently incapacitated for work by physical or mental disability, or is confined in some West Virginia institution, or if she has been abandoned, or she is the mother of two or more children under the age of 13 years; the application must be investigated by the county court; on such application, summons is to issue and a hearing is had in open court and, if the application is sustained on the hearing, the county court is authorized to enter an order paying the mother of said children on whose behalf the application is filed an amount of money to enable the mother properly to care for the child, not exceeding $15 per month, when such mother has two children under the age of 13 years and, if there are more than two children under such age, the relief granted is not to exceed $5 per month for each additional child but, in no event shall relief granted on such application exceed the sum of $25 per month; when any child shall arrive at the age of 13 years, the relief for such child is to cease unless such child be ill or incapacitated for work, in which case, during such illness or incapacity, relief is to continue until the child is 16 years of age.

The act is further weighted with conditions of relief, among others, that satisfactory reports must be given by the teacher in the district school stating that the children of the recipient are attending school—if they are of age and physically able to do so. The children must live with the mother; the court must find that it is for the welfare of the children to remain with the mother; and relief must be necessary to save the child from neglect; but, if the mother is the owner of real estate or personal property other than household goods, or receives benefits from the workmen's compensation fund, she shall not receive relief.

Barnes' Code of 1923 contains a few amendments. A new chapter was added,[24] relating to delinquent and dependent children. In 1929 the legislature also authorized child welfare boards.[25]

The Code of 1932 [26] liberalizes the law with respect to treatment of diseased persons who were to be sent to the hospitals at the expense of the county. Article 2, chapter 9, revises the previous legislation and codifies the law as to mothers' benefits and there is established in the State, in article 3, a public declaration of policy as to the care and relief of aged persons, and providing for old-age pensions in an amount not to exceed $1 per day.

PUBLIC-WELFARE LAW OF 1936

The public-welfare law was enacted by the Legislature of West Virginia in 1936, patterned after the existing Federal model. Amendments have been passed in 1937 and 1939.[27] The State accepts appropriations of money authorized by Congress from the Federal Treasury for such purposes. The act repeals some of the former relief laws, but the State retains the poorhouse. The law is administered by and through a State council—called the State Department in the law, a county council, an appeal board, and also in some details by the county courts. The act also authorizes visits to homes of indigent persons by health officers, physicians, and nurses employed by the county, and the use in each county of the State of designated public or private hospitals for the medical and surgical care of indigent persons. Another relief authorized by the act is the development within the State of adult physical rehabilitation for the physically handicapped person, being one who, by reason of physical defect or infirmity, whether congenital or acquired by accident, injury, or disease, is or may be expected to be totally or partially incapacitated for remunerative occupation. The act adopts three classifications found in the Federal social-security law and, under its provisions, if funds are available, public assistance is rendered to the following:

(a) An aged person, also called "indigent," of 65 years, who has been a resident of West Virginia for at least 1 year immediately preceding application for assistance, who has not made an assignment or transfer of property, who is not in need of continuing institutional care because of physical or mental condition, who is not an inmate of a public institution, and who is actually in need and has not sufficient income or other resources to provide a subsistence compatible with decency and health. The limit of relief is $30 per month per person.

(b) A blind person with disqualifying blind defect sufficient to incapacitate him for self-support, who has attained the age of 21 years, and with substantially the same residence and other qualifications as set forth for indigent aged persons. The limit of relief is $30 per month per person.

(c) A dependent child, who has not attained the age of 16 years, who has resided in the State 1 year, or who was born within the State within 1 year preceding application, and who is deprived of parental support or care by reason of death, continued absence from home, or physical or mental incapacity of a parent, and who lives with named relatives in a place of residence maintained by such relative as his own home, according to required standards of care and health. Limit of relief is $18 per month, and if more than one child in the same family, $12 per month for each additional child after the first.

The methods of securing public assistance require written application to be made to the county director of the county of residence, with investigation to be made by the county director of the application, and approvals of application to be made by the county council and State department.

If the application for relief is denied, there may be appeals to the board of review provided in the act. The law also permits complaints by citizens and provisions for hearing on such complaints against the grant or continuance of the grant, with attendant appeal.

Aged persons and blind persons with real or personal property (less certain exempted amounts) are required to acknowledge a lien thereon (also characterized as an "agreement to reimburse") for the benefit of the State as a condition before assistance is granted. Such lien is to be recorded in the county where the property is situate, and upon reimbursement to the State of the amount of assistance awarded, a release is to be executed by the State; such person must also assign as security to the State Department any life insurance policy, carrying State benefit.

Relief may also be awarded to indigent persons found to be (a) public charges, or in danger of becoming such; (b) in need of continuing institutional care because of physical or mental condition; or (c) in need of medical or surgical care whether in an institution or in his own house, if such indigent person is actually a resident of the county, and has resided in the State for 1 year next preceding the application; and where funds are specifically made available for such purpose, the State may extend the authority of a county council to grant general relief to persons who have not been residents of the State for 1 year.

Existing county infirmaries are authorized to be maintained if the county court so decides. While the county court manages and controls such institutions, admission thereto is by order of the county council. Persons who are admitted to the infirmaries may be required to perform certain duties and labor, but only to the extent reasonably permitted by their physical and mental condition.

The public-welfare law has one section [28] which created the office of the State veterans' service officer. He must be a citizen of this State, entitled to vote, and a veteran of the World War. His duties relate to veterans honorably discharged from the armed forces of the United States of America, and he is charged with the duties of rendering assistance to all such honorably discharged veterans in properly presenting their claims before the Veterans' Administration of the United States or before any bureaus or departments of the Federal Government, the State of West Virginia, or any of the several States of the United States, when the claims arise out of service with such armed forces; in addition, he must keep in touch with all veterans' organizations engaged in the State in welfare and relief work and render to veterans and their families within the State all possible assistance and furnish information on compensation, insurance, rehabilitation, hospitalization, and allowances provided by the United States Government, the State of West Virginia, and by any other State, and also make careful inquiry into all claims presented for payment to the State treasurer from any appropriation hereafter made for the relief of sick, disabled, or indigent soldiers, sailors, or marines residing in this State, who served in the armed forces of the United States; in other words, the duties of such officer can be summarized as those of an information bureau.

Public assistance rendered is not subject to taxes except sales taxes; neither can it be levied upon by execution, garnishment, or other legal process.

The recipient of public assistance or of general relief is not now to be deemed a pauper. Thus, the new law differs fundamentally from the idea that had prevailed since about 1601.

The county court still has jurisdiction in all matters relating to apprentices, though compulsory apprenticeship is in part abolished, except as provided in the State institutional laws. This, however, does not permit, as formerly, the apprenticeship of a person merely because he is poor.

The minute particulars of the acts governing the care of the poor are omitted, so as to emphasize the theories underlying them. Current legislation is examined in some detail.

It is trite to observe that legislation must be fitted to the special problem involved and not the problem to the legislation. Implicit in any effective legislation dealing with the complex and continuing difficulties of human want and misery is a profounder knowledge and understanding of the subject by the legislators than has been exhibited heretofore. Causes are elusive and changing; what seems certain in one decade is uncertain in the succeeding. Decay and obsolescence occur in law as they do in corporeal things. At the time of Queen Elizabeth, the means of livelihood had been expropriated, dispossessing thousands literally of the right to live except they might exist upon the harsh and brutalizing terms of the acts of Parliament. The first effort in Virginia failed because too much dependence was placed upon human nature. The acts of Virginia and West Virginia were simply a panacea to meet a not very pressing situation.

The last 10 years have seen the emergence of new forces directly and positively augmenting the number of the poor, the indigent, and the unemployed, and also causing disturbance in the vast fringe of persons not yet quite poor, nor 65 years of age, nor quite blind enough, or too old to be a dependent child, but who, as well as the poor, the blind, and dependent children covered by the law, stand always in the deepening and lengthening shadows of the threat of the loss of a livelihood or of becoming burdens. When the United States was generally agricultural, the mass of the population was tied closely to the soil. The shop and factory worker was the exception. Poverty was isolated and could be ascribed either to strictly local conditions, to individual unfitness to earn a livelihood—not for the want of opportunity—or to the adventitious circumstances of sudden calamity such as flood or fire and the like. The poor were negligible in number. A single county poorhouse or farm with moderate aid from the county authorities sufficed to meet the situation. The able-bodied could always make a living. The movement from farm to factory and city accelerated rapidly since the World War. More rapidly our civilization became engulfed by advances in chemical knowledge, swift-paced machines, and mechanical economy. Agricultural production, transformed by mechanical aids, tended to center in areas greatly removed from the markets for products of the farm. The numerous small farms which but a few generations ago supported a teeming farm population have been abandoned as general farms. A man divorced from the soil, to live, must have a job, which is linked inevitably to a machine. He is a sort of migrant from job to job, from machine to machine, or from period of work to period of work; there is a normal unemployment in prosperous times, but with each depression, the unemployed are numbered by the dozen millions. In a sense, this produces a new kind of poverty and destitution in which individual unfitness to work is a small factor. A new economic despotism emerges, the results of which are evident but the causes are obscure and complicated. A proportion of those able to work are excommunicants from the means of livelihood as a normal phenomenon. Our economy has ceased to be a composite of local groups but one of undefined limits spreading over vast areas of the earth. Mankind is not accustomed to this new economy; suddenly transplanted from an agricultural stage of small units and local markets to a vast and complex organization of hundreds of millions of persons, the forces making for dislocations are not objective though the effects are all too evident. The individual is helpless and only can blink impotently at the inevitability of idleness and poverty.

Past legislative panacea is not apt. Apparently there are no historical guides. In the swift and overwhelming emergencies, the remedies are necessarily blundering. We have heard the continual wailings of poverty in the midst of plenty with the inference that the remedy is the easy one of legislative fiat.

Production is good and distribution is poor. Too many people live in an era of too few jobs. The Government tries its hand and people think of the Government in the usual anthropomorphic sense with an added touch of deity—an Uncle Sam—a great white father. The N. R. A. is the Government's attempt to put the wild and unpredictable economic forces into some sort of control; it ends in a debacle of confusion worse confounded with a gigantic mountain of uncoordinated edicts of code administrators and their subordinates, a vast administrative bureaucracy, neither spinning nor toiling, but parasitic upon those who produce; and, not least, the discovery that the Government is composed of men and they with what approached autocratic powers could not bring the economic forces into control.

The solution of the problem of distribution has been attempted through taxation. The idea is to skim off a part of the profits of production and to redistribute it in direct relief and in work-relief projects such as W. P. A. It is hardly necessary to point out that this does not solve the problem. It is only an expedient. It is wasteful in administration, inescapably political in practice, and serves but to intensify the conditions in business which called it forth. With every fresh tax demand, business will redouble its efforts in economy of operations which means greater unemployment.

Conditions in the last 10 years have produced an apprehension in the minds of millions. The unemployed touch every family and the debilitating psychology of an able-bodied man out of work contagiously affects those still with employment but fearful of its loss.

The man out of work is not one man but millions. And the man nearly out of work exceeds him in numbers. When the bulk of the Nation lived and worked on the farm, there was a feeling of security. The single, dominant thought of a majority of the Nation now is security. The crack-brained utopian schemes are really conspicuous by their small numbers considering the fertile soil in which they have to flourish.

The problem of the poor today has been submerged in the greater problem of the unemployed which crosses all State lines, making the efforts of a single State, uncoordinated with those of others, futile.

Legislation is not the answer until the objectives of legislation are more fully understood. The history of poor relief is not of much moment in the present crisis. The remedy, it seems, lies in a new appraisement of the situation, having regard and respect for the accompanying changes in conditions and philosophies, which will require scientific—not political—methods applied to a practical problem.

And, in the meantime, relief will go on.

POEM BY F. RAY PHILLIPS

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by F. Ray Phillips, which was published in the Wilmington (Del.) Suburban News of May 29, 1941:

COMIN' HOME FROM CAMP

(By F. Ray Phillips, May 27, 1941)

Of course my hands are tremblin'
An' I know my eyes are damp;
We got a letter from our boy—
He's comin' home from camp!

Perhaps it does look foolish
T' be makin' such a fuss,
But when the boy is comin' home,
It's a great event for us.

Sure, it is a trifle hard
For you t' understand
The tears a-glistenin' in my eyes
An' th' tremblin' of my hand.

Well, mister, that's a sign o' pride
An' in my heart there's joy
T' think that soon we'll welcome
Home our soldier boy.

Oh, yes, his visit will be short;
'Bout three, four days I'd say,
But remember, now he's workin'
Fr' th' good ol' U. S. A.

Yes, sir, he' jus' a private,
One of thousands in th' ranks
But they're th' boys, my friends, I'd say
On whom this country banks.

Why, every time I see him,
My chest jus' swells with pride;
An' I feel that I'm important
When I'm walking by his side.

Of course, it was a trifle tough
T' see him go away,
An' our thoughts are always of him
Every hour of th' day.

Th' mornin' that he left us,
We stood there, side by side,
His mother an' th' rest of us
A-grievin' deep inside.

No longer is he just our boy;
We've shared him since that day
With th' greatest country on God's earth,
Th' good ol' U. S. A.

An' every night before we sleep
We say a silent prayer
For him to our Almighty God
An' place him in His care.

So, mister, that's th' way it is;
There's sorrow an' there's joy
In th' hearts of every parent
When they have a soldier boy.

An' that is why I'm tremblin'
An' why my eyes are damp;
I'm jus' chock full o' joy, sir,
He's coming home from camp!

Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] over the Washington Evening Star Forum on Monday, June 9, 1941. The subject of the address is, Strikes in Defense Industries.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The greatest danger to the United States tonight is not from without, but from within. That danger is the increasing number of strikes in industries where materials vitally necessary to our national defense are to be manufactured.

In the face of the tragic events in Europe, Africa, and Asia, and considering the possible consequences of these events upon our country, it is imperative that we find a solution for the strike menace now. The time for words has passed. The time for action has come.

Combined reports of the War, Navy, and other Government departments show that there were more persons on strike in plants making equipment for our national defense during last week than at any previous time since our defense preparations began.

President Roosevelt recently said, "Never before since Jamestown and Plymouth Rock has our American civilization been in such danger as now." In the light of this warning it seems unbelievable that strikes in essential defense industries, instead of decreasing, are constantly increasing both in number and extent.

This condition cannot longer be tolerated by either the Government or by the people of the United States. It is our No. 1 problem.

Neither can we forget that the United States is formally pledged by law to furnish all aid to Britain, short of war. Billions of American dollars have been appropriated to provide this aid, in weapons, munitions, and equipment.

It was but a few days ago that there was much debate in and out of our Government over whether or not the United States Navy should actually convoy ships to England. Many in our country favored this course, in spite of President Roosevelt's statement that "convoys mean shooting and shooting means war."

However, I believe that even if we did convoy and by that means succeeded in taking every shipload of war equipment safely to the British, that convoying would not have prevented the loss of as much material for Britain as had already been lost through production failures due to strikes.

In short, more goods would likely reach the British without convoys if strikes were entirely eliminated here, than would reach England with convoys, but with strikes continuing.

Likewise, consider that taking more goods to Britain by the convoy method would involve this country in war, whereas getting more goods to Britain through the elimination of strikes in the United States would accomplish the same results and not involve us in war at all.

It seems clear to me, therefore, that all steps urged upon our Government which will likely involve us in actual war are out of place until we do all we can to prepare ourselves and to aid Britain through measures short of war.

Now let me show you how very much we could do for our national defense, or for the aid of the British, without our involvement in war, by successfully solving the strike problem.

From January 1 to June 1 this year, strikes in plants making materials for national defense have resulted in the loss of approximately 4,000,000 man-days of work.

Do you know that in 4,000,000 man-days it is possible to build 1,400 medium bombing planes—planes weighing 15 tons each, and each capable of carrying 3 tons of bombs? Think what 1,400 of these powerful weapons of the air would mean to our national defense, if we had them today. And consider, too, what these 1,400 bombers would have meant to Great Britain either at home, or in Greece, or in Asia and Africa.

In these lost 4,000,000 man-days we could build 4,100 modern pursuit fighter planes. Think what these planes would mean to our national defense if we had them now, and what they would have meant in Britain, or in Crete.

To show you what else might have been done with these lost 4,000,000 man-days resulting from strikes, let me tell you that in that time we could have built 425 flying fortresses, those gigantic ships, those dreadnaughts of the skies, that have a cruising range sufficient to fly all the way across the ocean and back, and capable of carrying tons and tons of bombs. These flying fortresses are recognized by all as the very finest defensive and offensive weapons that any nation can possess.

We all know that our lack of adequate defense at home is dangerous as is our failure to supply the British with more weapons. Delay in accomplishing these objectives but prolongs the struggle and lengthens tragically the casualty lists. Moreover, such delays actually invite aggression, actually make attack upon our country more probable.

Remember, too, there are hundreds of thousands of young men in the military training camps of this country, men who but a few months ago in the shop and the foundry, in the countinghouse and on the farm, were following the pursuits of peace. From such work they were taken upon the order of our Government, told to give up their work, to leave their families and homes regardless of the sacrifice involved, and train for a year in a military camp at subsistence and pay beginning at $21 a month. They were told this was necessary because a great crisis confronted us—that the Nation's safety was imperiled. They were told they must master the use of new arms and weapons in order to defend America, and must do this quickly, without the slightest delay.

I wonder what these drafted men think of that now as they read daily of the increasing number of strikes in plants supposed to manufacture the weapons they await. What must they think as month after month passes and they still do not receive the planes, the antiaircraft guns, the artillery, the machine guns, the tanks, and the other equipment with which they must familiarize themselves? Much of this equipment they might have had and learned to use by now if 4,000,000 man-days had not been lost through strikes in 1941.

The soldiers, too, have heard that "Never before since Jamestown and Plymouth Rock has our American civilization been in such danger as now."

What must these soldiers think of a Government which takes them from their homes and work, compels them to go to camps in order to train with modern weapons, and then sits idly by while those who have not been drafted strike and stop the flow of weapons, without which weapons the sacrifice of the drafted man counts for nothing?

Undoubtedly they think exactly what you and I think about it. I am advised that it is the foremost topic of conversation throughout the training camps of the United States.

And who are these drafted men, these hundreds of thousands of young Americans who are now wearing the Nation's uniform? Are they not the sons, the brothers, and the husbands of the great masses of working people of this country?

While these strikes continue and spread, the faith—the morale—of soldier and civilian alike sinks lower and lower.

Morale is a thing of the spirit. Its very essence in faith. With the soldier it is the confidence that his government will support him; that it will leave nothing undone to see that he is supplied with everything necessary to make him effective, particularly when the Nation's safety is in danger. Without the highest morale, which stems from a faith in his government, the soldier's effectiveness as a fighting man is seriously impaired.

Consequently strikes are a double menace. First, they prevent the fighting forces from receiving the equipment they must have to defend themselves and the Nation; second, by so doing, the morale of the fighting forces and civilians alike is constantly lowered.

Then, too, it has been shown that many of these strikes have been forced upon the workers of the Nation by small cliques, well-organized and often operating by strong-arm methods. These small groups have not hesitated in cases to threaten, terrorize, and coerce the workers. I am unalterably convinced that the strikes in the United States, for the most part, are opposed by the overwhelming mass of the workers themselves. I am sure that the great mass of those in industrial establishments, employees and employers, are just as patriotic and just as willing to sacrifice, in this hour of national danger, as any other group of our people.

It is because of these circumstances that there is a rising tide of resentment throughout the Nation, against the increasing industrial stoppages. Everyone is demanding that the Federal Government take firm action. In the press, on the air, in the voice of the man in the street, we hear it again and again. They are saying:

"It is not right for the Federal Government to exercise its power to compel young men to leave their firesides to serve a full year in our Army camps and perhaps eventually to give their lives in defense of this Nation on some bloody battlefield; and at the same time for the Federal Government to fail to exercise its power to so regulate industrial relations as to make sure our fighting men shall have the arms and munitions which they must have quickly to defend America in her present hour of deadly peril."

Yet, in the face of strike after strike, the Federal Government has sat supinely by, applying a little salve here and there, asserting that the strike menace was not serious, while more and more valuable time is wasted, less and less munitions are produced, and essential equipment remains "on order."

I believe that this industrial unrest is in part caused by our one-sided labor policy, by the Government's tacit approval of the sit-down strikes, and of governmental coddling of communistic labor agitators during recent years. Quite often the Labor Act, as administered, is more of an aid to the professional agitator than it is to the laboring man. It has served in many cases as a vehicle for subversive elements to stir up disputes and unrest. It has proven in many cases as unfair to those it was supposed to favor as it has to the great mass of citizens who are indirectly affected by it.

This was abundantly proven by the exposure of the brazen labor-election frauds at one plant in the Middle West, the output of which was extremely vital to the entire national-defense program. Here was a strike forced against the wishes of the majority of the men in the plant, which closed down operations for more than 2 months.

Even if there were no present national emergency it would be a good thing for the employer, the employee, and the general public if the Labor Relations Act were overhauled and its defects corrected.

But whether this is done or not, ways and means must be found to remedy our growing industrial sickness, to insure the settlement of disputes between employer and employee, without resort to strikes, so long as the safety of this Nation is threatened by involvement in a devastating war.

Who knows? Upon the success of our whole national-defense effort may well depend not only the future of our own country but of the entire world And the heart and soul of our defense effort consists primarily in the production of arms, munitions, and equipment for our Army, Navy, and merchant marine, and for the British, at the earliest possible moment.

In the face of that situation, strikes in essential defense industries are luxuries which we cannot now afford. We must set up definite machinery which will settle disputes without strikes, so long as our Nation is in danger, so that products may continue to flow from our defense industries in the national interest.

And, as stated, so long as this Government, through the medium of the Draft Act, takes men from their good positions and their homes and compels them to serve a year in training camps, on mere subsistence and $21 a month, in the national interest, that same Government, if it means to give these men the full measure of support, must insist that industrial disputes be settled without resort to strikes.

In applying such a remedy, no essential right which labor now has need be taken away. Labor would retain its right to collective bargaining through representatives of its own choosing, to present to the employer its grievances, which should be reduced to writing. The employer should be required to answer, and both the complaint and the answer should be given to the public.

Finally, if it is impossible for employer and employee to agree, the matter should be referred to a board on which labor has a representative, the employer has a representative, and the public has a representative. A decision of the majority of the three should be final and binding on employer and employee alike. In other words, the public would make the decision by being the third member of the board. If the employer failed to accept this verdict he should be severely penalized and if labor failed to accept the verdict it should be severely penalized, too.

This is but an outline of the plan which I feel sure could speedily be whipped into shape. Or, if a better plan can be devised to end strikes, then let us have that plan instead.

The point is that strikes must end, that labor disputes must be settled by arbitration, that the Nation's welfare comes first, that the drafted men in the training camps shall not be let down, that the American Nation shall be put in a state of complete national defense at the earliest possible moment. To these ends, each man, employer and employee, farmer and urban dweller, rich and poor, high and low, must contribute his share. Such sacrifices are in the interest of the general welfare and are part of the obligation we all owe our Government as citizens.

I do not believe, certainly as an initial step, that it is necessary for the Government to take over the industrial plants, in order to eradicate the strike difficulty. I do not believe they should be taken over unless the employer has been in the wrong. The taking over of industrial plants is exactly what the Communists and the totalitarians want the Government to do. That is one of the primary objectives of the Communist Party, a fundamental tenet of its political philosophy. Communists and totalitarians are promoting these strikes, trying to obtain during this emergency what they were unable to secure in more normal times. We should not fall into the trap they are setting for us.

In sum, the American people want their Government to set up fair and equitable machinery for the settlement of industrial disputes and the outlawry of strikes in plants making defense equipment during the present emergency. They are entitled to have it.

Who knows? Unless we can meet this challenge, unless we can keep these plants open and in constant production of defense materials, unless we can achieve total national defense at the earliest possible moment, it may mean the difference between keeping and losing our American way of life, between keeping and losing a government of, by, and for the people, between keeping and losing the precious privilege of being a citizen of our beloved country.

We have seen this very lesson brought home during recent months on many a bloody battlefield. We have seen great cities, world-famed monuments and buildings, representing hundreds of years of work by man, reduced to a shambles in a few hours. In Europe we have learned of the death of tens of thousands of men, women, and children, too. Why? Because, before war came, such countries failed to put themselves in a state of adequate defense. Now their portion is blood and tears, toil and sweat.

Over there, no less than here, men talked continually of their rights and privileges and failed to think at all of their duties and responsibilities. Thinking thus and acting thus, they lost everything. Today they have neither privileges nor responsibilities. They are but slaves—men, women, and children—broken, disillusioned, hungry, and without hope.

This country must not walk that road. We must not embrace these tragic mistakes which have been the downfall of great nations. In this country we must prepare completely and quickly. Strikes must end. America must live.

Delaware in Parade of States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. TUNNELL, OF DELAWARE

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent address delivered by the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL], which was broadcast from Station WINX last night, the subject of the address being Delaware in Parade of States.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A certain amount of pride in our State is not only pardonable but commendable. Our first settlement was at Lewes in 1631. Delaware was one of the Thirteen Original Colonies. Our climate and our soil give the advantage to our State of aiding in feeding the cities of the Atlantic seaboard. The soil is kind and responds to all efforts to improve it. The climate is temperate and shows the tempering effect of the Gulf stream. Because of these favorable conditions, the value of agricultural products in Delaware is as follows: $1,716,000 per year from vegetables; $2,685,000 per year from corn; $2,563,000 per year from meat animals; $2,500,000 per year from milk; $2,000,000 per year from commercial fruit; $22,000,000 to $25,000,000 per year from broilers; $378,000 per year from turkeys. But the State is strong in manufactured articles also. The great industrial activity in the north end of Delaware has developed the city of Wilmington. Its industrial activities are second to no city of its size in the Nation. Manufacturing interests are spreading to all parts of the State. The immense Nylon plant of the Du Pont Co. at Seaford is one of the outstanding sources of employment in the south end of the State. The large amount of standing timber and the mills and factories using lumber is a revelation to those who are not familiar with the State's resources.

Delaware is fortunate in having the whole of its east side with a navigable water front. The Chesapeake Bay is not far to the westward and the Nanticoke and other rivers draining into the Chesapeake Bay furnish the west side of the State with water communication. Delaware has a road system unsurpassed in the United States. It is said that no home in Delaware is more than 4 miles from an improved road. Every town in the State is reached by an improved modern road. We have, first, the Du Pont Road, reaching from Pennsylvania to the Maryland line. At Dover a connection of this road runs down the west side of the State to the Maryland line. Our fine school buildings and unexcelled teaching force are attracting the attention of the Nation to our educational facilities. School transportation over good roads for those who are at all distant from the school buildings is furnished by the State. The University of Delaware, by location, equipment, and tradition, stands as one of the leading schools of the Nation. The religious tendency of our people is attested by such shrines as Old Swedes Church in Wilmington, Old Drawyers near Odessa, Barretts Chapel near Frederica, and Old Blackwater in Sussex County. The fine condition of these churches is a memorial to a past generation's religious tendencies and stands as an explanation of the State's present religious faithfulness. The boundary disputes of Delaware which have affected its lines on all sides have been practically settled, after 200 years of disturbances.

Though Delaware is small, it has produced some of the greatest men of the Nation. The Claytons, Bayards, Saulsburys, Grays, and Du Ponts have made enviable reputations as national figures. Five Bayards have occupied seats in the United States Senate. The smallness of the State has caused it at times to become a temptation to political pirates, and to those who desire to experiment with various reforms.

Our State was one of the first to adopt the honor system in its penal code. A combination of mercy and intelligence has characterized Delaware's treatment of her criminals. This system has attracted favorable comment nationally and has been widely followed in other States.

Our forests of pine and oak add greatly to the wealth of the Nation. Our nurseries are among the largest in the world.

Our summer resorts along the Delaware River, Bay, and the Atlantic Ocean are largely patronized not alone by Delawareans but by people from all over the East.

Our banking system stood out as a model of efficiency and solidarity during the great banking crisis of 1933 and 1934.

There is in the Nation no more loyal State than Delaware. Communism, nazi-ism, and fascism do not develop in Delaware's intellectual soil. Here no pressure arises for a change in national leadership, except in the American way. No strikes to delay American defense arise in Delaware. American-born and foreign-born, Jew and gentile, men of all religious beliefs are amalgamated into one common wealth, one indivisible unit in a united country; one white star in a field of blue. In Delaware, political differences do not lead to national disloyalty. All lines of thought lead to governmental unity.

We Delawareans realize that comparisons are odious, but to those of us who owe our allegiance to the Diamond State, its birds sing more enchantingly, the aroma from its gardens and orchards is more alluring, its sun shines more brightly, its home fires burn more harmoniously, its hospitality calls more invitingly, and its patriotism stands more rigidly. First to adopt the Constitution, it shall be the last to infringe upon constitutional limitations. May the God of life and happiness, of peace and prosperity, of virtue and learning, bless our Delaware.

Who Says It Can't Be Done?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY DAVID LILIENTHAL

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by David E. Lilienthal, Director of the Tennessee Valley Authority, before the Rotary Club at Knoxville, Tenn., on May 27, 1941, and broadcast over several radio stations. The subject of the address is, Who Says It Can't Be Done?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Eight years ago T. V. A. started building dams on the Tennessee River. A big cry went up that the dams were a waste, that there was too much electricity, there was a surplus, there couldn't possibly be a shortage of power. Right down the years these fears of timid men that there would be too much electricity has held back T. V. A. and held back this valley, held back the whole country's power supply.

Today we are in the midst of a crisis in the defense program. The timidity, the counsel of the scared minds that held back T. V. A., is now putting the brakes on our national defense. The country wants to go full speed ahead. The country has turned over its boys for military service. The country has appropriated billions and billions of dollars, and yet every candid person will agree with the statements we have heard in the last few days, that the program of defense production is not in high gear. It is not in high gear because we haven't yet been permitted to use to the utmost and without stint the glorious strength that God Almighty gave to the United States of America.

A few months ago we were told not to worry about production—that there was plenty of capacity for steel, that there would be no aluminum shortage, that there would be no power shortage. Yet everybody knows that there are shortages. And you, my neighbors here in the Tennessee Valley, are facing this fact in a dramatic, personal way. For you have just been asked to cut down on uses of electricity in order to keep the aluminum plants operating at full capacity. And other regions are going to be rationing power before long.

Why in the name of common sense should there be shortages—shortages in a country that hasn't yet begun to do the production job it must do to survive and to win? The ugly fact is that we are trying to defend these shores with our right hand tied behind us, and it is time we talked plainly and to the point about it. The only thing on which we have had full production is the utterance of generalities about democracy. Most of us over America are fed up with being hog-tied; most of us want to do this, the biggest job we've ever faced, with both fists flying.

Who says this big job can't be done? Who says so? Why in heaven's name does the United States of America have to have a shortage of aluminum, we who can and do build aluminum plants where 6 months ago there was a cornfield? Who says we have to have a shortage of power? Not you here, for you have seen Cherokee Dam, not 40 miles from here; you have seen what American engineers can do to produce power in the speed of that record-breaking job. Who says we have to have a steel shortage, when every one of you knows that in the Birmingham district alone there are iron and limestone and skills that can send our capacity way up?

Let's get this straight. There need be no shortages of defense materials—of the materials essential to build the planes, the bombs, and the warships. Let's get this further fact straight, that we do not need to have to choose between guns or electricity. We can have guns and electricity, if we will use our strength, not throttle it in timidity and fear and doubt.

Down here in the Tennessee Valley you have been asked by your Government to save on the use of electricity, so that aluminum production for aircraft may be increased. In that, you will cooperate to the utmost; I know this area well enough to predict that. But the shortages that we now have and the curtailment we are asked to put into effect will be as nothing unless we are permitted to begin at once—at once, without the loss of a day—to use the energy, to use the resources that we have, and use them to the utmost—and the ghastly, insane part of it all is that these shortages are absolutely unnecessary. If we were a poor nation, if we didn't have billions of kilowatt-hours of energy in our streams, if we couldn't produce aluminum in vast and almost limitless quantities, and textiles and coal and coal oil and clothing and shoes, and all the things that are needed, both for our troops and our civilian population—if we were impoverished and had to fight like an invalid nation, that would be one thing. We would make the best of our disabilities. But we are strong, and we do have the resources. We do have the skills, and we are not using them. Think of it; it is almost beyond belief that at this hour of destiny we are not using the strength of our hills and waters and men.

Why? The electric-power situation illustrates what has been happening in one field after another. Electric power in great quantities is absolutely essential to this war in which we are the "arsenal of democracy"—in this war that God alone knows how long we will be able to stay out of. We in the T. V. A. have long been urging that T. V. A. be put to work at top speed.

That fateful month in 1935 that Germany told the world for the first time that a new and mighty army was on the march, T. V. A. was appearing before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. Representing the T. V. A.'s views, I called the committee's notice to the newspaper headlines and made as strong a plea as I could that T. V. A. was greatly needed for defense and that its work should not be slowed up. Three years later when war came to Europe we again pressed home the point that vast quantities of power were needed. For example, on the 29th of February 1940, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, I told an audience of distinguished businessmen of our view that there would be a shortage of power for defense production in 1941 if power supply was not greatly increased at once. I reminded them that it takes at least 18 months to build a power plant and urged immediate action all over the country. The speaker immediately following me, now high in defense matters pertaining to power, insisted that power supply would be adequate. A year ago, when we were almost frantic over the imminent power shortage we finally got action. After delays that were crucial and costly, on August 1 last year we were authorized to begin construction of Cherokee Dam and Watts Bar steam plant. Those plants are far ahead of a difficult schedule. But that block of power was too little, and it was too late.

We will have shortages of power; we will have shortages of aluminum and steel and magnesium and other basic commodities as long as we have a shortage of courage to put American resources to work. Until we fight with both fists, until we refuse to let anyone tie one of our hands behind us, and then tell us we can't do the job, we will have trouble and plenty of trouble.

T. V. A. can't solve the country's problems. We can't even solve the country's power or aluminum problems. But there are some specific production jobs we can do, and we can do them as fast as anyone in the United States. We can produce power, we can produce phosphate, we can produce munitions and for that matter, we are in a position to produce aluminum. We can't speak for others, but for this seasoned corps of 20,000 men and women, with a record behind them, I have a right to ask: Who says it can't be done? Who says this Nation can't have an adequate supply of power for an adequate defense program? Who says we must suffer under shortages? Who says we must choose between guns and electricity?

The time for nibbling cautiously at power supply is long since past. Here is what T. V. A. is ready to do for defense. We are prepared to create a pool of over 15,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity each year—the largest single pool of available energy ever created in the history of mankind—do it on the double-quick, do it on time. We are ready to triple T. V. A.'s power supply. Our engineers have been getting ready, and you can depend on them, depend on this organization to deliver.

And so the T. V. A. is making a specific recommendation: That this seasoned construction force, the most experienced dam-building organization in the world, be set to work on a job that is as big as the need we face. We are proposing and are ready to build a series of 10 new dams—4 on the Hiwassee River, a gigantic dam on the Little Tennessee to be the highest dam in eastern North America, other dams on other rivers, additional steam-plant capacity, completing Kentucky Dam a year ahead of schedule—a program that will add another one and a third million kilowatts to the half million kilowatts of power now rapidly nearing completion, a grand total of nearly 3,000,000 kilowatts. This program would cost a quarter of a billion dollars. That will seem a modest price to pay for the sense of security it will bring—and an end to a feeling that this great country in its hour of grave danger may be without the dire necessities for the defense of its independence.

Now, this program isn't going to save the United States. We don't offer it as anything except a specific program to do a particular job. But if in similar fashion in one industry after another there would be a similar release of the productive abilities, the skills, the organizing capacity of the men and women all over this country, we would give an answer that would rock the world. We would prove that America believes in its destiny, that it holds back nothing. And by this act of faith, we would fortify our people, our people who have given their young men and their dollars to their country, give them a new sense of accomplishment that would build American confidence so it could never be shaken or broken.

Let's put an end to weak and timid talk. Let our battle cry be: It can be done. It can be done.

You can't make up power shortages overnight. It takes not less than 18 months to build any substantial block of power, however you go about it. Even normal rainfall ending this long dry spell will only modify the stringency in the region, it can't suddenly cure it. And so we should ask: What about the immediate future of power supply in the Southeastern United States and the Tennessee Valley? I want to talk to you about that for a few minutes.

First of all, we are speeding our construction schedules and beginning this fall, large new blocks of power will begin to be available—a 50 percent increase in T. V. A.'s total supply in 6 months' time. In the meantime, you have been asked to cooperate in the defense program by conserving electricity for the next few months.

Make no mistake about it, the sacrifices you are asked to make are in the cause of national defense. They are not due to this unprecedented drought. In spite of the drought, the T. V. A. is able to fulfill to the last kilowatt-hour every one of its contracts for continuous power. I want to underline that: The T. V. A. has enough power and will continue to have enough to fulfill every one of its contracts for power to cities and industries and cooperatives and to permit the abundant and increased use of power that T. V. A. symbolizes in this country. T. V. A. could meet every one of these contracts if this drought should continue and make this year as bad a year for water as any in recorded history. For T. V. A.'s sales of year-round power are all based on the amount of power in the river in the worst kind of water shortage ever known. Everything above that is sold only as secondary or dump power.

Why then should you be asked to conserve, why should you be asked to forego unlimited expansion in your power use? The answer can be given in one word, "aluminum." Aluminum production for aircraft is short of needs; it must be expanded, must be kept at 100-percent operation. And aluminum producers, not having a contract right to all the power they need to maintain 100-percent output, must get that power through the voluntary sacrifices of all of us.

In order to secure the very cheapest rate for the vast amounts of electricity required to produce aluminum metal, the companies have contracted with T. V. A. to buy power that is surplus, in other words what is left over when we have filled the needs of our contract users, the cities and cooperatives and industries that buy year-round power.

To operate the present plant of the Aluminum Co. of America at Alcoa on a year-round basis takes 250,000 kilowatts of electricity, takes two and a half times as big a power plant as Norris Dam if it were operating 365 days a year and 24 hours a day. But the Aluminum Co. has a contract with the T. V. A. for only 30,000 kilowatts, and they have 70,000 kilowatts in their own plants on the Little Tennessee. In other words, the Aluminum Co. is short 150,000 kilowatts, for which they have no supply of their own, and no contract with T. V. A.

In ordinary times, they would shut down their factory part of the year if surplus power couldn't be had. This year they cannot shut down; if they do, the fighting-aircraft program all over this country shuts down, too, for there are no piles of aluminum pig metal in reserve. So they came to us for an emergency supply of power, and we have been getting it for them. They have been getting it on a day-to-day basis. We could simply as a matter of legal right, cut them off at this moment. But that is unthinkable: the defense of the country requires that all of us prevent that happening. And it will not happen.

I think you may be interested to know some of the things that are being done to meet this critical situation. I want to emphasize that what is being done is all on a voluntary and cooperative basis. There have been no orders issued. There have been no recriminations and no crying over spilt milk. It does little good except as to the future to point out now that aluminum plants cannot be operated 100 percent of the time unless they have a firm and contracted source of power supply for 100-percent production. The important thing now is to find a way out. Many agencies have been working together on this problem: The Federal Power Commission, through its Chairman, Leland Olds; the Under Secretary of War, Judge Patterson; the Office of Production Management; these agencies have been diligent in seeking to find a way to keep aluminum production going without too great a dislocation of power supply to others.

The Duke Power Co., through its principal officers, has been exceedingly cooperative in devising ways of supplying a block of off-peak power that the Aluminum Co. can use. The T. V. A. has authorized the building under emergency conditions of a major transmission line to Hazard, Ky., so that over this line the American Gas and Electric Co. may be able to transfer off-peak power to the Aluminum Co. The Commonwealth & Southern companies, faced with a serious problem resulting from their defense requirements, are working closely with all the other systems of the region, so that nowhere will there be an idle generator or a wasted kilowatt.

What further needs to be done? How much curtailment of normal uses should be projected at this time? This is a subject that is receiving very careful study by all the power agencies of the entire South. Further details and conclusions will be available soon. T. V. A. does not recommend any sudden, drastic curtailment in the use of electricity. All of us are trying to find additional sources of supply for the Aluminum Co. without taking away from anyone the electricity he needs. Various plans are being weighed—measures that will least dislocate normal civilian life. Some of the plans under study are a change to eastern time in eastern and middle Tennessee, cutting down on ornamental lighting, show-window displays, etc. The recommendations that will soon be made will be based on a study of the facts. At this time all T. V. A. urges is that there be no waste of electricity, that no electricity be used that is not needed for ordinary, normal uses. This is a wise program under any circumstances, for careless waste of electricity, even if it is paid for, is like the waste of anything else that is useful.

There will be many people who will ask, What will we do with all this electricity when the defense needs are over? That is a natural question to ask, and one that requires careful thought and foresight now. But because it presents a problem does not mean that it is a valid reason for hobbling our defense. For if we are not successful in defending this country, neither electricity nor aluminum nor public debt will matter much. Many of you are businessmen. Let me remind you that under the system that is threatening Great Britain and the United States there are no businessmen in the sense that you know. Some of you are ministers of God. Let me remind you that if we are unable to defend these shores there will be no free ministers and no free churches in which to worship. These are not atrocity stories; this is merely the record of a dozen nations where businessmen and churches, as we know those two great institutions of freedom, have vanished from the earth.

Many years ago Walt Whitman used to wander along the Atlantic seaboard celebrating America. In words that ring he told his countrymen of the great strength and vigor and beauty of America. He sang of a stout and powerful land—strong and bragging of its strength. Old Walt shouted to the universe that this was the greatest country ever heard of. That was true then; it is still true. In closing let me read to you from the words of old Walt:

"Long, too long, America.
Traveling roads all even and peaceful, you learn'd from joys and prosperity only,
But now, ah now, to learn from crises of anguish, advancing, grappling with direst fate and recoiling not,
And now to conceive and show to the world what your children en masse really are."

Strikes Against the National Defense

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the stupidity of those labor leaders who compelled the President to send troops in to break up the outlaw strike at the North American Aviation Co. plant at Inglewood, Calif., is incredible. There was, of course, nothing left for the President to do in the face of the defiance of those foolish labor leaders except to send in troops, take over control of the plant, and enable it to resume operations. Not only did this military action and governmental seizure of the plant result from this outlaw strike, but no single incident has done more to arouse the people of the United States and the Members of the Congress to a high pitch of anger against organized labor than this North American Aviation Co. event.

Coming on the heels of the defiant action of the woodworkers in the Northwest, and other unions led by communistic leaders, the California airplane plant situation simply climaxed a series of defiance strikes in key industries, which compelled summary action by the President. Unless the President not only takes such summary action as he did in the case of the North American Aviation Corporation, but sees to it that those striking workmen who had been given deferment from the draft, because of the importance of their work in the national defense, and only because of the importance of their work in the national defense, are put in the Army where they can soldier for $21 a month, the suspicion will continue that the administration was willing for the strikes to reach a point where the President would have to take over private industry for governmental control and operation.

There is no doubt that this incident has raised the whole question of the showdown between the Communists in the C. I. O. and the more conservative leadership.

Many Members of the Congress have been warning ever since the sit-down strikes, led by Richard Frankensteen and others, that the influence of the Communists in the C. I. O. was so strong as to represent a very great potential danger in event the United States had to build a national defense. That potential danger has now become an actual danger, although Frankensteen himself has renounced his old communistic buddies, and is now denouncing his communistic associates of long standing.

It is understood that threats were made recently to Philip Murray, and that those threats are now being renewed, that the leaders of the Communist-dominated unions of the C. I. O. have been agitating formation of a new and independent labor organization, and the secession from the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. of some of the unions controlled by the more radical leaders. The showdown is here. There is no question but that these radical "reds" who are leading the aviation unions, the automobile unions, the woodworkers' unions, and the teamsters' unions into deliberate strikes against the national defense, are traitors to the Nation, are dangerous enemies of the national defense, and should be summarily dealt with. Those leaders who are found to be aliens should at once be deported, and the tender solicitude that has hitherto been displayed by Madam Perkins, Secretary of Labor, for communistic aliens should harden into a firm determination to rid the Nation of these dangerous foreign vermin.

Those radical leaders found to be American citizens deferred from the draft in order that they might earn as much money per day in civilian work as soldiers are paid by the month should have their deferments canceled and they should be put into the Army, where the constituted officers know precisely what to do with recalcitrant gentlemen of the character of Walter Reuther, Wyndham Mortimer, and others of like ilk.

The citizens of America and the Members of Congress are sick and tired of this wave of communistically inspired strikes against the national defense. The administration has long been too lenient with this sort of sabotage of the national defense.

While it may seem unfortunate at the moment, this strike may turn out to have been a good thing for the Nation, and particularly for the workers themselves. It has demonstrated the desperate character, the unpatriotic attitude, and the utterly selfish temperament of these communistic labor leaders.

The ends of justice and national defense will not be served if these radical labor leaders are permitted to so influence their followers as to compel the Government to take over industrial plants and operate them.

The country is tired of labor leaders telling the Nation the workers will not strike in the very hour when the workers are being led into picketing and strikes by their leaders.

Why Must We Finance the Wars of Europe?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 10, 1941]

WHY MUST WE FINANCE THE WARS OF EUROPE?

While World War No. 1 was raging in Europe some of the more emotional American citizens wanted America to get into it.

Other cooler heads—and perhaps colder hearts—felt that American interests would be sacrificed and no benefit gained by war.

Your columnist was one of those who opposed American entry into the war, but after war was declared did his utmost to bring success to our arms.

He advocated conscription as an essential of victory and supported the plans and purposes of the incumbent administration.

However, when the war was over your columnist reverted to his firm conviction that America should keep free from further foreign entanglement, and should not be involved in the intrigue of the League of Nations.

Senator Johnson of California, Senator Borah, of Idaho, Senator Pepper, of Pennsylvania, and other distinguished statesmen and patriots made the campaign against involvement in the League and your columnist gave them journalistic support to the best of his minor ability.

In the course of the campaign against League entanglement the following letter was written to Mr. H. H. Tammen, one of the publishers of the Denver Post.

The Denver Post has reproduced this letter with kindly comment.

The comment and the letter are reprinted in this column with grateful acknowledgment.

"An amazing prevision of the state of the world under the League of Nations covenant and of the perils to the United States in such a world was set down in a letter which the Post publishes herewith—a letter written on March 29, 1919, by William R. Hearst, the newspaper publisher, to the late H. H. Tammen, who was then one of the publishers of the Denver Post.

"In this remarkable forecast of wars to come, written 22 years ago, Mr. Hearst forewarned of the exact situation in which the United States finds itself today, in an eloquent plea against our membership in the League of Nations or our entanglement in any way with the quarrels, greeds, and ambitions of Europe. The letter is commended for thoughtful reading by every American." (The Denver Post, June 8, 1941.)

NEW YORK AMERICAN, March 29, 1919.

MR. H. H. TAMMEN,

The Denver Post.

DEAR MR. TAMMEN: I notice in your Denver Post a cartoon representing Uncle Sam signing the contract of the League of Nations in order to save himself the cost of maintaining a reasonable Military and Naval Establishment. Do you really think we will save more money by getting into this riot of European wars than we will by staying out of them?

Do you really think that we will need a larger Military and Naval Establishment to mind our own business than we would to meddle in all the quarrels and conflicts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia?

We know about what it has cost in the past to stay at home and build up our own country, and we are learning what it costs to be involved in European wars. We ought to be able to make a pretty accurate estimate of which plan is the cheaper and better.

I hope you will give careful consideration to the question of this proposed League of Nations. I do not consider it a league to keep us out of war, but a league to get us into war.

A man does not keep free from the smallpox by going to bed with four other people who have it, and we cannot keep free from war by tying ourselves up with nations like England, France, Italy, and Japan, which have the war disease in its worst form.

If we had four votes to their one, we, the peaceful nation, might keep them out of war; but since they have four votes to our one, they, the warlike nations, will merely put us into war, and, in addition, under the constitution of this League of Nations, allot what part we shall play and what price we shall pay.

Then there is the possibility of unrestricted oriental immigration to this country; the probability of European control of American affairs; the necessity of our people having continually to send our boys abroad to police Europe and Asia and Africa and to participate in all foreign complications and conflicts; the almost certain exhaustion of our country's resources through having to finance all these European nations and their selfish schemes.

All these things seem to me to threaten disaster to our people, who have hitherto fortunately kept free from each and every one of them.

Have we then so much faith in one man's ability and unselfishness that we can believe that all the other great statesmen of our history who warned us against foreign alliances are wrong and he who alone advocates foreign alliances is right?

It seems to me that this League of Nations is at best a very dangerous departure, a speculative experiment, and why should we risk our whole fortune, our national welfare, in a speculative experiment when we do not have to?

We have come to be the greatest and richest Nation in the world through abstention from foreign complications, through nonparticipation in the waste of wars and the enormous expense of military establishments, through minding our own business, and having the time and the freedom to attend to our own business our own way.

Why alter all that? Why change the boat when we are winning the race? Why be as reckless as stupid old Germany, which was winning everything through one policy and changed and lost everything through another policy?

We cannot exaggerate the loss which might come to us. We have had an uninterrupted record of growth in wealth, in population, in territory, in every element of greatness. But that was because of our isolation and because of our exemption from the conquests and disasters to which European nations are periodically subject because of their close contact and interrelations, their hereditary feuds, and hatreds.

Now we are proposing to become a part of this European snarl. We are to become one of this knot of hissing serpents, and we are hoping to change the whole character of this nest of venomous snakes by calling it a sweet name.

To my mind it is just as certain as sunrise that there will be not only the small wars in which we are called upon by the constitution of the League of Nations to participate, and which we will certainly have to finance, because the other nations are broke and cannot finance them, but there will inevitably be a great war, and by far the greatest war that the world has yet seen.

It will be a war either against the nations of the League or among the nations of the League. In this world war we will be compelled to take part, not as we did in the late war, when we were ready to do so, when we wanted to do so, and when we would decide the struggle between the exhausted antagonists in a few months by the overwhelming force of our unimpaired resources.

We will be compelled in this next great war, as a member of the League of Nations, to take part from the beginning and to endure to the end.

We will not be a voluntary associate. We will be a pledged and plighted ally. We will be an integral part of one or the other group of the belligerents.

We will be inextricably involved, because we shall have voluntarily entangled and enmeshed ourselves not only through the guaranties, but through the various acts of this league of foreign nations.

At the end of the war we will find ourselves not an arbiter, not holding ourselves unscathed and deciding the event at the last moment through our balance of power. We will find ourselves either belonging to the victorious group of belligerents or to the defeated group of belligerents.

If we belong to the victorious group, it will be better, but still bad enough since we have never anything to demand of victory. We will then find ourselves merely exhausted, partly depopulated, and wholly bankrupt, after the manner of the European nations, but with this difference—that we will have no easy mark to draw upon as the European nations have drawn upon us.

But suppose we should be on the side of the losing group. We should then be in the same position that the losing European nations now are—subject to the imposition of crushing indemnities, to the confiscation of our Navy and merchant marine, subject even to dismemberment, with the possibility of our Northern States going to the power that shall have possessed Canada, and of our Southwestern States going to the power that shall occupy Mexico.

Our guardianship of the Western Hemisphere would be ended—our own primacy in the world destroyed for years, and perhaps forever.

Does all this forecast seem extravagant and impossible? Well, it only seems impossible because hitherto we have followed the advice of the wise founders of this Republic, and kept out of the foreign entanglements under which such situations are not only possible but of actual and regular occurrence as the result of every great war.

We have happily been free from such disasters.

Let us keep free from them. Let us maintain the policy which has kept us free from them—our historic policy of no entangling alliances with foreign powers.

Sincerely yours,

W. R. HEARST.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

STATEMENT BY SIDNEY HILLMAN

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Sidney Hillman, Associate Director General, Office of Production Management, concerning the situation at the plant of North American Aviation, Inc., Inglewood, Calif.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When a dispute arose between the management and workers of the North American Aviation, Inc., at Inglewood, Calif., the Labor Division in the Office of Production Management lent its offices to both parties, as it has done in countless other instances, in an attempt to achieve a settlement and thereby avert an interruption of production of vital defense materials. When we became aware that this dispute could not be settled by the parties through routine processes of collective bargaining, we joined in asking that this dispute be certified to the National Defense Mediation Board. However, it soon became apparent that we were dealing not with a genuine labor organization but rather with an irresponsible group which had acquired certain key official positions in local 683 and had embarked upon a course of outrageous defiance. From the first their conduct spelled defiance of the charter under which local 683 operates as an affiliate of the United Automobile Workers of America. It is defiance of the duly constituted and responsible leadership of the United Automobile Workers of America. It is defiance of the duly constituted leadership of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which has cooperated wholeheartedly in the defense program. It is defiance of the National Defense Mediation Board in its sincere effort to insure fair and equitable disposition of the demand of the North American workers for an increase in wages. It is defiance of the President of the United States and the United States Government in their determined effort to build a strong defense for this Nation.

This defiance is a challenge that goes to the roots of the entire democratic system—and the efforts of this democracy to preserve itself. To such a challenge there can be only one answer—and that answer has been given in the form of the Presidential Executive order issued this morning. The best interests of this Nation—the best interests of labor—demand this course.

We are engaged in an all-out defense program to prevent the enslavement of free people and free labor. Workers realize that their survival as free human beings depends upon the victory of democracy. We of the labor division at all times have cooperated with bona fide labor organizations and have striven to safeguard labor's rights in this emergency. The President's statement, accompanying the issuance of his Executive order, specifically preserves these rights. The President said: "Their (workers') fundamental rights as free citizens will be protected by the Government, and negotiations will be conducted through the process of collective bargaining to reach a settlement fair and reasonable to the workers and to the company."

A small band of irresponsibles have arrogantly assumed the right to speak and act for North American workers—workers who are loyal, patriotic, and law-abiding. This small band shall not be permitted to flout and betray the best interests of labor throughout the country. Their action must be regarded as contrary to the welfare and security of the Nation and of labor. I, therefore, follow the President, in joining with the leadership of C. I. O. and the United Automobile Workers, in calling upon the workers of the North American plant to return to their jobs at once. Neither the Government nor responsible labor can or will be expected to tolerate interference with defense production by irresponsible and subversive groups, irrespective of where they may be found.

National Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the American Agriculturist of the issue of June 7, 1941, written by E. R. Eastman, the editor, the subject of the editorial being National Emergency.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Agriculturist of June 7, 1941]

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

(An editorial by E. R. Eastman)

Tuesday evening, May 27, 1941, will be recorded as a critical and perhaps turning point at the cross roads of American and world history. Whether the turn will be for better or for worse is in grave doubt. On that date President Roosevelt, in a world-wide radio speech, reviewed the World War situation. He went the limit for all-out support of Great Britain and other democracies, took on the defense not only of the United States but of all the Western Hemisphere, spoke out boldly for freedom of the seven seas, defied Hitler and other dictators and all their works, and declared an unlimited national emergency.

The speech amounted almost to an undeclared war.

Under this emergency proclamation the President now has practically all the powers of a dictator, and the proclamation is a culmination of the constantly growing amount of power placed in the executive branch of our Government in recent years. Under those powers which the President already has plus those given him under the declared emergency, the Executive controls and, if necessary, can manage practically all of the business and agriculture of America. He can fix prices, restrain competition and free trade, take over American industry for the Government, and prevent all strikes If the President and his associates exercise the power they now have to stop the war between labor and industry and to prevent strikes of a racketeering, radical nature, that at least will be some compensation for the loss of the people's liberties.

Under this new emergency proclamation, the President also has complete control of the radio, and thereby the people have lost ground in the exercise of free speech guaranteed to them by the Bill of Rights. It will be easy to progress, under the excuse of the emergency, from the control of the radio to the control of the press and of public meetings so that the people may hear only one side of the news and of public problems.

There is no doubt that the world faces a great catastrophe, and that danger is fast approaching our own shores. So probably these emergency powers, some of them at least, are necessary. I don't know. I do know that we have been rushed by our leaders toward war faster than a large majority of the American people were willing to go, and I'll always trust a majority of our people before I'll trust any one man or group of men no matter how sincere they may be. I am tremendously worried over the fact that it has seemed necessary on the part of our leaders to provide for the destruction or removal of practically all of our liberties even before we get started to defend them. I would have felt better over the President's declaration of an emergency if at the same time he had promised the people that their rights and liberties would be returned to them when the emergency had passed. He did not. But we, the people, must hereby highly resolve that we will get those liberties back. What else is there to fight for or to live for?

In any case, we must all realize that we are now in a different world, and a sadder one, than we have ever known, a world filled with work and sacrifice and blood and tears. The best any of us can do is, so far as possible, to keep from worrying and to do the job where we are the best we can. The common people of America had no part in this conflict. But farm folks have never been found wanting in other crises, and the President of the United States, and the rest of the Government leaders, can rest assured that we will not be found wanting this time.

What's Back of the Trade Treaties?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE KANSAS CITY (MO.) DAILY DROVER'S TELEGRAM

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the Daily Drover's Telegram, of Kansas City, Mo., under date of June 5, 1941. This paper has been running for many years and is published largely in the interests of livestock men and farmers of this country. The article is entitled "What's Back of the Trade Treaties?":

[From the Kansas City (Mo.) Daily Drover's Telegram of June 5, 1941]

WHAT'S BACK OF THE TRADE TREATIES?

The Constitution of the United States provides that the President may conclude treaties with other countries, with the advice and consent of the United States Senate. Treaties with Argentina and Uruguay are now under consideration by a committee of the Senate through a hearing of interested parties. The findings of the committee will go to the floor of the Senate, with approval or disapproval.

These proposed agreements are known as reciprocal trade treaties, in which one nation swaps the right to send to the other surplus industrial or agricultural products at lowered tariffs. The chief surplus product of Argentina and Uruguay is beef. What those countries desire and insist on having in trade treaties with the United States is tariff concessions that will make this country the permanent market for that surplus. In consideration of which, Argentina and Uruguay will lower the tariffs on our motorcars, refrigerators, or other commodities that are not produced, or underproduced, in those countries.

Nobody in a sane state of mind, knowing that the chief occupation of many Western and Southwestern States of this country is the same as the chief occupation of Argentina and Uruguay—the production of cattle for beef—can say that the proposed treaties are not unfair, inconsiderate, and hazardous to the trans-Mississippi population and thereby to the well-being of the Nation. Why, then, should the Department of State propose such a provision and why should the Senate of the United States give its consent? Can the State Department, the President, and the Senate be ignorant as to the vital character of such a swap on the economics of the great West?

That isn't likely, but the "solidarity" of the Western Hemisphere through mutual trade agreements is considered of greater importance than the well-being of this or that section of the United States. To act in concert economically is the basis if not guaranty of cooperation politically and militaristically.

Such is the program, the injustice of which is that economic sufficiency for various Latin nations of South America is to be promoted and secured at the expense of economic disaster for western United States.

If such solidarity is to be purchasable only in such a manner, it were better that the United States Government purchase the surplus beef of the nations that can't be handled otherwise and dump it in the Atlantic Ocean.

Let's turn this proposal around and see what happens. Let's say that Argentina and Uruguay are industrial nations and seek a market in the United States for their surplus refrigerators and motorcars. The first voice to be raised against the import into the United States of those industrial products would be the labor unions.

But what voice is raised by labor unions against the import of beef and its ruinous effect on the chief industry of the Great West? If these treaties are effected to admit beef in payment for hemispheric solidarity, this cattle country will buy fewer industrial products, so that whether we import motorcars or beef, the labor unions would suffer along with the cattlemen.

Some Clarifications

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

TRANSLATION FROM IL PROGRESSO

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following translation of an article published by Il Progresso on May 25, 1941:

[Translation from Il Progresso of May 25, 1941]

SOME CLARIFICATIONS

There are still some half-baked snoopers intent on rummaging through old newspapers and old photographs to try to prove my anti-Americanism because of my affection for Italy, my respect for the government which the Italians have chosen, and my friendship for the diplomatic and consular representatives of Italy in the United States.

But have they found in their breathless search and their malicious gleanings a single act or word of mine against America?

This indeed would have been a vain search, because the United States has always been first in my heart. And why, therefore, should my very loyal Americanism have caused me to suspect that I would be blamed for my devotion to my native land and the interest and sympathy with which I followed every important Italian event while the most cordial, friendly relations existed between Rome and Washington, to the strengthening of which I and my newspapers gave every possible cooperation?

Now that—for the first time in their histories—Italy and the United States find themselves in opposing camps, I did not wait for impositions from above or below to take due account of the new situation and to proclaim without the slightest hesitation and without reservations that my duty—as that of every other American citizen of Italian extraction—is that of being profoundly loyal to America, just as we were before and always shall be.

I must remind those who reproach me for the Italian Red Cross fund and other Italian relief funds during the Ethiopian War that the enterprise had the sanction of the State Department. Funds were being collected for Selassie; and why, then, since the United States was neutral, should Italo-Americans have been deprived of contributing to funds for the relief of the wounded or of the families of Italians killed in battle?

Among the happiest memories of our community will always be the great relief rally I staged at Madison Square Garden on the night of December 14, 1935, which was attended by 22,000 people, while many others, unable to procure seats, jammed the surrounding streets to listen to the speeches carried to them by loudspeakers. The charitable purpose of that enterprise found eloquent proponents in prominent American and Italo-American citizens who addressed that meeting, such as the late Supreme Court Justice Salvatore A. Cotillo, Supreme Court Justice Ferdinand Pecora, the late Democratic Congressman from New York, Hon. William I. Sirovich, and Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia, who, after having congratulated the organizers for the great meeting "under the protection of the Stars and Stripes," added, "Your enthusiasm is fully justified, because I know that every cent which you have given will go to the benefit of the Red Cross and the other relief organizations of Italy."

A photostatic copy of a check for $100,000, bearing my signature, has been reproduced. Very well. That document—one of eight checks of similar amount turned over to the representative of the Italian Government—is glaring proof that fund drives of my newspapers are not shrouded in mystery and that I prefer to give the donors tangible proof that every dollar collected—not a penny less, as Mayor La Guardia pointed out—reached its destination. I am not in the habit of collecting funds from the public for a definite purpose without letting the donors know how their money was spent.

A grave accusation of this sort—collecting funds for a monument which was never erected—was launched in the House of Representatives against the head of a newspaper which, often covered by the banner of red internationalism, dares raise its voice against a charitable enterprise of mine for the benefit of Italy, forgetting, however, that I have collected and personally donated for the American Red Cross, for the relief of flood victims in the United States, for the Greater New York Fund, and for innumerable charitable and cultural American or Italo-American organizations, a list of which can be found in another section of this newspaper.

One of the latest fund-raising campaigns promoted through my newspapers was for the noble purpose of erecting a monument in Washington to the memory of Guglielmo Marconi, whose genial inventions have benefited all mankind. And the monument has already been erected and waits only its solemn dedication.

May I be permitted to ask why, to the explicit charge made by Congressman DICKSTEIN on the floor of the House of Representatives—where have the funds for the monument to Matteotti gone?—the accused has not yet answered. Probably he is among those who seriously believe that, in certain cases, silence is golden. * * *

I have always been against fascism in the United States, and I do not know of any Fascist organizations among Italo-Americans. It is for this reason that I consider useless all the noise being made by some groups of old or recently imported anti-Fascists, whose Americanism is of doubtful quality, since some of them come from the ranks of "red" subversivism and others are authentic ex-Fascists, who have been converted to anti-fascism only for personal reasons. Their insinuations and their libellous attacks directed against one or another lend themselves—and it is principally for this reason that I protest—to harmful generalizations which end by strengthening the most foolish prejudices and the most unjust discriminations against Italo-Americans, who are, in their Americanism, far more patriotic than these accusers of many colors among whom there are some who, as they have betrayed their native land, might some day also betray America.

The Aftermath of the Fireworks Chat

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of June 2, 1941:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of June 2, 1941]

THE AFTERMATH OF THE FIREWORKS CHAT

It would appear that Mr. Roosevelt realizes that his war speech fell dead. It pancaked. The people were not stunned by his picture of their perils. They recognized the danger as one which does not exist and the unlimited emergency as something of an unlimited absurdity.

The Nazis, in Mr. Roosevelt's war propaganda, are an immediate threat to the Western Hemisphere. He said they have the military power to occupy Spain and Portugal and are bringing a threat "to the Atlantic fortress of Dakar and the island outposts of the New World—the Azores and Cape Verde Islands." The war, he said, "is coming very close to home."

British sea control had just been demonstrated. A ship the Germans thought was the most powerful afloat had been sunk as it attempted to enter the North Atlantic. When Mr. Roosevelt undertook to tell the country that the Western Hemisphere is in imminent danger of Nazi invasion the people knew he was trying to play on their fears. Two navies said there was no unlimited emergency or any other kind. The greatest of all now is the American Navy. It is ridiculous to tell the Nation it is in the immediate peril which would justify the war alarms concocted for deceitful purposes.

Mr. Roosevelt repeated his statement that the Atlantic is the graveyard of supplies intended for Great Britain. "The battle of the Atlantic," he said, "now extends from the icy waters of the North Pole to the frozen continent of the Antarctic. Throughout this huge area there have been sinkings of merchant ships in alarming and increasing numbers by Nazi raiders or submarines."

The best reports obtainable by Congress indicate that the loss of ships clearing from ports in the United States has been small. Admiral Land, of the Maritime Commission, revealed that his records showed only 8 of 205 such vessels had been sunk in the first 3 months of this year. Other figures put the total number of such ships lost for the entire period of the war at 28.

It does not suit Mr. Roosevelt as the head of the war party to trim his alarms down to the size of the facts. If he did, he would not have any emergency except emergencies he can find at home and has made. The speech didn't click. People who had been keeping their heads didn't lose them. People who were not for war didn't change their minds. A sense of failure may have led to the subsequent drive to frighten the people.

Mayor LaGuardia followed up Mr. Roosevelt's proclamation by proclaiming on his own hook. He proclaimed that "all residents of New York adhere to the requirements of said proclamation and adjust themselves to the state of emergency existing." Such of the residents as have retained a measure of sanity may be looking about for methods of adjustment to whatever is to be adhered to.

The mayor does not give them much help aside from demanding unstinted support of the Government "to the extent of personal sacrifice." The Little Wild Flower's output is a part of the concerted drive against the intelligence and common sense of the country. It has appeared in many quarters. It is officially inspired and directed. It is intended to create the impression that the Nation is at war and that it may be attacked at any moment.

The Memorial Day "alert" in the Army camps, the ports, munitions plants, and other spots where it might scare someone seems to have been a part of the alarm campaign. J. Edgar Hoover, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is darkly ominous about sabotage plots and officials of various cities have been warned.

An attempt is made to create a war atmosphere by telling the people that they must be ready to use less electricity and less gasoline, by suggesting that food rations may be imposed, and by collecting pots and pans in house-to-house visitations. All is intended to stir the blood, play on emotions and fears, and break down the common sense.

Have we ever before known such a determined attempt by government to drag the Nation into war? Have methods ever been so unscrupulous, falsifications so obvious, and intent so pernicious?

A Mischievous Utterance

EDITORIAL FROM THE HARTFORD (CONN.) COURANT

Mr. MACIORA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of June 7, 1941:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of June 7, 1941]

A MISCHIEVOUS UTTERANCE

Until the death of Mr. Edelstein of New York as he ended a reply to Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi probably few persons realized the character of some of the utterances being made in the Congress of the United States at the present time. With the Nation in a state of unlimited emergency in order that it might the better equip itself and its friends in the war against nazi-ism, few would have supposed that the House of Representatives would have time, much less inclination, for speeches tainted by racial prejudice.

Unhappily, such is the case. In his speech Mr. RANKIN had declared that "Wall Street and a little group of our international Jewish brethren are still attempting to harass the President and Congress of the United States into plunging us into the European war unprepared." The animus of the statement is obvious. By attempting to fasten the responsibility for the foreign policy of the Nation at the present time on a small minority, the statement evidently seeks to create disunity now, as well as to name the scapegoat on whom can be shifted the blame in the event that the policy is regarded as a failure in the future. In the circumstances, the statement is pregnant with mischief.

In his reply, Mr. Edelstein correctly pointed out that such accusations as Mr. RANKIN had voiced were in large part responsible for the rise of nazi-ism in Germany, which evil force the United States has pledged its help in destroying. In almost his last breath, he decried the utterance, with entire justice, as being "unfair and un-American." His death put the incident in the blazing light of publicity. The people of the United States can well ponder its significance. If they do, they will give no faith or credit to men who speak as Mr. RANKIN did.

STATEMENT BY CITIZENSHIP EDUCATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of the Citizenship Educational Service, dated June 6, 1941, which should be read by every Member of the House because it emphasizes the importance of tolerance and brotherly love.

The statement follows:

A charge that statements of the type made yesterday in the House play into the hands of Europe's dictators was made today by Citizenship Educational Service, a coordinating committee of 24 national patriotic, religious, and welfare organizations with a membership of more than 30,000,000 Americans.

The text of the statement, which was issued by Palmer Bevis, executive director of Citizenship Educational Service, follows:

"The attack on the Jews which was made in the House yesterday with such tragic consequences is something which should never be permitted to happen again in a land which prides itself on its democracy.

"In ordinary times, an attack on a religious group such as this would be serious enough as a violation of the American doctrine of tolerance and understanding with respect to all classes, races, and creeds. Today, however, what is involved is something far more important. For today, such spreaders of prejudice are consciously or unconsciously playing the game of Europe's dictators who, through the most diabolical and far-reaching propaganda campaign ever conceived, are attempting in every country in the world to fan the flames of group hatreds, class conflicts, and religious bigotry as a means of spreading confusion and discord in the ranks of the democracies. This psychological warfare against America is no myth. For if American groups can be set to fight among themselves, American defense will be sabotaged at its roots, our aid to Britain will be reduced, and the resulting indecision and delay will give the dictators their hoped-for chance to win a quick victory.

"America is a land where individuals are judged, not by their membership in any minority group, but by their individual worth, their individual abilities, their individual moral qualities as American citizens. Once America gives up these standards with respect to men and women of whatever religion or national origin, we are ourselves on the road to the destruction of the American way of life itself and the substitution for it of the fantastic "master race" theories of the totalitarian nations.

"The fact that foreign propaganda, to the extent of millions of dollars, is being poured out in this country to create just this kind of prejudice, is serious enough. But that any one of the people's Representatives in Congress, Representatives sworn to uphold the letter and spirit of the Constitution, should on the floor of the House of Representatives, aline himself openly with this foreign propaganda is an event which cannot go unchallenged by decent, self-respecting Americans everywhere.

"In his recent 'fireside chat', President Roosevelt spoke of 'the Bundists, the Fascists, and the Communists, and every group devoted to bigotry and racial and religious intolerance.' And, he continued: 'It is no mere coincidence that all the arguments put forward by these enemies of democracy—all their attempts to confuse and divide our people and to destroy public confidence in government * * * all of these are but echoes of the words that have been poured out from the Axis bureaus of propaganda. Those same words have been used before in other countries—to scare them, to divide them, to soften them up. Invariably those same words have formed the advance guard of physical attack.'

"In the spirit of this official warning to the American people by their President, we protest against the words spoken in the House of Representatives yesterday."

The 24 national organizations affiliated with Citizenship Educational Service are: Boy Scouts of America, Boys' Clubs of America, Catholic Youth Organization, Federal Council of Churches, National Conference of Christians and Jews, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Y. LETTER AND STATEMENTS FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave previously granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statements from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 10, 1941.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman, House Committee on Appropriations,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: By direction of the Secretary and in accordance with the arrangements made with you as outlined in his letter of January 31, 1941, I am enclosing herewith the following statements:

Statement No. I, general Budget summary—receipts and expenditures, comparing (1) Budget estimates for the fiscal years 1941 and 1942 and actual figures for the fiscal year 1940; and (2) actual figures for the first 11 months of each of the fiscal years 1940 and 1941.

Statement No. II, effect of financing the deficit on the public debt, showing (1) Budget estimates for the fiscal years 1941 and 1942, and actual figures for the fiscal year 1940; and (2) actual figures as of May 31, 1940, and May 31, 1941, respectively: This statement shows the extent to which the net deficit has been met through borrowings and reductions in the Treasury's cash balance. It also shows the debt at the beginning and the close of the period.

Statement No. III, statutory debt limitation, showing the amount of the debt outstanding which is subject to the debt limitation and the balance of the borrowing authority, i. e., the amount of additional debt which may be issued pursuant to existing limitations.

Statement No. IV, general fund balance, showing an analysis of the general fund balance and the changes therein during the period: This statement sets forth the balances at the beginning and the close of the period classified as to working balance, increment on gold, and seigniorage. It shows how the general-fund balance was affected by (1) borrowings, (2) excess of receipts or expenditures in trust accounts, etc., and (3) the net deficit as set forth in statement No. I.

Statement No. V, obligations of corporations and credit agencies guaranteed as to principal and interest as of May 31, 1941: This statement shows the contingent liabilities of the Government, i. e., the outstanding securities issued by corporations and credit agencies which are guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest.

Statement No. VI, combined statement of assets and liabilities of governmental corporations and credit agencies, as of April 30, 1941, based upon the latest official reports received by the Treasury: This statement shows the total assets of such corporations and agencies, the liabilities (including reserves), and their net worth. The liabilities are segregated according to obligations guaranteed by the United States and obligations not so guaranteed. The net worth is classified as to the amounts of the Government's proprietary interest and of the proprietary interests not owned by the Government. The total amount of interagency interests of all corporations and agencies included in this statement is also shown.

Following the suggestion in your letter of May 9, 1941, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, estimates of receipts and expenditures have been revised upon the basis of the latest information available. Accordingly the Budget estimates of receipts, expenditures, and net deficit used in statements I, II, and IV are the Budget Director's revised estimates as of June 1, 1941.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

[1] Exclusive of obligations owned by the Treasury and accrued interest thereon.

[2] Funds have been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for payment of all obligations guaranteed by the United States, representing outstanding matured principal amounting to $11,700,000 and interest of $4,200,000.

[3] Limit of authority to insure mortgages. Debentures may be issued and tendered only in exchange for insured property acquired through foreclosure.

[4] Less than $50,000.

[5] The Corporation was authorized to issue bonds for an amount not to exceed $4,750,000,000 to be exchanged or sold to obtain funds for financing home mortgage loans or for the redemption of any of its outstanding bonds. Its authority to make loans expired on June 13, 1936, and the above limit may only be increased for the purpose of retiring its outstanding bonds by an amount equal to the amount of the bonds to be retired, which would not affect the net amount outstanding after June 13, 1936.

[6] Represents gross limit of borrowing authority. The Corporation has issued obligations totaling $478,256,000, leaving a balance of borrowing authority amounting to $321,744,000.

[7] Limit which may be outstanding at any one time with respect to the insuring of mortgages and the issuance of debentures.

[8] The total amount of assets of these corporations and agencies is in excess of the total amount of liabilities, including obligations guaranteed by the United States. See statement VI.

[1] Includes capital stock and paid-in surplus of Government corporations and agencies.

[2] Includes principal and accrued interest.

[3] Excludes $233,800,000 held by the Treasury.

NOTE.—The foregoing figures are compiled from latest reports received by the Treasury Department from the respective corporations and agencies. The amounts covering obligations guaranteed by the United States differ from those shown in table V for the reason that they are stated in this table as of Apr. 30, 1941, instead of May 31, 1941, and include accrued interest.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I introduced a bill which would create a separate and unified department for our air forces with a Secretary of Aviation, who would be a member of the President's Cabinet.

Among the letters and communications which I have received regarding this matter and my remarks pertaining thereto is one from Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, retired, United States Army, a graduate of West Point, who served with honor in all wars in which our country participated during the past 50 years. At the time of his retirement General Rivers was the inspector general of the Army at the War Department.

General Rivers saw service in the later red Indian troubles in the West, in Cuba, in the Philippines, and in France. He had a battle command in all our major combats in France.

I believe we should all give our earnest consideration to the remarks of General Rivers, not only as one who has had many years of valuable experience, but also as one who has a very deep sense of duty to his country and a great appreciation to the American people who educated him at West Point and gave him the privilege of wearing the uniform of his country for so many years.

General Rivers is from time to time writing brief studies of various things and giving occasional talks on the radio. He does not receive aid of any kind for his contributions, paying all the expenses of making and mailing his articles from personal funds, his income being the pension derived as a retired Army officer. A high sense of patriotic duty motivates General Rivers in giving his views on this subject.

His communication follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 9, 1941.

To the Honorable HARRY SAUTHOFF,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There seems to be increasing discussion of our having a single United States air corps. I have seen the article by one of our well-known designers of airplanes, which was copied in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Wednesday, May 28. That article of Major De Seversky is entitled "The Twilight of Sea Power." He believes that our own primary defense is the long-range, land-based bombing plane and other airplanes—air power. Major De Seversky says also that modern military aviation has clipped the sea power of our own Navy, leaving the fleet strategically crippled—no matter how large a Navy we build—of its offensive functions unless our air force controls the skies above the fleets. Major De Seversky is convinced that "the ultimate round-the-world range of 25,000 miles for airplanes is at most 5 years away."
